Decisions and Orders of the Board..... 1

This volume includes all important Decisions and Orders issued by the Board during the period November 30, 1984, through February 12, 1985.

Some Board Decisions granting routine motions for summary judgment contain nothing of precedential value and are not included in this volume. Copies of such Decisions can be obtained from the NLRB, Division of Information, Washington, D.C. 20570, by reference to volume and pamphlet number.

The page numbers of Board Decisions that carry pamphlet numbers may be found by referring to the Cross-Reference which appears immediately after the Table of Cases.

NOTE: The Board Decisions cited herein which contain the volume and pamphlet number, rather than the volume and page number, may be located in the Table of Cases or the Cross-Reference table of the particular volume cited.

Hilty Tank Corporation and Teamsters Local Union No. 776. Cases 4–CA–14084 and 4–CA–14160

14 December 1984

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN, HUNTER, AND DENNIS

On 7 August 1984 Administrative Law Judge Thomas D. Johnston issued the attached decision. The Charging Party filed exceptions and a supporting brief, the Respondent filed cross-exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed an answering brief to the Respondent's cross-exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Hilty Tank Corporation, Carlisle, Pennsylvania, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

[1] Both the Charging Party and the Respondent have excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

The Respondent contends that the judge improperly excluded from evidence an unsworn out-of-court statement made by union witness Reisinger after he testified, which contradicted his testimony at the hearing. The Respondent attempted to authenticate the statement through the hearsay testimony of the Respondent's president Stranko, and not by Reisinger. Under these circumstances, we find that the Respondent failed to provide sufficient proof of the statement's authenticity, and that the judge properly excluded the statement from evidence.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

THOMAS D. JOHNSTON, Administrative Law Judge. These consolidated cases were heard at Carlisle, Pennsylvania, on April 4 and 5, 1984, pursuant to amended charges filed by Teamsters Local Union No. 776 (the Union) in Case 4–CA–14084 on November 28, 1983,[1] and in Case 4–CA–14160 on January 18, 1984,[2] and a consolidated complaint served on February 22, 1984.[3]

The consolidated complaint, which was amended at the hearing, alleges that Hilty Tank Corporation (the Respondent)[4] violated Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act) by unlawfully threatening to close its facility and transfer or subcontract work if its employees selected the Union as their bargaining representative, threatening employees with unspecified reprisals because they selected the Union as their representative, interrogating an employee about the employee's support for the Union, promising to give employees a wage increase if they rejected the Union as their bargaining representative, threatening to discharge its employees because of their support for the Union, indicating to its employees that any collective-bargaining agreement would contain only those terms desired by the Respondent, informing employees that it would be futile for them to select the Union as their bargaining representative, telling employees they would not receive wage increases because they supported the Union, indicating to its employees it would not negotiate an agreement with the Union, and prohibiting its employees from talking about the Union on company property at any time including their lunch and break periods; and violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by issuing a written warning to employee Robert Mosier, suspending employee Richard Zeigler for several days, and discriminatorily discharging and refusing to reinstate Robert Mosier and employee Ronald Dick all because these employees supported and assisted the Union.

The Respondent in its answer dated March 2, 1984, denies having violated the Act as alleged.

The issues are whether the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act, as alleged, by engaging in unlawful threats, interrogations, promises, and statements regarding the Union or its selection by the employees as their bargaining representative; prohibiting employees from talking about the Union on company property at any time; and discriminatorily suspending Robert Zeigler, issuing a written warning to Robert Mosier, and discharging and refusing to reinstate Robert Mosier and Ronald Dick because of their union activities.

On the entire record[5] in the case and from my observations of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the briefs filed by the parties, I make the following[6]

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF THE RESPONDENT

The Respondent, a Pennsylvania corporation with a plant located at Carlisle, Pennsylvania, is engaged in the business of the manufacture of carbon steel tanks for use in the plumbing, heating, and petroleum industries. During the 12-month period preceding February 22, 1984, the Respondent in the course of its operations shipped goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from its Carlisle, Pennsylvania plant to points located outside the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

The Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

Teamsters Local Union No. 776 is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

The Respondent operates a plant located at Carlisle, Pennsylvania, where it is engaged in the manufacture of carbon steel tanks for use in the plumbing, heating, and petroleum industries. Included among its official and supervisory personnel are its president and majority stockholder William Stranko, Part-Owner Dale Brougher, Plant Superintendent Rick Loy,[7] and Secretary-Treasurer Yvonne Stranko, who is the wife of President Stranko.

The Union as described by Union Business Agent Wayne Shughart began an organizing campaign among the Respondent's employees in July. On July 29 it filed a petition with the Board seeking to represent certain of the Respondent's employees and on October 11, following an election held on September 30 which the Union won by a vote of nine to four, the Union was certified as the bargaining representative of the Respondent's production and maintenance employees, including welders, rollers, warehousemen, truckdrivers, and leadmen.

B. Unlawful Interrogations, Promises, Threats, and Statements

Several employees testified concerning conversations they had with the Respondent's officials and supervisors.

Ronald Dick stated that, about 3 weeks prior to the election held on September 30, President Stranko talked to him about the Union. After telling Dick the Union would be no good for him, Stranko said there would be raises if the Union did not get in but he could not give Dick a raise then on account of the Union. Stranko also asked him twice which way he was going to vote, to which Dick first replied he would rather not say and the second time he responded by saying he would make his own decision the way he felt like he wanted to vote and thought it was his own decision.

President Stranko, who said he first heard about the union organizing on July 27, acknowledged having a conversation with Dick prior to the election but stated he only informed Dick he needed help and would appreciate Dick's support at voting time. He also reminded Dick he had helped him when Dick had previously asked for his job back. Stranko denied asking Dick how he was going to vote or threatening anyone.

I credit Dick rather than Stranko and find that about September 9 President Stranko interrogated Ronald Dick about which way he was going to vote in a Board-conducted election and promised to give employees raises if they did not select the Union to represent them. Apart from my observations of the witnesses in crediting Dick instead of Stranko, I do not find Stranko's testimony plausible.

Robert Mosier, Ronald Dick, Russell Bender, and Richard Zeigler all testified that, on September 30 shortly after the election was held that day and the votes were counted showing the Union had won the election, President Stranko came into the shop, shook hands with certain employees who had voted, congratulated them, and said they had won and he had lost. Mosier stated that a few minutes later Stranko told him that Mosier had not heard the last of this yet. Zeigler, whose testimony was corroborated by Mosier, Dick, and Bender, denied Stranko shook his hand and said Stranko remarked to him that he knew where Zeigler was coming from right from the start. Mosier said he also heard Stranko remark to Dick that after all Stranko had done for Dick that he had done this to him. While Dick did not testify about such a remark he stated Stranko said to them something like "your day's coming" or something like that. Bender stated that the same day after the election as he was talking to Dick about not having a way to get home and was getting his check from Stranko, Stranko told Bender not to tell Stranko his problems and remarked Bender's troubles had not started yet.

Dick and Bender described Stranko as being mad or upset on this occasion when he spoke to the employees.

President Stranko, who admitted being disappointed on election day, acknowledged shaking hands with the employees after the election and congratulating them and telling them they had won. Although he denied saying anything different to Mosier, he acknowledged remarking to Zeigler that he knew where Zeigler was coming from all along. Stranko at the hearing explained he knew Zeigler had belonged to a union prior to coming to work for the Respondent and he intended by this remark to show he knew Zeigler was a union supporter.

Based on the testimony of Mosier and Bender, which I credit, that immediately after the Union won the election Stranko informed Mosier that he had not heard the last of this yet and told Bender that Bender's troubles had not started yet, I find that on September 30 President Stranko threatened Robert Mosier and Russell Bender with unspecified reprisals because the employees had selected the Union as their bargaining representative. With respect to Dick's testimony about Stranko making a statement about "your day's coming" or something like it, he was too uncertain exactly what Stranko said to allow me to make a finding.

Following the Union's certification the first negotiation meeting was held on October 27. Present for the Union were Business Agent Shughart, Allan Klose, Robert Mosier, and Clarence Shaffer. President Stranko represented the Respondent. Klose testified that at this meeting they went over a contract proposal presented by the Union and during the meeting Stranko said he would hire and fire anybody he wanted to and neither the Union nor anybody else was not going to tell him what to do. Stranko also said there would not be anything in the contract he did not want there and nobody was going to run his business but himself. Business Agent Shughart, who corroborated Klose's testimony about Stranko saying he would fire anyone he wanted to, also stated Stranko commented he did not like unions and the Teamsters was not going to run his business. Mosier also stated that at this meeting Stranko said he would fire whom he wanted, when he wanted, and they were not going to tell him what to do.

President Stranko did not deny making such statements at this meeting. While I credit the undenied testimony of Klose, Shughart, and Mosier concerning the statements made by Stranko, I do not find such statements constitute threats by President Stranko to discharge employees because of their support for the Union as alleged. Rather, such statements about discharging employees, unrelated to the union activities of employees and uttered in the context of bargaining, reflect only bargaining positions.

According to Shughart at each additional negotiation meeting, including three held in November and three held in January 1984, President Stranko repeated his statement that he did not like unions and a union was not going to run his business and he would discharge anyone he wanted to.[8] Klose, who corroborated Shughart's testimony, also said that at these meetings when the Union brought up changing something Stranko would tell them he did not want it in the contract so it was not going to be there.

While President Stranko did not deny making such statements, his wife, Secretary-Treasurer Stranko, who attended three negotiation meetings in January 1984, denied he said anything about unions or not liking unions at those meetings. She also denied remembering whether Stranko said he could fire anybody for any reason or the Union was not going to tell him whom he could hire and fire, but stated he did say it was his business and he would run it the way he wanted. I credit Shughart and Klose and find such statements made by Stranko at the first negotiation meeting were repeated at subsequent negotiation meetings.

Prior to the election the Respondent held three meetings of all its employees. President Stranko placed these meetings as occurring on July 29, the last week in August, and on September 29 which was the day before the election. Stranko spoke at the first meeting and both Stranko and Part-Owner Brougher, who was present at the last two meetings, spoke at those meetings. Several employees testified concerning certain statements made at these meetings by Stranko and Brougher.

Robert Mosier said that during the first meeting held on July 29 Stranko told them he had no use for the Union and mentioned at the present time he was doing the best of his ability about the employees' wages and benefits. Allan Klose stated Stranko said they did not need a third party, referring to the Union, to settle differences between employees and the Respondent and if they had any grievances to call him. Ronald Dick testified Stranko informed them the Union was not any good and was not going to help them. Dick also stated Stranko said there definitely would not be any raises because of this Union.

Robert Mosier, Allan Klose, Ronald Dick, Russell Bender, and Richard Zeigler testified Stranko at the meeting informed them if the Union was voted in he would shut the doors, close the shop, take the tanks out of the shop, ship the trucks back to Brougher, or contract out and there would be no jobs or everybody would be out of a job.

President Stranko's version of what he said about closing the plant was if the Union was voted in and put the Respondent in an uncompetitive position the Respondent might be forced to close the plant down. Stranko denied raises were mentioned.

Based on the testimony of Robert Mosier, Allan Klose, Ronald Dick, Russell Bender, and Richard Zeigler, which I credit instead of that of Stranko, which I have previously discredited, I find that on July 29 President Stranko threatened employees with closing the plant and transferring work if the employees selected the Union to represent them.

Robert Mosier testified that during the second meeting held in late August Part-Owner Brougher mentioned the Union could not do anything for them and he could not understand why they wanted one. Allan Klose stated Brougher said they did not need a union there and any differences they had could be settled between the employees and Stranko and himself. Russell Bender said Brougher told them the Union really would not help them and a third party could not settle their problems, and the Respondent would rather the employees wait another year and give the Company a chance to make things right and then they could join the Union if things were not made right for them. Richard Zeigler stated Brougher also said they did not need a union and the Union could not do anything for them and they did not need a third party involved.

Both Robert Mosier and Richard Zeigler testified Brougher told the employees if the Union came in he would take the road joints[9] out and take them back to where they came from. Allan Klose stated Brougher said he could take them out and take them back to where they came from, and Russell Bender testified Brougher said they had brought the road joints up from one of his companies and if the Union got in there could be a good chance they would discontinue building. While Ronald Dick first stated Brougher told them he would do away with the road joints for voting for the Union, under cross-examination Dick was not sure whether Brougher or Stranko said it.[10]

[8] These statements made at those meetings were not alleged as violations, but only offered as evidence of Respondent's union animus.

[9] The road or expansion joints as described by Mosier are used in highways between concrete sections to allow for expansion in hot weather and contraction in cold weather.

[10] Dick in an affidavit given to a Board agent stated that at one meeting Stranko had said he would do away with the road joints if they voted for the Union.

According to Bender, Klose, Mosier, and Dick if the road joint work was moved, employees would be laid off or have less work or the plant would be closed.

Mosier also testified that in the meeting Brougher told them if they voted in the Union the most that could happen was the Respondent would have to sit down for two or three meetings and the employees would go out on strike and the Respondent would hire somebody to replace them.

Allan Klose testified that at the second or third meeting Stranko told them they could not get a raise then. However, Stranko mentioned he was just starting out of the red into the black and said that until the time they started talking about bringing in the Union they were going to get a raise,[11] but since the Union was in he could not give it to them because it might be considered a bribe before the election. Richard Zeigler stated Brougher told them at this meeting the Respondent had received a letter from the NLRB and it could not give them a raise because it would be considered a bribe. Robert Mosier did not recall whether Brougher made any comment about wages.

Allan Klose testified that Stranko also said in negotiating with the Union for contracts there would be nothing in the contract except what Stranko wanted there and there was no one who knew how to run the Company except him.

Richard Zeigler also stated that at the last meeting, which was on September 29, Stranko said he had to negotiate a contract but the only thing that would be in it was what the Company wanted in there. Russell Bender also stated that at the meeting the Respondent told the employees it wanted them to give the Respondent another chance before the vote the next day and see if it could make things right.

Both Part-Owner Brougher and President Stranko explained at the hearing that what Brougher had said about the road joints[12] in the meeting was that he mentioned the fact that the road joints during a work stoppage due to the Union would have to be subcontracted out because of their commitment to the highway contractors. According to them, their commitment was under no circumstances would they hold up contractors' jobs, but they would be able to complete deliveries when needed, and their work was but a very small part of an overall contract.

Brougher and Stranko both denied anything was said to the employees in the meetings about giving them a raise. Rather, they stated when Allan Klose had asked them about a raise they informed the employees they could not discuss it.

Brougher, on being asked at the hearing what he had told the employees in the meetings about the process of negotiations or collective bargaining with the Union, stated at the first meeting he attended that as far as negotiating he said they would not negotiate. However, at the last meeting he told them if they voted for the Union the Company would sit down and discuss it with the Union. Stranko also stated Brougher said it was a give-and-take process with an exchange of ideas working towards a contract, but indicated no one was forced to agree to anything and the Company would bargain in good faith. Both Brougher and Stranko denied Brougher said they would only have two or three meetings and the contract would just say whatever he wanted it to say.

I credit the testimony of Robert Moiser, Richard Zeigler, Allan Klose, Ronald Dick, and Russell Bender, instead of that of Brougher and Stranko, concerning these meetings, and find that in late August Part-Owner Brougher threatened the employees with transferring or subcontracting the road joint work if they selected the Union as their bargaining representative; Brougher told employees the Respondent could not give them a raise indicating it was because of the Union;[13] Brougher by his own admission told employees he would not negotiate with the Union; and President Stranko informed employees any collective-bargaining agreement negotiated with the Union would contain nothing except what the Respondent wanted, thereby indicating to employees it would be futile for them to select the Union as their bargaining representative. Besides my observations of the witnesses in discrediting Brougher, his explanation of what he told the employees about subcontracting the road joint work is not persuasive.

C. Prohibiting the Employees from Discussing the Union on Respondent's Property

Richard Zeigler, Allan Klose, and Russell Bender testified that, about the latter part of August, Plant Superintendent Loy instructed them they were not to talk about the Union on company time or property. They all denied the Respondent had any rule at the time prohibiting employees from discussing nonwork subjects on worktime and stated they and other employees had previously discussed such subjects on worktime every day. According to Bender, Zeigler, and Klose, supervisory personnel, including Plant Superintendent Loy, were aware of these discussions and had talked to employees about things other than work, including sports, and had told jokes on working time.

Superintendent Loy under cross-examination acknowledged that prior to the election he told employees they were not to campaign for the Union while on company-paid time or on the premises. Loy at the hearing explained he did so on advice of a labor consultant employed by the Respondent. Loy further acknowleged he had had discussions with employees at work including subjects like sports and hunting. While Loy stated there was no rule against such discussions as long as they did not disrupt production, no evidence was proffered to show that at the time Zeigler, Klose, and Bender were given their instructions production was being interfered with and the instructions themselves made no reference to the interference with production.

[11] Klose acknowledged that prior to their contacting the Union Stranko had not mentioned a raise.

[12] Stranko stated the Respondent has been manufacturing the road joints since 1982 and the work was contracted to the Respondent by Brougher.

[13] According to Klose, President Stranko had said the employees were going to get a raise until they started talking about bringing in the Union.

Based on the testimony of Zeigler, Klose, and Bender, which I credit, and Loy's own admissions, I find that about the latter part of August Plant Superintendent Loy prohibited employees Richard Zeigler, Allan Klose, and Russell Bender from talking about the Union on company property at any time.

D. The Discharge of Ronald Dick

Ronald Dick was employed by the Respondent in December 1980 and worked about a year until he quit. He was rehired in May and worked until November 17.[14] His job was welding tanks and he also built road joints.

Dick's union activities included signing a union authorization card and attending union meetings.

According to Dick, for about a week prior to November 17 a rotator button on the equipment he was using was broken with the wires exposed. Despite his complaints to three different foremen over a period of several days the button was not fixed.

The last day Dick worked for the Respondent was November 17. That morning Dick, who was working in the plant, heard President Stranko hollering and screaming at Russell Bender and Richard Zeigler, who were about 20 feet away. Dick walked around the tank he was working on and listened; after he returned to his tank Stranko came over to where he was and using profanity told him it was none of his business if the buttons worked or not. After Dick replied Stranko was right, Stranko told Dick if he did not like it he could quit. When Dick made no response Stranko repeated his statement, whereupon Dick told Stranko if Stranko wanted him to quit he could fire him. Stranko told Dick he was not firing him but then started hollering and screaming at Dick, cursing him, and told him if he did not like it he wanted him to leave—the third time Stranko told him to leave. Dick then told Stranko he was going to leave, but would see what he could have done about it. Stranko, still hollering and screaming, kept asking Dick, "What'd you say?" as Dick went to the timeclock, punched out, and left.

Both Russell Bender and Richard Zeigler, who estimated they were about 15 to 20 feet away, stated they saw Stranko talking to Dick and, although they did not hear everything Stranko, who was talking in a loud voice, said, they heard Stranko curse Dick and tell him to get out of there, whereupon Dick then punched out and left. According to Bender and Zeigler, prior to Stranko's talking to Dick, Stranko had come over to where they were working and had yelled at and cursed them and said if they had something to bitch about they were not to do it behind his back but to come to him. Zeigler also said Stranko told them if they could not come to him they were to leave.

Zeigler stated that just before this incident occurred he and Allan Klose had been in the lunchroom talking about an electrical box with no cover at the rotator and how unsafe it was. Zeigler did not know whether Dick was involved in that discussion.

President Stranko denied discharging Dick on November 17 or that his treatment of Dick had anything to do with Dick's union activity. His explanation of the incident was his wife had reported to him that morning she had overheard Bender, Zeigler, and Dick in the lunchroom using profanity against the Respondent and the fact the rotator button was broken and he went and spoke to those three employees because of his concern that salespeople and customers could have overheard them talking in the lunchroom. Stranko stated he confronted Bender and then Zeigler, who were at the road joint tables, about the report he had received and asked them why they did not come to him instead of cursing the Company for something they did not make the Company aware of. When Zeigler said he did not have anything to say Stranko, using profanity, told him not to be gutless and if he had anything to say to say it.

Stranko testified he then went over to the rotator where Dick was and told Dick he understood Dick had a problem or complaint and had been in the lunchroom cursing the Company, saying that it did not fix anything and the rotator button was not working. When Dick replied he did not have anything to say and just wanted it fixed, Stranko told Dick, using profanity, not to be gutless and if Dick had anything to say to say it and to tell them so they could take care of it and not to just complain in front of the men and cause a lot of problems with that sort of thing. Dick then accused Stranko of telling him to leave and of firing him, both of which Stranko denied. However, Dick proceeded towards the timeclock while repeating those accusations, which Stranko again denied. Dick then punched out and left.

Stranko estimated Bender and Zeigler were about 80 feet from Dick and denied because of the normal noise in the plant that day they could hear what he said to Dick. While Stranko acknowledged he was upset and his voice was up when he talked to Dick, he denied he was yelling.

Raymond Neal, who was a crew leader or assistant crew leader for the Respondent, stated that on November 17 he was in the plant standing by the 3.8 amp rotator and he observed President Stranko talking in a loud conversation to both Bender and Zeigler and then with Dick. Neal was unable to estimate how far he was from them, but stated he was closer to Bender and Zeigler than to Dick. While Neal denied being able to hear what was being said because of the noise, he first said he may have heard a word or two in Stranko's conversation with Bender and Zeigler but then stated he did not remember hearing any words. Dick denied Neal was in the area when he talked to Stranko that day.

While Plant Superintendent Loy testified that between where Bender and Zeigler worked from Dick a person might be able to pick up a conversation if those persons were yelling, he claimed there was no way to identify what was being said. However, Loy acknowledged he was not present on that occasion and the noise level in the plant fluctuated.

Based on the testimony of Dick, Bender, and Zeigler, which I credit rather than that of Stranko, which I have previously discredited, and Neal, which testimony was contradictory, I find that on November 17 President Stranko instructed Dick to leave, thereby discharging him.

Later that same day President Stranko called Ronald Dick's home and talked to his wife, Gloria Dick. Gloria Dick testified that on that occasion Stranko asked her whether her husband was there and told her he and Ronald Dick had had words and Dick had walked out. After Gloria Dick informed Stranko her husband, who she thought was at work, was not home, Stranko told her that he could come down and ask for a job but was supposed to call back between 3 and 3:30 p.m. if he wanted his job back, and if Stranko did not hear from him between 3 and 3:30 p.m. he would replace him the next morning. Gloria Dick also testified during the conversation Stranko told her he had taken pity on her husband and had given him a job, but in the meantime they were working to get the Union and Ronald Dick was supposed to promise him he was not going to vote for the Union.

President Stranko stated on that occasion he told Gloria Dick that he and her husband had had a disagreement and Dick had walked off the job, but if her husband returned home by 5 p.m. for him to call Stranko and his job was there. Stranko stated Gloria Dick then mentioned her husband should never have gone against Stranko in the Union, whereupon he denied that had anything to do with it and stated he did not want to discuss it.

Secretary-Treasurer Stranko, who said she overheard her husband talking to Gloria Dick on the telephone that day but could not hear what Dick said, corroborated her husband's testimony concerning what he said he told Gloria Dick.

I credit Stranko's testimony, which was corroborated by his wife, instead of Gloria Dick's, which version I do not find plausible concerning their conversation.

Ronald Dick stated on returning home that day about 4:30 p.m. his wife gave him Stranko's message. However, he did not call because it was too late since he had been working until 3:30 p.m. and his wife did not say anything to him about calling before 5 p.m.

Later that week[15] Ronald Dick called President Stranko and asked for his job back; however, Stranko refused to rehire him. During the conversation Dick mentioned he had been to the NLRB.

Stranko at the hearing said the reason he did not rehire Dick on that occasion was when Dick left his employment the first time he had worked there he had improperly accused Stranko of firing him[16] when he quit his job instead because he did not have a way to get to work, and because he had already taken steps to replace Dick after he left on November 17 although he had not actually hired anyone to replace him.

[15] Dick placed this conversation as occurring 2 days later, which was November 19, while Stranko stated it occurred on Friday, which would have been November 18.

[16] Dick denied accusing Stranko of firing him on that occasion, while Plant Superintendent Loy corroborated Stranko's testimony about the incident.

E. The Suspension of Richard Zeigler

Richard Zeigler has been employed by the Respondent for over 2 years and works as a welder. His union activities include signing a union authorization card and attending union meetings. He along with Allan Klose initially contacted the Union about organizing the Respondent's employees.

Zeigler credibly stated that about the middle of August Plant Superintendent Loy asked him whether there was anything they could do to keep the Union from coming there. He informed Loy that there was not at that point and he thought it was too late. Loy did not deny such conversation occurred.

Zeigler stated that on Monday, December 19, he did not report to work because of a severe headache caused by medication he was taking for tuberculosis. He instructed his nephew William Reisinger, who worked for the Respondent and with whom he rode to work, to report him as being off work for sickness.

Reisinger confirmed Zeigler had called him at home that morning and said he was sick and would not be going to work. Reisinger stated that on his arrival at work he told Plant Superintendent Loy that Zeigler was sick and would not be in to work. When Loy asked what was the matter he told him he did not know.

Loy acknowledged Reisinger told him that morning Zeigler would not be in to work that day. However, he claimed he asked Reisinger both the reason and then whether Zeigler was sick, with Reisinger answering both times he did not know. I credit Reisinger, who I find was a more credible witness than Loy. Besides my observations of the witnesses in crediting Reisinger rather than Loy, Loy's testimony was contradictory.

Zeigler stated that about 11:30 a.m. that same morning he drove over to his brother's farm nearby and while he was crossing a fence to speak to his brother, who was outside, a stick from a tree struck him in his eye. Zeigler stated that about 5:30 a.m. the next morning he had to go to the hospital as a result of his eye injury and he did not go to work that day but had his sister notify Loy at home he would be off from work. Reisinger also testified on November 20 while he was getting ready to go to work Zeigler's sister notified Reisinger's mother that Zeigler was not going to work that day and he told Loy the same morning Zeigler would not be there.

Loy acknowledged that Zeigler's sister called him at home that morning and informed him Zeigler had been struck in the eye with a stick and he would not be at work that day.

Zeigler testified on the afternoon of December 20 Loy called and informed him he had been given a 3-day suspension for not properly reporting being off from work on December 19 and said he should have reported being off from work personally. Loy further stated Zeigler also had an indefinite suspension for not reporting being off from work properly on Tuesday.

Loy, who said he decided on December 19 to suspend Zeigler for 3 days and on December 20 to make the suspension indefinite because Zeigler's sister had called in instead of Zeigler, acknowledged notifying Zeigler on December 20 he had placed him on an indefinite suspension. He said he told Zeigler it was for improperly reporting being off from work, which he explained meant Zeigler could have called him personally and he had given him no excuse for being off. Loy did not recall asking Zeigler why he had been off from work or for an excuse.

Loy sent Zeigler a letter dated December 19 informing him he had failed to call and report his being off from work and had violated company policy by giving a fellow employee a message to report him off from work. It indicated Zeigler was suspended without pay from December 20 through December 22 for his failure to report being off from work under company procedure and threatened termination for future violations.

Zeigler, Reisinger, Russell Bender, and Allan Klose all testified other persons had called in for them before and reported they would be off from work for sickness without any discipline being taken against them. They all denied being told they had to call personally when they were going to be off from work for sickness, and, as stated by Bender and Klose, they were only told that the Respondent be notified before starting time. Both Zeigler and Reisinger stated on several prior occasions Reisinger had reported Zeigler would be off from work for sickness without incident.

The Respondent's policy on reporting being off from work as described by Loy is the employee himself is to notify Loy's office within a half-hour of the start of the workday if he is going to be off from work and give an excuse why he is going to be off. Loy admitted, however, in the past he had allowed persons other than the employee himself to call in for an employee. Under cross-examination, Loy admitted he had permitted Reisinger to report Zeigler off sick before and it was okay for an employee to report another employee off sick.

Zeigler testified later that week he went to the Respondent to find out how long he was being suspended; however, Loy ordered him off the Respondent's property. When he returned on Friday, December 23, to get his check, President Stranko told him he could come back to work on Tuesday, which would have been December 27. On December 28 after Zeigler returned to work, he was given a written confirmation of his suspension by Loy, who signed it, which provided as follows:

> Due to your violation of Company Policy on December 19–20, 1983, you were suspended without pay for four days. You are hereby returned to work effective Tuesday, December 27, 1983 with the understanding that this is your last chance warning. Any future violation of Company policy will result in your termination.

Loy, who said he discussed the matter with President Stranko, who had accused Zeigler of being a union supporter, but made the decision himself, gave several reasons for suspending Zeigler. Although he thought Zeigler had voted for the Union, he denied Zeigler's union activities had anything to do with it. According to Loy, a few days prior to December 19 Zeigler had asked for permission to be off from work on December 19 to go deer hunting[17] and he had denied Zeigler's request. He denied on December 19 he was given any reason for Zeigler being off from work. He said he called Zeigler's home after 7 but before 8 that morning and no one answered, and he believed Zeigler was not sick but had gone deer hunting. Besides believing Zeigler had gone deer hunting and no excuses were given to him, Loy, who said the biggest factor was Zeigler had broken company policy, also stated he relied on the fact Zeigler had not called him personally to inform him about being off from work and he also considered Zeigler's work record.

Zeigler's work record contains various written notations reflecting on June 19, 1931, he failed to follow his shop drawings; on November 11, 1981, he failed to follow instructions properly; on December 23, 1981, he did not show up for work for 1 day after his request to go bear hunting had been denied, for which he was suspended for 1 day, and the record reflects his wife had called in but he did not have a doctor's excuse and it was common knowledge he intended not to come in thereby disregarding instructions;[18] on April 8, 1982, he mocked his supervisor with hand gestures, for which he was warned; on May 25, 1982, he performed improper work and displayed an improper attitude, for which he was warned; on March 18, he failed to properly test a tank for which he was told future negligence would result in suspended time off without pay; on March 29 he performed improper welding with a last warning that future negligence would result in disciplinary action; on May 31 he was given a 2-day suspension for improper welding and a warning of future suspension and then termination; on August 18 he was given a 3-day supension for gross negligence that day for what appears was improper welding and damage to a tank with a warning of termination on the next offense; on October 7 he did improper testing of a tank, for which he was warned that future negligence may result in discipline or possible termination; and on December 15 he was verbally warned for not wearing ear protection.

F. The Written Warning to and the Discharge of Robert Mosier

Robert Mosier was employed by the Respondent from March 1982 until October 31, 1983. His duties primarily consisted of driving trucks and on occasions he worked in the plant.

Mosier's union activities included attending union meetings, signing a union authorization card, discussing the Union with other employees, wearing a union insignia[19] on his hat at work, and participating in the negotiation meeting held on October 27.

Mosier was given a written warning in a letter from President Stranko dated October 24 for five violations of the work rule policy occurring on October 20 for failing to follow trip ticket instructions and not calling in after [17] Zeigler did not recall making such a request.

[18] Zeigler did not recall an incident where he had gone hunting when his wife had called him in sick and Plant Superintendent Loy acknowledged his own knowledge about the incident was based on what former Plant Superintendent Miller had told him.

the last stop; on September 14 for a complaint on his driving habits; on July 7 for housekeeping on the tractor he drove; on May 31 for insubordination; and on May 19 for sideswiping two vehicles with an oversize load on the trailer, including one in Pennsylvania and one in Ohio. This letter further stated that it was confirming their meeting on October 21, that Stranko had previously spoken to Mosier about the serious nature of each offense but the violations were continuing, and that this was his final warning and the next offense would mean disciplinary action and after that termination.

President Stranko testified he had met with Mosier on October 21 and gone over the various incidents reported in the letter and Mosier's attitude towards them, and he had mentioned things were mounting and they would have to get them straightened out. According to Stranko, Mosier's attitude in the meeting was the incidents were nothing and Mosier said Stranko had mentioned them before. Stranko stated during the meeting while he was talking to Mosier, Mosier started getting up to leave, whereupon he informed Mosier he was not finished with him and reminded Mosier he had told him in the past not to leave until his supervisor told him to go. Mosier then sat down until the conversation was over.

Stranko stated he sent the warning letter to Mosier after the meeting because Mosier's violations were continuing and he wanted Mosier to have the confirmation so he could not forget they had talked about those offenses which he described as serious.

Mosier acknowledged meeting with Stranko and being verbally warned prior to receiving the warning letter. According to Mosier, Stranko informed him on that occasion he had black marks against him and they would write them off, but said any further black marks would come in disciplinary action and anything after that would be a discharge.

Mosier denied on that occasion Stranko told him he should not walk away when Stranko was talking to him. Mosier also stated after Stranko had finished going over the incidents Stranko pointed to the union insignia on his hat and said that did not scare him one bit.

Stranko explained the May 19 incident involved Mosier's sideswiping another vehicle knocking the mirror off without stopping, which the Respondent had to pay to have repaired, and while on the same trip Mosier had another accident. Mosier acknowledged having an accident on that trip knocking a mirror off of another tractor and another accident involving passing a dump truck at which time a door jam was bent. While Mosier denied Stranko warned him on that occasion but only said he would check into it, Stranko said he told Mosier these were serious things and warned him to be very careful.

On the May 31 incident Stranko testified on Mosier's return from a trip which Stranko estimated took 4 hours longer than necessary he asked Mosier twice what had happened; however, each time Mosier did not answer. On telling Mosier he was 4 hours late and asking whether he had a problem Mosier's response was he did not have to talk to Stranko. He then told Mosier he was his employer and he was entitled to an answer. When Mosier continued to ignore him he informed Mosier he was fired. Later that day Mosier, who had returned to get his check, apologized and asked for his job back. Stranko rehired Mosier but informed him he would not tolerate that kind of conduct and said when he or any supervisor talked to Mosier for Mosier to give them a civil answer; they were entitled to it because Mosier worked for them.

Mosier acknowledged being fired by Stranko and rehired that same day after Stranko had questioned him about where he had been on his returning from a trip and he did not answer but instead proceeded with his paperwork. Stranko also told him when he was talking to him for him not to walk away. Mosier could not recall if Stranko threatened him with discharge if a similar incident occurred.

On the July 7 incident Stranko stated he discovered the tractor Mosier was operating was filthy inside and contained empty soda cans, bottles, paper, and rags and appeared to have coffee spilled over the dashboard, at which time he talked to Mosier about his responsibility to keep it clean and said he would give him until Monday to get it squared away. When Mosier appeared to get upset during the conversation Stranko told him his attitude was very poor. Mosier acknowledged Stranko had talked to him about keeping his truck clean on one occasion after something had been spilled inside the truck and he had put towels down so it would not spread. While Mosier denied Stranko gave him a verbal warning, under cross-examination he tacitly admitted he was reprimanded on that occasion.

On the September 14 incident Stranko testified a man called and complained about Mosier's driving habits, whereupon Stranko requested the man to put it in writing. A month or two later Stranko said he received such a letter. Mosier acknowledged on one occasion Plant Superintendent Loy had talked to him about a man being upset and asked what had happened, at which time Mosier explained he had blinked his lights to pass a vehicle and evidently the man in the vehicle thought he was closer than he was. Stranko, who was present, then told Mosier he had to be careful and they could not afford accidents. Mosier denied being told he was being warned.

Stranko described the October 20 incident as one where Mosier made a trip to deliver and pick up some bars as noted on his trip ticket. Mosier delivered the bar but returned to the plant without picking up the bar as required or calling into the plant after he had delivered the last bar, which was the standard procedure. On confronting Mosier he said he had not read the trip ticket and they had to send him back to pick up the bar. Mosier acknowledged Stranko talked to him about not getting the bar, but denied he warned him.

All of these incidents except for the September 14 complaint about Mosier's driving habits are recorded on Mosier's work record. Mosier denied being told any of these incidents were verbal warnings or were going on his record.

I credit Stranko's testimony concerning his conversations with Mosier about the warnings given to Mosier. Apart from my observations of the witnesses in not crediting Mosier about the warnings, his testimony about them was not persuasive and on other occasions was contradictory.

Mosier was discharged on Monday, October 31. On that date, Mosier, who was not scheduled to work, went to the plant in the morning to turn in his trip tickets and fuel receipts for a trip he had made the previous Friday. Mosier stated at the time he was on his way to drop his son off to catch the school bus and estimated he arrived at the plant about 7:55 a.m. Mosier stated that on going to the office and handing Plant Superintendent Loy his papers Loy told him they had had difficulty starting the tractor Mosier had been driving and said when Mosier was stopped at places such as to get unloaded he wanted him to check his batteries once in a while. Mosier acknowledged he made no comment but said he shook his head affirmatively. Mosier had been standing by Loy's desk, and after shaking his head he turned, paused a couple of seconds, and, when no other remarks were made, he left the office and proceeded outside. When he was about halfway across the yard President Stranko, who had come into the office during the conversation and had been sitting at a desk about 12 feet away, came to the door and called him. Mosier turned and walked back towards Stranko. Stranko then said, "When somebody's talking to you, you do not walk out." On asking Stranko what else he wanted, Stranko repeated his statement. Mosier then remarked, "Well, what else is there?" whereupon Stranko informed Mosier he was fired.

According to Loy, the reason he talked to Mosier that day was because the day before when he went to the plant to prepare for Monday's deliveries the tractor assigned to Mosier would not start and he discovered two of the battery water levels were dry,[20] which resulted in having to assign another tractor and paying two employees overtime pay on Monday to come in early and jump start the tractor with two other vehicles. On informing Stranko that Monday morning about it Stranko instructed him to talk to Mosier.

Loy's version of the conversation, which he placed as occurring about 8:15 a.m., was he explained about finding two of the battery levels dry and felt Mosier had not checked them for a long time, whereupon Mosier just shook his head but did not say anything. Loy then went on to explain it was Mosier's responsibility to check the batteries and if there were any problems to let Loy know and they would be replaced. Loy stated while he was still talking to Mosier about opportunities Mosier would have to check the batteries while waiting at jobsites and to add water, if they were low. Mosier, who was standing beside his desk, turned away from him and walked away from his desk and out the door. Loy denied the conversation was finished or telling Mosier he was through. He stated Mosier did not say anything but nodded his head up and down practically the whole time. Loy stated when Mosier went out the door Stranko looked up from his desk where he was sitting and asked where Mosier was, whereupon he informed Stranko that Mosier had walked out or had walked out on him.

Under cross-examination, Loy acknowledged he had testified at an unemployment hearing Mosier opened the door as he was concluding his remarks and stepped out and closed the door, and in a memorandum Loy had made of the conversation he had also stated as he was concluding his remarks Mosier opened the door and left.[21]

President Stranko, who stated he was in the office sitting at the secretary's desk with his head down using a calculator but listening to the conversation, corroborated Loy's testimony regarding what was said during the conversation which Stranko could tell was not finished and that Loy had said Mosier had walked out on him.

Stranko testified he then went to the door and called to Mosier, who was in the yard, to come back and after Mosier came back part of the way Mosier asked what he wanted. Stranko stated when he told Mosier he had walked out on his supervisor in the middle of a conversation Mosier again asked what he wanted. While he was telling Mosier it was not what he wanted but it was what Mosier did by walking out in the middle of the conversation, Mosier interrupted and again asked Stranko what he wanted. Stranko then told Mosier he was fired.

Loy, who stated he overheard the conversation, corroborated Stranko's testimony.

I credit the testimony of Stranko and Loy, rather than Mosier, concerning their conversations that day leading up to the discharge and the discharge itself.

Following his discharge Mosier went into the plant to get a number from Allan Klose, but was told by Loy, acting on Stranko's instructions, and then by Stranko, to leave the plant which he did. Mosier has not been employed by the Respondent since his discharge.

Although Mosier did not punch in on October 31 and denied punching in or being paid on similar occasions in the past, the testimony of Secretary-Treasurer Stranko, who stated she paid Mosier for that day on instructions from President Stranko, and the Respondent's records reflect that Mosier was paid for coming in that morning for about 15 minutes and turning in his papers.

Stranko, in a letter dated November 1 to Mosier confirming his discharge, reminded him of the October 24 letter outlining the five previous violations of the work rule policy and warning, and stated Mosier had deliberately walked away from his immediate supervisor while he was speaking to him about the batteries and he was therefore terminated in accordance with article VI of the Company's work rule policy.

Stranko at the hearing said his reasons for discharging Mosier were his insubordination on October 31 and the prior violations he had talked to him about including his discharge for a similar incident on May 31. Additionally, Stranko credibly testified that about a week before the October 31 incident he was on the telephone trying to get some information from a customer and he instructed Mosier, who was standing there, to wait. However, Mosier left without waiting and went home. While Mosier later told Stranko he left after Loy had nodded his head, Stranko told Mosier not to walk out on his supervisor.

[20] While Mosier denied he had let the batteries run down no testimony was proffered to show when he last checked them.

[21] Loy at the hearing explained what he meant was he was concluding a remark or phrase of the conversation but not the conversation itself.

Although Mosier denied having been told on numerous occasions not to walk away from his supervisor, he did not specifically deny such incident occurred.

Loy acknowledged knowing on October 31 Mosier was a union supporter and that he previously suspected Mosier had voted for the Union.

Stranko denied that his decision to issue the written warning to or to discharge Mosier, who he acknowledged was the only employee he saw wearing a union insignia, was caused by Mosier's union activities.

G. Analysis and Conclusions

The General Counsel and the Union contend the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by engaging in unlawful threats, interrogations, promises, and statements regarding the Union; prohibiting employees from talking about the Union on company property at any time; and discriminatorily suspending Richard Zeigler, issuing a written warning to Robert Mosier, and discharging and refusing to reinstate Robert Mosier and Ronald Dick because of their union activities. The Respondent denies having violated the Act and asserts as defenses that the suspension of Zeigler and Mosier's warning and discharge were for cause and that Dick quit instead of being discharged.

Section 8(a)(1) of the Act prohibits an employer from interfering with, restraining, or coercing its employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in Section 7 of the Act. Section 8(a)(3) of the Act provides in pertinent part: "It shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer . . . by discrimination in regard to hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization."

The test applied in determining whether a violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act has occurred is "whether the employer engaged in conduct which, it may reasonably be said, tends to interfere with the free exercise of employee rights under the Act." Electrical Fittings Corp., 216 NLRB 1076 (1975). On the granting of wage increases to employees an employer, when confronted by a union organizing campaign, must proceed as it would have done had the union not been conducting its campaign. Russell Stover Candies, 221 NLRB 441 (1975). While an employer may also speak freely to employees about issues arising in connection with a union organization campaign, such statements cannot contain threats of reprisal or force or promises of benefit. Components, Inc., 197 NLRB 163 (1972).

The findings supra establish that about September 9 President Stranko interrogated Ronald Dick about which way he was going to vote in a Board-conducted election and promised to give employees raises if they did not select the Union to represent them; on September 30 President Stranko threatened Robert Mosier and Russell Bender with unspecified reprisals because the employees had selected the Union as their bargaining representative; on July 29 President Stranko threatened employees with closing the plant and transferring work if the employees selected the Union to represent them; in late August Part-Owner Dale Brougher threatened the employees with transferring or subcontracting the road joint work if they selected the Union as their bargaining representative; in late August Brougher told employees the Respondent could not give them a raise indicating it was because of the Union; in late August Brougher told employees he would not negotiate with the Union; and in late August President Stranko informed employees any collective-bargaining agreement negotiated with the Union would contain nothing except what the Respondent wanted, thereby indicating to employees it would be futile for them to select the Union as their bargaining representative.

Applying the applicable law to these findings, I find such conduct interfered with, restrained, and coerced the employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in Section 7 of the Act and the Respondent, by engaging in such conduct, violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

Insofar as employees were prohibited from talking about the Union on company property, the evidence supra establishes that about the latter part of August Plant Superintendent Loy prohibited employees Michael Zeigler, Allan Klose, and Russell Bender from talking about the Union on company property at any time. Employees engaged in a union organizational campaign have the right to solicit on plant premises subject only to the restriction that it be on nonworking time. Stoddard-Quirk Mfg. Co., 138 NLRB 615, 621 (1962). Since the employees here were prohibited from engaging in union solicitation on company property at any time, I find about the latter part of August the Respondent unlawfully prohibited employees from talking about the Union on company property at any time and thereby violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

The remaining issues to be resolved are whether Richard Zeigler, Ronald Dick, and Robert Mosier were discriminated against in their employment because of their union activities as alleged.

The law is well settled that to discriminate against employees in their employment because of their union activities violates Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act. Where motivation for discharge is at issue the General Counsel must make a prima facie showing sufficient to support the inference that protected activity by employees was a motivating factor in an employer's decision to discharge and the employer then has the burden of showing that the employees would have been discharged absent that protected activity. Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083, 1089 (1980), enfd. 662 F.2d 899 (1st Cir. 1981), cert. denied 455 U.S. 989 (1982), approved by the Supreme Court in NLRB v. Transportation Management Corp., 462 U.S. 393 (1983). Direct evidence of discriminatory motivation is not necessary to support a finding of discrimination and such intent may be inferred from the record as a whole. Heath International, 196 NLRB 318 (1972).

The evidence establishes Ronald Dick was discharged by President Stranko rather than quitting his job as Stranko alleges and that when Dick asked for reinstatement he was refused. Prior to his discharge Dick, who had signed a union authorization card and attended union meetings, had been unlawfully interrogated by President Stranko concerning how he was going to vote in the election and promised there would be raises if the Union did not get in. Not only did Dick refuse to inform Stranko, pursuant to his inquiry, how he was going to vote in the union election, but after the Union won the election Stranko indicated his displeasure at Dick by remarking Dick had done that to him after all Stranko, who had previously rehired Dick when he quit his job, had done for him. For these reasons, including Dick's union activities, President Stranko's blaming Dick in part for the Union winning the election, and the unlawful interrogation of Dick by Stranko, coupled with the Respondent's union animus as established by its unlawful conduct herein found, and having rejected the Respondent's defense by finding Dick was discharged rather than quit his job, I am persuaded and find that on November 17 the Respondent discriminatorily discharged and thereafter refused to reinstate Ronald Dick because of his union activities and thereby violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

The evidence herein found shows Richard Zeigler was active in the Union and instrumental in getting the union organizing campaign started. On December 20 he was suspended from work for 4 workdays without pay. Plant Superintendent Loy, who admittedly thought Zeigler had voted for the Union, had questioned Zeigler about whether the Respondent could do anything to keep the Union out and had instructed Zeigler, along with two other employees, not to campaign for the Union on company premises at any time. While Loy claimed Zeigler was suspended for failing to follow company policy by not calling in personally to be off from work or giving an excuse, and because he believed Zeigler had gone deer hunting instead while he was off from work, the evidence clearly refutes such reasons. Various employees testified and Loy admitted that in the past employees and other persons had called in for other employees who were sick. The credited testimony also shows that on November 19 Reisinger and on November 20 both Reisinger and Zeigler's sister, consistent with existing practices, had informed Loy that Zeigler would be off from work and the reasons, which included sickness and an eye injury, and not to go deer hunting.

Based on the foregoing evidence including Zeigler's union activities, Plant Superintendent Loy's belief Zeigler had voted for the Union and his questioning Zeigler about keeping the Union out and unlawfully prohibiting him from campaigning for the Union, the Respondent's union animus as established by its unlawful conduct herein found, and having rejected the Respondent's defense that Zeigler had failed to follow company policy in being off from work, I am persuaded and find on December 20 the Respondent discriminatorily suspended Richard Zeigler for 4 days without pay because of his union activities and thereby violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

Insofar as Robert Mosier is concerned, the findings establish Mosier was an active union adherent of which the Respondent was aware. President Stranko, who discharged Mosier, had also unlawfully threatened him on September 30 with unspecified reprisals because the employees had selected the Union as their bargaining representative. While these factors, coupled with the Respondent's union animus as established by its unlawful conduct herein found, might give rise to a finding that Mosier's written warning dated October 24 and his discharge on October 31 were because of his union activities, I am persuaded and find based on the credited evidence that Mosier's written warning and discharge were not because of his union activities but rather for cause, including his insubordination on October 31 in deliberately walking away from his supervisor, Plant Superintendent Loy, while Loy was talking to him about the batteries.

The incidents for which Mosier received his written warning were all incidents acknowledged by Mosier to have occurred previously, and while Mosier attempted to discount their significance they were of a continuing nature and had been recorded in his work record and he had been reprimanded or warned about them at the time. Mosier had also previously been warned several times by President Stranko, including twice shortly before his discharge, about walking away from his supervisors while they were talking to him, and he had previously been fired for this same reason. Notwithstanding such warnings and his prior discharge for a similar offense, Mosier on October 31 again walked away from Plant Superintendent Loy while Loy was talking to him about the batteries, for which Stranko discharged him. Under these circumstances and for the reason indicated, I find the Respondent issued the written warning to Mosier dated October 24 and discharged him on October 31 for cause and did not discriminatorily take such action against him or refuse to reinstate him because of his union activities in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act as alleged.

IV. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES UPON COMMERCE

The activities of the Respondent set forth in section III, above, found to constitute unfair labor practices, occurring in connection with the operations of the Respondent described in section I, above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow thereof.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Hilty Tank Corporation is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. Teamsters Local Union No. 776 is a labor organzation within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By interrogating an employee about which way he was going to vote in a Board-conducted election, by promising to give employees raises if they did not select the Union to represent them, by threatening employees with unspecified reprisals because the employees had selected the Union as their bargaining representative; by threatening employees with closing the plant and transferring work if they selected the Union to represent them, by threatening employees with transferring or sub-contracting the road joint work if they selected the Union as their bargaining representative, by telling employees it could not give them a raise indicating it was because of the Union, by telling employees it would not negotiate with the Union, by indicating to employees it would be futile for employees to select the Union as their bargaining representative, and by unlawfully prohibiting employees from talking about the Union on company property at any time, the Respondent has interfered with, restrained, and coerced its employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in Section 7 of the Act and has engaged in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

4. By discriminatorily discharging Ronald Dick on November 17, 1983, and thereafter refusing to reinstate him because of his union activities; and by discriminatorily suspending Richard Zeigler on December 20, 1983, for 4 days without pay because of his union activities, the Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

5. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act, I shall recommend it cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action to effectuate the policies of the Act. Accordingly, the Respondent shall be ordered to offer immediate and full reinstatement to Ronald Dick to his former job or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent job, without prejudice to his seniority and other rights and privileges, and to make him whole for any loss of earnings and other compensation he may have suffered as a result of the discrimination against him in his employment herein found by discriminatorily discharging him on November 17, 1983, and thereafter refusing to reinstate him. The Respondent shall also be ordered to make Richard Zeigler whole for any loss of earnings and other compensation he may have suffered as a result of the discrimination against him in his employment herein found by discriminatorily suspending him on December 20, 1983. Backpay shall be computed in accordance with the manner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest as prescribed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977). See generally Isis Plumbing Co.,138 NLRB 716 (1962).

The Respondent shall also be ordered to expunge from its files any references to the discriminatory discharge of Ronald Dick and the discriminatory suspension of Richard Zeigler herein found and to notify each of them in writing this has been done and evidence of its unlawful conduct will not be used as a basis for future personnel actions against them.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[22]

ORDER

The Respondent, Hilty Tank Corporation, Carlisle, Pennsylvania, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Interrogating employees about which way they are going to vote in Board-conducted elections.

(b) Promising employees raises if they do not select the Union to represent them.

(c) Threatening employees with unspecified reprisals because they have selected the Union as their bargaining representative.

(d) Threatening employees with closing the plant and transferring work if they select the Union to represent them.

(e) Threatening employees with transferring or subcontracting the road joint work if they select the Union as their bargaining representative.

(f) Telling employees it could not give them a raise indicating it is because of the Union.

(g) Telling employees it will not negotiate with the Union.

(h) Indicating to employees it would be futile for them to select the Union as their bargaining representative.

(i) Unlawfully prohibiting employees from talking about the Union on company property at any time.

(j) Discouraging membership in and activities on behalf of Teamsters Local Union No. 776, or any other labor organization, by discharging, refusing to reinstate, suspending, or in any other manner discriminating against employees in regard to their hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment.

(k) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer immediate and full reinstatement to Ronald Dick to his former job or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent job, without prejudice to his seniority and other rights and privileges, and make him whole for any loss of earnings and other compensation he may have suffered by reason of the discrimination against him by discriminatorily discharging him on November 17, 1983, and thereafter refusing to reinstate him in the manner set forth in the section of this decision entitled "The Remedy."

(b) Make Richard Zeigler whole for any loss of earnings and other compensation he may have suffered by reason of the discrimination against him by discriminatorily suspending him on December 20, 1983, in the manner set forth in the section of this decision entitled "The Remedy."

(c) Expunge from its files any references to the discharge of Ronald Dick on November 17, 1983, and to the suspension of Richard Zeigler on December 20, 1983, and notify each of them in writing this has been done and evidence of its unlawful conduct will not be used as a basis for future personnel actions against them.

[22] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

(d) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(e) Post at its Carlisle, Pennsylvania plant copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[23] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 4, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(f) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the amended consolidated complaint is dismissed insofar as it alleges unfair labor practices not specifically found herein.

HILTY TANK CORPORATION

Local 139, International Union of Operating Engineers, AFL–CIO (Wisconsin Chapter, Associated General Contractors of America, Inc.) and William J. Evans. Case 30–CB–2029

14 December 1984

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND DENNIS

On 30 December 1983 Administrative Law Judge George Norman issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed an answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions[2] as modified, but not to adopt the recommended Order.

AMENDED CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

Delete Conclusions of Law 4 and 5, substitute the following, and renumber the subsequent Conclusion of Law accordingly:

"4. By charging, trying, and fining Evans and reporting him to the State of Wisconsin's Department of Industry, Labor and Human Relations on 7 June 1983 because Evans published the Ethical Engineer, the Respondent violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act."

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Local 139, International Union of Operating Engineers, AFL–CIO, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Arbitrarily refusing to honor requests for information made by employees on the out-of-work register who have reasonable need for information pertaining to the exclusive referral system operated by the Respondent.

(b) Charging, trying, and fining members and reporting them to state agencies because they engage in Section 7 activity.

(c) In any like or related manner restraining or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Make Evans whole for all costs incurred in appealing the fine imposed against him at the 2 November 1982 union meeting.

(b) Remove from its files any references to the unlawful disciplinary action and notify Evans in writing that it has done so and that it will not use the disciplinary action against him in any way.

(c) Post at its meeting halls, offices, suboffices, and hiring halls throughout its jurisdiction copies

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

We disavow the judge's statement that there is evidence to support allegations of discrimination against Evans and corrupt handling of the referral system by President-Business Manager Shaw and his appointed subordinates. These matters were neither charged nor fully litigated.

[2] We agree with the judge that the Respondent's pattern of harassment of Evans included Shaw's internal union charge against Evans, the 2 November 1982 trial and fine, and the 7 June 1983 letter to Wisconsin's Department of Industry, Labor and Human Relations (DILHR) reporting Evans' alleged refusal to accept a job referral. We find that the Respondent harassed Evans because of his publication of the Ethical Engineer. Accordingly, we find it unnecessary to decide whether the harassment was also in retaliation for Evans' other dissident activities. We modify the judge's conclusions of law, recommended Order, and notice to accord with our finding.

The Respondent contends that its discipline of Evans did not violate the Act because the Respondent's International executive board sustained Evans' appeal and reversed the conviction and fine. In support, the Respondent cites Transport Workers Local 100 (Liberty Coaches), 230 NLRB 526 (1977), enfd. sub nom. Simms v. NLRB, 99 LRRM 2633, 83 LC ¶ 10,301 (2d Cir. 1977). We find Liberty Coaches distinguishable. That case involved an isolated union charge against a member, while Shaw's charge was part of a pattern of harassment of Evans that continued even after the International sustained his appeal. Additionally, in Liberty Coaches the union's disciplinary action did not adversely affect the charging party, while Evans suffered the expense of traveling to the International's Washington, D.C. headquarters to appeal the verdict. See Teamsters Local 162 (American Steel), 255 NLRB 1230, 1234 (1981); Sachs Electric Co., 248 NLRB 669, 677 (1980), enfd. as modified sub nom. NLRB v. Electrical Workers IBEW Local 453, 668 F.2d 991 (8th Cir. 1982).

We shall not require the Respondent to mail a copy of the attached notice to each of its more than 5000 members, but shall order the Respondent to publish a copy of the notice in its newsletter. This remedy will adequately inform the Respondent's members of the violation. See Peninsula Shipbuilders Assn. (Newport News Shipbuilding), 239 NLRB 831, 835 (1978).

The judge recommended ordering the Respondent to inform DILHR that its 7 June 1983 letter was in error because Evans did not refuse a job offer. We shall instead require the Respondent to send DILHR a copy of our decision, thus fully informing it of our findings and conclusions, and leave to the state agency's expertise whether Evans refused a job offer.

Member Dennis would not require the Respondent to reimburse Evans for lost unemployment benefits if, with knowledge of the circumstances surrounding his alleged referral refusal, DILHR determines it properly cut him off; if Evans did not qualify for benefits, reimbursement would be a windfall. Conversely, if DILHR improperly cut him off as a result of the Respondent's 7 June 1983 letter, Member Dennis would order the Respondent to make him whole if DILHR has not done so. She finds that this matter can best be resolved at the compliance stage of this proceeding.

The judge inadvertently stated that the Respondent sent the letter to DILHR 6 June 1982 rather than 7 June 1983.

We shall modify the judge's recommended Order to require the Respondent to expunge from its files any reference to its disciplinary charge and fine against Evans and to notify him in writing that it has done so and that the disciplinary action will not be used against him. See Sterling Sugars, 261 NLRB 472 (1982).

of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[3] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 30, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to members are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Publish, at its expense, the attached notice in any newsletter or newspaper it prepares and distributes to its members.

(e) Mail a copy of this Decision and Order to the State of Wisconsin's Department of Industry, Labor and Human Relations.

(f) Make Evans whole for any unemployment benefits lost as a result of its 7 June 1983 letter to DILHR.

(g) Provide Evans with a current list of the names, addresses, and telephone numbers of the 50 individuals above him and the 50 individuals below him on each of its four districts' hiring hall referral lists.

(h) Sign and return to the Regional Director sufficient copies of the notice for posting by Wisconsin Chapter, Associated General Contractors of America, Inc., if willing, at all places where notices to employees are customarily posted.

(i) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES AND MEMBERS
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT arbitrarily refuse to honor requests for information made by employees on the out-of-work register who have a reasonable need for information pertaining to the exclusive referral system we operate.

WE WILL NOT charge, try, and fine members and report them to state agencies because they engage in Section 7 activity.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL make William J. Evans whole for all costs incurred in appealing the fine we imposed against him at a 2 November 1982 union meeting.

WE WILL remove from our files any references to the unlawful disciplinary action and notify Evans in writing that we have done so and that we will not use the disciplinary action against him in any way.

WE WILL make Evans whole for any unemployment compensation benefits lost as a result of our 7 June 1983 letter to the State of Wisconsin's Department of Industry, Labor and Human Relations.

LOCAL 139, INTERNATIONAL UNION OF OPERATING ENGINEERS, AFL–CIO

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

GEORGE NORMAN, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, on June 8, 9, and 10 and on July 19, 1983. The original charge was filed on January 13, 1983, and an amended charge was filed on February 10, 1983, by William J. Evans, an individual, against Local 139, International Union of Operating Engineers, AFL–CIO (the Union). The complaint and notice of hearing based on the charge, was issued by the Regional Director for Region 30 on February 28, 1983, and on May 31, 1983, the Regional Director issued an amended complaint. The complaint, as amended, alleges that the Union has violated the National Labor Relations Act by engaging in a campaign of harassment against a member, Bill Evans, the Charging Party herein, to retaliate for Evans' "Section 7" activities. The complaint also alleges that the Union, in violation of the Act, is discriminatorily denying Evans' referral from the Union's hiring hall and has denied Evans' request for information from the referral list to investigate his claim of discrimination. The Union has denied and continues to deny Evans access to information which would permit him to check on the operation of the referral system.

Issues

The issues are:

1. Whether the Union acted unlawfully to restrain or coerce Evans in the exercise of his Section 7 rights?

2. Whether the Union's retaliatory actions and its refusal to provide hiring hall information violates Section 8(b)(1)(a) of the Act?

3. What constitutes an appropriate remedy if violations have indeed occurred?

Findings of Fact

I. BUSINESS OF THE EMPLOYERS

Wisconsin Chapter, Associated General Contractors of America, Inc. (AGC) is an organization of employers engaged in the construction of buildings within the State of Wisconsin. Associated Public Works Contractors of Greater Milwaukee, Inc. (Public Works) is an organization of employers engaged in water and sewer construction within the State of Wisconsin. Wisconsin Road Builders Association (Road Builders) is an organization consisting of employers engaged in the construction of highways and bridges within the State of Wisconsin. Distribution Contractors Association (Distribution) is an organization of employers engaged in the construction of underground pipeline within the State of Wisconsin.

During the past calendar year, which is a representative period, a number of member-employers of AGC, Public Works, Road Builders, and Distribution, purchased goods and material valued in excess of $50,000 directly from suppliers located outside the State of Wisconsin. AGC, Public Works, Road Builders, and Distribution have been and are now employers as defined in Section 2(2) of the Act, engaged in commerce or in an industry affecting commerce as defined in Sections 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION

The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

The Union is a large construction union with its main office in Milwaukee, Wisconsin. The Union has geographical jurisdiction over the entire State of Wisconsin and, at the time of hearing, had over 5000 members. Besides Milwaukee, it has three additional district offices in Madison, EauClaire, and Appleton, and eight subdistrict offices throughout the State. The Union holds monthly meetings at each of its offices except during the months of January, April, July, and October, when it holds a statewide general membership meeting.

The Union is administered by President Business Manager Donald W. Shaw Sr. and by an elected executive board. Election for those and other union offices are held every 3 years. In addition to its 3-year officer elections, the Union hold a separate election every 4 years to name delegates to the International Convention. The most recent of these occurred in 1980.

President and Business Manager Shaw is responsible for the day-to-day administration of the local union, and has authority to hire all employees, appoint committees, and approve administrative expenditures. Shaw is also responsible for the administration of the Union's hiring hall. Shaw has held the position of business manager since September 1977, when he defeated his prdecessor, Joseph Goetz. He has held the combined president-business manager position since 1980, when the position was combined following the death of then-President Hiram Calkins. The Union employs, in addition to Shaw, several dispatchers and approximately 15 business agents, none of whom is elected, and all of whom serve at the pleasure of the president-business manager.

William J. Evans has been a member of the Union since 1964. He was hired by the Union in 1976 to serve as a business agent in the Madison District Office by then-business manager Joseph Goetz. Evans was employed as a business agent until Goetz' defeat in 1977, but was hired immediately by Shaw when Shaw began his administration.[1] Evans was assigned to train dispatcher Robert Fiege in the operation of the referral system. Evans testified that Shaw "wanted me to instruct the new referral officer, a dispatcher in the Milwaukee area, Robert Fiege, on proper conduct of referrals. It became apparent to me that Mr. Fiege was making improper referrals, and I discussed it with Don Shaw, he stated that at the time, that he had some political debts to pay, and he was going to refer men the way he felt. So I immediately quit, I wanted no part of it."

Starting September 1977, Evans and fellow member Russell Retzack policed the Shaw administration and, in November 1977, Evans started publishing a dissident newspaper The Ethical Engineer, to expose what he believed to be improper activities by Shaw and his fellow candidates during the 1977 campaign and the years that followed. Publication and distribution of The Ethical Engineer occurred at irregular intervals and was at Evans' own expense. The mailing list has grown to over 1500 union members. The following is a sampling of the topics discussed in The Ethical Engineer:

(1) New referral rules proposed by Shaw and the possibility that they are illegal under the Act.

(2) Alleged use by Shaw of the new rules to obtain jobs for his family and friends.

(3) Investigation of union officers by State of Wisconsin for alleged misuse of unemployment compensation during election campaign.

(4) Internal union charges filed against Evans.

(5) Administrative dues proposed by Shaw administration and their claimed violation of local bylaws.

(6) Local Union's negotiation of vacation fund made up of deductions from employees' paychecks deposited in a bank without interest, and possible abuses of such fund.

[1] Shaw denied that he hired Evans. Shaw's testimony was in direct contradiction to a prior deposition in which he stated with respect to Evans, "He was hired the following day, the same as the other people that I hired. He wasn't for the full term." (G.C. Exh. 33.)

(7) Shaw's previous discharge as business representative after member allegedly accused him of requiring grievance kickbacks.

(8) Claimed inadequacies in contracts negotiated by Shaw administration.

(9) Union threat to fine and expel Evans for publication of The Ethical Engineer.

(10) Dues increase proposed by Shaw.

(11) Union expenditures and salaries of local union officials.

(12) State of Wisconsin proposal to cut wages of highway construction employees.

(13) Evans' own candidacy for union office.

(14) Local union proposal to combine offices of president and business manager.

(15) Evans' protest of the 1980 delegate election.

(16) Alleged threats by Local union business agent to state official.

(17) Indictments of three union members, including Shaw's son and a former business agent; Shaw's own alleged advocacy of violence.

(18) Alleged shoplifting conviction of business agent.

(19) U.S. Department of Labor's audit of Local 139.

Evans urged that each recipient pass his copy along to other union members.

B. Allegations of Unemployment Compensation Abuse

In November 1977, Evans reported to the State of Wisconsin's Department of Industry, Labor and Human Relations (DILHR) that Shaw and other officers during the 1977 campaign, preceding their election in September 1977 registered for the Union's hiring hall but consistently refused to be referred when jobs were offered, instead, claiming unemployment compensation benefits. They used the referral system to determine the location of employees and the unemployment compensation system to finance their campaign activities during the daytime hours. Evans believed that the unemployment compensation benefits gave an unfair advantage to the challenging candidates because many of the incumbents were employed full time and did not have the time and funds to finance a full-time statewide campaign with daytime visits to union members' jobsites. Because of his belief that the alleged unemployment abuse affected the results of the election, Evans included that claim in the election protest he filed with the U.S. Department of Labor.

DILHR, in response to Evans' charge, subpoenaed referral records from the Union during its investigation. It also subpoenaed Evans and others to testify in March and May 1978. First the Union resisted production of documents but eventually produced the referral records at the May 1978 hearing. The DILHR investigation was closed in February 1979 finding that no fraudulent abuse had occurred, but that a loophole existed in the State's treatment of unemployment compensation beneficiaries who are registered at union hiring halls. Evans went to the State's Legislative Oversight Committee about the matter and, as a result, the committee continued to monitor DILHR's administration of unemployment compensation benefits for hiring hall registrants. In early 1982, at the urging of the legislative committee, DILHR reexamined its 1978 investigation of Shaw and other dissident candidates and concluded that the investigation had been terminated prematurely.

C. Election Protest

Evans has filed protests with the Union and with the U.S. Department of Labor concerning the 1977 and 1980 local officers' election and the 1980 election for delegates to the International convention.

In connection with Evans' 1980 protest of delegate elections, before 1980, when the president and business manager positions were separate offices, the Union sent seven delegates to the International convention. Of the seven, two, the president and business manager, were delegates by virtue of their offices and the remaining five were elected (two from the Milwaukee district and one from each of the other three districts). Evans claimed that following the merger of the offices of president and business manager, there should have been six proper delegates—the five elected delegates and Shaw. Evans learned from reading the convention minutes that seven delegates had attended on the local's behalf, including the six proper delegates and the seventh being one who was not even a candidate for the delegate position, Robert Bednarz. Evans also learned from reading the minutes that Bednarz was appointed to the adjustments committee by the International president after the convention began, and that Bednarz acted as a delegate, without having been elected delegate, seconding some nominations.

Evans had heard that Bednarz had been appointed to a committee before the convention but it was his understanding on reading the International constitution that only four committees could be appointed before the beginning of the convention—not including the adjustments committee to which Bednarz was appointed. The issue is particularly sensitive to Evans because he ran against Bednarz in the spring of 1980 for the position of financial secretary of the Union and had received the highest number of votes among the losing delegate candidates.

The Department of Labor investigators initially informed Evans that Bednarz was a legal delegate but on Evans' persistence they found that although Bednarz was a proper committee member his service as delegate was improper and was a violation of law because he was not elected as required by law. The Department of Labor further found that Bednarz' actions as delegate, however improper, did not effect the results of the elections for International union officers, and were thus not covered by the Labor Management Reporting and Disclosure Act provisions on internal union elections. Thus, the Department of Labor closed its case, not because Evans was wrong but because the impropriety of which Evans had complained did not bias the election of the International officers.

Finally, Evans protested the local officer's election of 1980. Evans was a candidate for financial secretary against Bednarz in that election and he alleged that the election had been improperly influenced by, among other things Bednarz' improper attendance at the International convention; an internal charge against him; a threat to expel him; the violence and threats to Retzack and other candidates; a business agent's participation in the meetings of the election committee; and Retzack's exclusion from these meetings. The Department of Labor found "certain violations" but concluded that the violations did not effect the election results. LMSA Director Hunsucker stated that although there had been violence and threats of violence to some candidates none dropped out of the race as a result.

D. Grand Jury Testimony

In December 1979, at a union meeting in Milwaukee, Evans' ally and fellow union member Russell Retzack was physically beaten and in early 1980 two cars were fire bombed while parked adjacent to Retzack's house. Both Retzack and Evans testified before a grand jury concerning those incidents. Evans was also asked about the bombing of an employer's crane. The grand jury indicted Charles Sneed, ex-business representative of the Union, Shaw's son, and a third individual for bombing the crane. Evans' testimony was publicized in the press. In that connection Shaw later stated, "My son went to jail because some fink ratted on him." Shaw also told Retzack in January 1983, as testified by Retzack, "He said it was a shame that we told such wild tales to the grand jury."

Since late 1980 Evans protested Bednarz' trip to the International convention in Hawaii and requested that the Department of Labor conduct a financial audit of Local 139 and provide him with the figures on cost of the Bednarz' trip. The audit has been initiated and in connection with it Evans has had numerous conversations with representatives of the Department of Labor, up to the time of the hearing herein.

E. The NLRB Charges

Evans filed three NLRB charges since 1977. The first, in 1978, alleged discriminatory hiring hall fees and rules. The charge was withdrawn after Evans was informed by the Region that the charge had no merit. The second charge was filed by Evans in late 1982 in which he claimed that the Union had discriminatorily refused to refer him. Evans filed that charge after he had failed to receive a referral from the Union for over 2 years and had been informed by two individuals that the Union was deliberately refusing to refer him. Evans' second charge was dismissed for insufficient evidence.

In addition to filing the two charges discussed above, Evans wrote a letter to the Region in mid-1978 to determine whether the Union could refuse to grant name requests for nonmembers' names on its hiring hall list, while granting such requests for members' names. Evans believed that the practice of granting name requests for union members only was discriminatory. The Region responded to Evans' request for information stating that members and nonmembers must be treated equally. Evans made 200 copies of the Region's response to pass out at union meetings and publicized the response in his publication, Ethical Engineer.

F. The Union's Retaliation for Evans' Activities

In December 1977 member Ed Guthman filed a charge against Evans claiming that he had "published the paper creating dissension among the membership" in violation of article IX, sections 2(c) and 3(h) and (k) of the local bylaws. Guthman, who is now a business agent for the Union, had been chairman of the election committee during the 1977 campaign, and filed the charges against Evans because of Evans' first issue of the Ethical Engineer in protest of the conduct of the 1977 election. Business Representative Lewis Yuker agreed to speak on behalf of Guthman on his charge before the executive committee. David Waite, also a business representative and, according to Guthman, the "overseer" of the election committee, was also present at the pretrial hearing held on Guthman's charge before the executive board. Retzack defended Evans at that hearing. The executive committee meeting on Guthman's charge occurred in March 1978; however, no action was taken to dismiss the charge until July 1979 when the executive board, on Don Shaw's motion, unanimously voted to dismiss the charge.

G. The Executive Board's 1979 Order

In June 1979, without notice to Evans, the Union's executive committee voted to order Evans to cease publishing inflammatory material about any officers, executive board members or other members of the Union and to cease furnishing information about the Union's business, its members, or any Wisconsin building tradesmen to "outside interests." The letter informing Evans of the executive committee order also states that the executive board will expel him if he failed to comply with the Order. The letter was read to all members as part of the executive board minutes at the general membership meeting held in July 1979.

H. The Smeaton Charge

In January 1982, member William Smeaton filed a charge against Evans alleging that Evans' communications with state legislators about unemployment compensation abuse were undercutting the Union's efforts to improve unemployment benefits. Smeaton testified that, in October 1981, Don Shaw appointed him, then a business representative, and another member to a committee to help improve unemployment compensation benefits. The committee had been working with State Senator Burger on possible improvements. Burger's support vanished in December 1981, about the time Smeaton read newspaper accounts of Evans' report to Burger of union members' abuse of the hiring hall system while receiving unemployment compensation benefits. On the basis of the news accounts of Evans' reports, Smeaton decided to file the charge.

Without notice to Evans, the union executive board sent the Smeaton charge to trial before the membership. The trial was conducted, without Evans, by President-Business Manager Shaw. Evans was found guilty as charged and was notified that he had been fined $250 and expelled from membership. The finding of guilt and fine were publicized in the Union's Local 139 News. Evans appealed the finding and the penalty was stayed pending appeal. Shaw and Business Representative Richard Mahal appeared before the general executive board of the International union in opposition to Evans' appeal and presented the entire "ding-a-ling file."[2] Evans' appeal was granted and the penalty overturned on September 1, 1982.[3]

I. The Shaw Charge

Before Evans' appeal had been granted on the Smeaton charge, Shaw filed his own charges against Evans on August 27, 1982, alleging that he was creating dissension among the members, destroying the interest and harmony of the local union and willfully slandering officers of the organization. Shaw testified that he filed the charges because of statements made in two issues of the Ethical Engineer. However, Evans testified that one of the issues was mailed after the charge was filed by Shaw.[4]

Shortly before Shaw filed his charges against Evans, Shaw's son and a former Local 139 business agent, as discussed above, had been indicted for bombing an employer's crane following a grand jury investigation in which both Evans and Retzack testified. Curiously, the pleading date for Evans on Shaw's charges was set for September 13, 1982, the date set for the criminal trial of Shaw, Jr. and Charles Sneed on the indictments. Evans' trial before the membership, on the Shaw charges, was set for November 2, 1982, the day before Shaw's appeal hearing on Evans' allegations of unemployment compensation abuse. It is obvious that the timing of these events is more than mere coincidence.

Evans and Retzack as Evans' representative were present for the November 2, 1982 trial of Evans on the Shaw charges. Shaw told the members that Evans had filed complaints with DILHR, the Department of Labor, the NLRB, FBI, and the Federal grand jury and that the Union had spent thousands of dollars defending those actions. Shaw produced the "ding-a-ling file" consisting of six green notebooks which Shaw claimed, among other things, contained all the documents filed concerning the actions. Shaw told the members that the International union had made it clear that he could not fine or expel Evans for his activities. Another way had to be found. Shaw suggested a "token reimbursement" by Evans to the Union of $5000, with $3000 being set aside if Evans attended the next 12 district meetings. Despite Evans' and Retzack's defense, the membership found Evans guilty and imposed the penalty requested by Shaw. At the end of the meeting, Shaw told the members that his son was in jail because someone had "ratted on him." The finding and penalty against Evans were published in the Local 139 News.

Evans appealed and the penalty against him was stayed and the conviction and penalty were eventually reversed by the International union. In connection with the appeal, Evans traveled to Washington, D.C. at his own expense.

J. The Respondent Reports Evans to DILHR

On June 6, 1983, 2 days before the hearing in the instant case was scheduled to begin, Evans received, for the first time in 3 years, a referral from the Respondent. Evans told the dispatcher that he would be unable to begin the job as requested on Wednesday, June 8, because of the scheduled NLRB hearing, but that he would be available on Thursday as he anticipated the hearing would be concluded by then. The dispatcher told Evans that he would give him the job for Thursday, if no one else could be found to start on Wednesday. The dispatcher also told Evans that 45 people had already turned down the job. The following evening at a union meeting, the dispatcher told Evans that he had filled the job.

On the day after the original conversation between Evans and the dispatcher, the dispatcher (Morris) sent a letter to the state agency (DILHR) alleging that Evans had refused the job offer. As a result of the letter, Evans' unemployment compensation benefits were immediately cut off and have not been reinstated as of the close of the hearing in this case.

President Don Shaw testified that he has never known an incident where referral information was reported to DILHR in the absence of a subpoena or court order. In that connection it has been Respondent's consistent position that its referral records are confidential documents which are not available for inspection by any member or any governmental agency, absent a court order requiring production thereof. I find Morris' letter to the DILHR to be a deviation from the Union's normal procedure and was for the sole purpose of harassing Bill Evans. I also find that the Respondent's referral system constitutes an exclusive hiring hall.

It should be noted that Evans' actions including the publication of the Ethical Engineer, considering the substantial assistance and cooperation from Retzack and the testimony both gave before the grand jury and Justice Department officials constitute concerted activity and, as such, protected by Section 7 of the Act. In that connection I agree with the General Counsel that even if Evans had taken the action alone, it would have been protected under the language of Scofield v. NLRB, 394 U.S. 423 (1969), and Carpenters Local 22 (Graziano Construction), 195 NLRB 1 (1972). I find that the Union's conduct, by its August 1982 charge against Evans and the June 6, 1982 unemployment compensation letter, constitutes restraint and coercion of Evans' protected activities, not privileged by the 8(b)(1)(A) proviso, and therefore is a violation of that section of the Act. Evans had a right to protest Shaw's election activities inasmuch as he believed them to violate the state unemployment compensation law. Moreover, his publication of the Ethical Engineer newsletter falls within his Section 7 right to question the wisdom of his representatives or to take steps to align his union with his own position. East Texas Motor Freight, 262 NLRB 868 (1982).

[2] The "ding-a-ling file" consisted of six green notebooks assembled by the Union concerning Evans which included his publications, information concerning his contacts with governmental agencies, charges, etc.

[3] Smeaton's charge was remanded to the local union for consideration as to retrial but has not been acted on to date.

K. The Respondent's Position

Respondent attempts to portray Evans as a malcontent and somewhat of a crackpot. It collected and preserved copies of documents concerning Evans' various activities, and referred to it as the "ding-a-ling" file. It tries to portray Evans as harassing the Union and union oficials instead of the other way around. It claims that just because most of the charges brought against Evans were overturned on appeal and inasmuch as Evans has not paid any fines or otherwise been punished that Respondent should somehow be absolved of its illegal conduct.

Respondent also makes the incredible argument that Evans made no efforts on his own to contact union members directly for the information Evans requested in order to check on the operation of the referral system and therefore does not deserve the requested information. It is patently ridiculous to suggest that Evans could contact everyone who was on the referral list when he does not know and cannot know who is on the list. To suggest that Evans contact 5000 members throughout the State to find out who is on the list is equally absurd. Even if he were able to contact all the members, they would not know where they stand (order) in relation to others because the Union denies that information to all. Thus, it would be impossible for Evans to find out who is before him and who was after him on the list.

Respondent also contends that Evans has a mailing list containing the names and addresses of 1500 union members. So what! Again, those members are as ignorant as Evans as to who is above or below on the list. Respondent also makes the specious argument that Evans should have sent out questionnaires, as he has done in other matters with respect to the operations of the referral system. Again, in the circumstances, such an effort would be futile. What would he find out?

In response to Evans' request, the Union sent a letter to all individuals on the referral hall list. The letter advised the individuals of Evans' request and asked them to advise the Local whether they would authorize release of his name, address, and telephone number to Evans. It made no mention of Respondent's willingness to reveal the individual's standing on the list with respect to other members because Respondent is not willing to do that. Again, the information is worthless. The Union's action was a sham.

There is no legitimate reason for the Union to withhold from the membership, information concerning the referral list. I see no possibility of harm to the Union or to the employees. On the contrary, to withhold such information permits the union officers to discriminate and play favorites and deprives a member or nonmember of his right to know whether the referral list is being operated properly and fairly. The use of the "secret" list to reward supporters of the officers of the Union to the detriment of others is not just conjecture. The evidence reveals that very conduct. There is much evidence in this case to support the allegations of discrimination against Evans and the corrupt handling of the referral system by President-Business Manager Shaw and his appointed subordinates.

With respect to Evans being referred to a job on June 6, the Respondent claims that Evans declined the offer and the job service was so informed by Morris, a dispatcher. Respondent contends, "There was no legal action filed by the Union," and further that there was no showing that accommodations could not have been made by the employer or by the parties at the hearing with respect to this work assignment and to coordinate this work assignment. That contention does not square with the credible testimony that Evans was prepared to do just that and does not answer why, after years of being on the list, Evans, on the eve of the NLRB hearing, is referred to a job. Nor does it explain why on its own the Union revealed to the state unemployment compensation agency, information concerning such referral when such action was contrary to the policies and past practice of the Union. Shaw insisted that it was only revealed when subpoenaed (or on court order).

I find Respondent's actions to be part of the pattern of harassment by Respondent against Evans.

With respect to Evans' publication, Ethical Engineer, Respondent contends that the members voted to discipline a member for publishing false and defamatory material and that, inasmuch as the discipline was reversed on appeal, no violation of the Act occurred. Respondent says that Evans accused Shaw of being a thief, stealing union money, and getting payoffs; that none of these accusations of illegal conduct has ever been substantiated by Evans and "They are obviously liable per se." "Liable per se!" I find no evidence in the record that any liable action has been instituted against Evans for his "liable per se." The only evidence in the record is that the Respondent's officers attempted to discipline Evans for publishing the so-called false and defamatory material and that they were reversed on appeal. Respondent makes other arguments that do not even merit discussion.

L. Conclusions

Each of Evans' activities discussed herein is protected under Section 7 of the Act, including his opposition to Shaw's electioneering tactics and his complaints to the United States Department of Labor. Evans' publication of the Ethical Engineer newsletter is within his Section 7 rights to question his representatives and to persuade the Union to adopt his position.

As previously discussed, Respondent operates a referral system service or "hiring hall" out of its four district offices. Employers under union contract are required to hire their employees through the hiring hall and may hire "off the street" only if the Union is unable to provide qualified employees within 48 hours. I find that arrangement to be an "exclusive" hiring hall. The referral provisions in the Union contract state:

> ARTICLE XI
> Section 11.1. When the Contractor needs additional Journeymen or Apprentices for work within the jurisdiction of Operating Engineers, Local No. 139, he shall give the Union first opportunity to dispatch such help, informing the Union of the location, nature and extent of the job, and shall allow forty-eight (48) hours for referral of prospective employees.

Section 11.2. A Contractor's request for an individual operator by name will be honored, provided the operator requested is presently on the out-of-work list five (5) days, or is employed regularly on a season-to-season basis by the requesting Contractor.

Section 11.3. In the event the Contractor is notified that such help is not available, or in the event the employees called for do not appear for work at the time designated by the Contractor, the Contractor may hire from any other available source.

Section 11.4. Any employee who is hired in violation of this Article shall be discharged by the Contractor when the violation has been brought to his attention in writing by the Business Representative.

Section 11.5. The Contractor shall have the right to employ or not to employ any applicant referred by the Union.

Section 11.6. EMERGENCY EMPLOYMENT: In the event an employee fails to report for work, becomes sick during the course of the day, or for some other reason disrupts the Contractor's work routine by not working, the Contractor shall immediately contact the Union Office to obtain a qualified replacement. While the Contractor is waiting for the replacement to arrive, he shall have the right to place a qualified man on the equipment in order to keep the other tradesmen working.

Evans and Shaw testified that the Union operates an exclusive hall, and the employers are obligated to hire through the hall. Shaw also testified that in Local 139 contracts which do require employers to hire through the hall, the Union may grieve an "off the street" hiring, obtain backpay for the person at the top of the referral list, and perhaps even have the person discharged who is hired off the street. Shaw further testified that, although there are contracts through the exclusive referral provisions, it is "not in all contracts." However, he could recall no contracts without exclusive referral provisions and none were produced by the Union. As previously stated I find the Union operated an exclusive hiring hall within the meaning of Teamsters Local 357 v. NLRB, 365 U.S. 667 (1961), and Laborers Local 889 (Anthony Ferrante & Sons, Inc.), 251 NLRB 1579 (1980).[5]

Respondent's duty of fair representation requires supplying Evans with job referral information. It is inherent in a union's duty of fair representation to deal fairly with an employee's request for information as to his relative position on the out-of-work register for purposes of job referral through an exclusive hiring hall. Evans' request of Respondent for the 50 names, addresses, and telephone numbers of individuals above and below his name on the four out-of-work registers is a reasonable request that clearly involves a matter affecting his employment.

Evans has been completely dependent on Respondent for the protection of his referral rights. Respondent's refusal to give Evans the requested information deprives Evans of the only means whereby he could fully ascertain whether or not his referral rights were being protected. In spite of Respondent's protestations, Evans had no other means at his disposal. Respondent's refusal to supply the job referral information under the guise that it had a duty to preserve the anonymity or privacy of its members is totally lacking in merit. The members are part of the Union in which all have a common cause. It is not as though the information were being released to the public or to some other interest that might be inimical to the members. Here, we have a fraternity of individuals, many of whom are in the same boat. The interest of a member to make sure that his rights are being protected far outweigh any right of privacy considerations which may exist between members. I therefore reject the maintenance of privacy argument and conclude that Respondent unjustifiably refused to furnish Evans job referral information in violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act. Operating Engineers Local 324 (AGC of Michigan), 226 NLRB 587 (1976).

IV. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES UPON COMMERCE

The activities of Respondent as set forth above have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States, and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce.

V. THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act, I shall recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and to take affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act. I shall recommend that Respondent be ordered to cease interfering with the Charging Party's Section 7 rights by harassing him and bringing charges against him which impair his rights guaranteed by Federal labor laws. I shall also recommend that Respondent be ordered to refrain from arbitrarily denying referral information to registrants. I shall also recommend that Respondent be ordered to post and mail appropriate notices to all its members because of the wide geographical spread of Respondent's jurisdiction and the extensive publicity already mailed to members concerning the Charging Party and this case. I shall also recommend that Respondent be ordered to notify Wisconsin DILHR that the Union's June 1983 letter concerning Charging Party Evans was an error; that Evans did not refuse a job offer; and to reimburse Evans for any unemployment compensation benefits lost as a result of that letter.

[5] The exclusivity of the hiring hall herein is not affected by the fact that in sec. 11.2 of the contract quoted above, the contractor's request for an individual operator whom he names will be honored because it is conditioned on the operator requested must, at the time, be on the out-of-work list for 5 days or is employed regularly on a season-to-season basis by the requesting contractor See Plasterers Local 299 (Wyoming Contractors), 257 NLRB 1386 (1981).

I shall also recommend that Respondent be ordered to produce for Charging Party Evans the names, addresses, and telephone numbers (in order) of the 50 employees above and below him on each of the 4 district referral lists, as of December 1982, so that Evans can determine whether the Union has been discriminating against him regarding referrals. Finally, I shall recommend that Respondent be ordered to make Evans whole for his costs incurred in appealing the Shaw charge.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. A number of member-employers of AGC, Public Works, Road Builders and Distribution are engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Respondent is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By refusing to supply William J. Evans the list of names, addresses, and telephone numbers of 50 employees above and 50 employees below his name in registers of 4 districts of Respondent's jurisdiction, Respondent breached its duty of fair representation and interfered with, restrained, and coerced Evans in the exercise of his rights under Section 7 of the Act, thereby violating Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.

4. By filing the internal union charges against Charging Party Evans on August 27, 1982, Respondent violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.

5. By fining Charging Party Evans to reimburse Respondent $5000 for legal costs incurred in defending itself against the activities engaged in by Charging Party, Respondent violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.

6. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) of the Act.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND DENNIS

On 27 May 1981 Administrative Law Judge Roger B. Holmes issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Charging Party filed a brief in opposition to the Respondent's exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order as modified and set forth in full below.

The Union represents a unit of full-time and regular part-time employees in the Respondent's chain of 15 restaurants. The record does not disclose whether the Union was certified by the Board or voluntarily recognized by the Respondent. However, the parties did enter into a series of collective-bargaining agreements, the most recent of which was effective by its terms from 1 June 1977 until 31 May 1980.[1] The contract required, inter alia, that the Respondent make contributions to a health and welfare trust fund and to a pension plan. The contract also granted union representatives reasonable access to the Respondent's facilities to conduct interviews with employees. On 29 May, during negotiations for a new contract, the parties agreed to extend the existing contract until 30 June.[2]

On 3 June employee Robbins gave the Respondent's vice president Berger[3] a petition indicating that the 180 signers (a majority of the unit employees) no longer wished to be represented by the Union.[4] On 6 June the Union received notice that the Respondent no longer recognized it as the employees' bargaining representative. After 6 June, but before the expiration of the contract on 30 June, the Respondent unilaterally instituted new health and welfare coverage and unilaterally ceased making the contractually required contributions to the existing health and welfare fund and pension plan. On 11 August the Respondent refused the Union's request for a list of employees. The judge also found that after 31 May the Respondent refused to grant union representatives access to the kitchen areas of its facilities.

The judge observed that the Union enjoyed a presumption of majority status during the term of the contract, and he concluded that because of the contract the Respondent was not free to withdraw recognition when it received the employee petition. The judge also found that the Respondent's unilateral conduct was unlawful, and he concluded that the Respondent was bound to continue to apply the contract after its expiration.[5] The judge issued a bargaining order and a make-whole remedy which extended beyond the expiration date of the contract. We shall modify the judge's findings for the reasons below.

It is well settled that absent unusual circumstances a union enjoys an irrebuttable presumption of majority status during the first year following its certification.[6] After the certification year the presumption of majority status becomes rebuttable.[7] Whether certified or voluntarily recognized,[8] a union also enjoys a rebuttable presumption of majority status upon the expiration of a collective-bargaining agreement.[9] An employer who refuses to bargain with an incumbent union may rebut the presumption of majority status by establishing either (1) that at the time of the refusal to bargain the union in fact did not enjoy majority status, or (2) that the refusal was predicated on a good-faith and reasonably grounded doubt, supported by objective considerations, of the union's majority status.[10] It is also established that within a reasonable time prior to the expiration date of a collective-bargaining agreement, an employer who establishes a good-faith doubt of a union's majority status may announce that it does not intend to negotiate a new agreement.[11] An employer who does so may then lawfully implement unilateral changes upon the expiration of the contract.[12]

[2] The Respondent has not excepted to the judge's finding that Castle, the individual who agreed to the extension, was authorized to negotiate on the Respondent's behalf.

[3] Berger was the vice president of Burger Pits, Inc., and the president of Self Serv Food Corp., Inc. It is admitted that the two entities constitute a single and joint employer.

[4] The judge found that the petition contains 198 signatures, but it in fact contains only 180.

[5] In view of the result we reach herein, we find it unnecessary to consider the judge's discussion of Bay Area Sealers, 251 NLRB 89 (1980).

[12] Bennington Iron Works, supra.

We find at the outset that the employee petition provided the Respondent with a sufficient basis for a good-faith, reasonable doubt of the Union's majority status.[13] There were 276 employees in the unit, and the petition expressly stated that the 180 signers no longer wished to be represented by the Union.[14] Employee Robbins solicited the signatures on his own initiative, and there is no evidence that the petition was tainted by unfair labor practices.[15]

The Respondent received the petition on 3 June, several weeks prior to the expiration of the 1-month extension of the collective-bargaining agreement. In accordance with the principles outlined above, we find that on 3 June the Respondent would have been privileged to announce an intention not to negotiate for a new collective-bargaining agreement. However, we find that while the contract was in effect the Respondent was not privileged to withdraw recognition from the Union or unilaterally to implement contractual changes. Rather, we conclude that it is consistent with our well-established rules, outlined above, to find that the Respondent was obligated to administer the collective-bargaining agreement until its expiration.

Consequently, we agree with the judge that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) when it withdrew recognition from the Union[16] and unilaterally implemented a new health and welfare fund, ceased making contractually required contributions to the existing health and welfare fund and pension plan, and refused to grant union representatives access to its kitchen areas.[17] Contrary to the judge, however, we shall not order the Respondent to recognize and bargain with the Union, and we shall not extend the make-whole remedy beyond the expiration date of the contract. In view of its reasonable, good-faith doubt of the Union's majority status, the Respondent would have been privileged to announce an intention not to bargain with the Union for a new contract, and it was only obligated to administer the old contract until its expiration date. In addition, the Respondent would have been privileged to withdraw recognition from the Union and implement unilateral changes upon the expiration of the contract on 30 June. The Respondent's misconduct consisted simply of taking those measures prematurely, and we therefore find it appropriate not to extend the remedy beyond the date when it lawfully could have taken those measures.[18]

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. The following employees of the Respondent constitute a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act:

> All full-time and regular part-time employees employed by Burger Pits, Inc. and Self Serv Food Corp., Inc., at their various facilities located within Santa Clara County, California, performing work set forth in the Wage and Classification Schedule contained in the collective-bargaining agreement between Burger Pits, Inc. and Self Serv Food Corp., Inc. and the Union effective during the period June 1, 1977, through June 30, 1980; excluding all other employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

4. The Union was the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the appropriate unit until 30 June 1980.

5. The Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by:

[13] In view of our finding with respect to the petition, we find it unnecessary to consider the other factors discussed by the judge.

[14] The Board has found that similar petitions constituted support for a good-faith, reasonable doubt of majority status. Master Slack Corp., supra; Industrial Waste Service, 268 NLRB 1180 (1984).

[15] The judge found that after 31 May the Respondent unlawfully refused to grant union representatives access to its kitchen areas. We note that this misconduct began prior to the submission of the petition on 3 June, and prior to employee Robbins' collection of the signatures between 1 and 3 June. However, we think it clear that this misconduct was unrelated to the massive disaffection with the Union which the petition reflects. We conclude that this unfair labor practice "was not of such a character as to either affect the Union's status, cause employee disaffection, or improperly affect the bargaining relationship itself." Colonial Manor Convalescent Center, 188 NLRB 861 (1971). See also Master Slack Corp., supra; Guerdon Industries, 218 NLRB 658, 661 (1975). We also emphasize that the Respondent's other unilateral changes occurred after it received the petition.

[16] Requiring an employer to administer a contract carries the inherent obligation to recognize, until the expiration date, the union with whom the contract is made. Consequently, we also find that the Respondent's withdrawal of recognition was unlawful. This result is not inconsistent with Bennington Iron Works, supra. In that case an employer with a reasonable doubt of majority status simply announced its refusal to negotiate a new contract. Although the Board characterized the refusal as a lawful "withdrawal of recognition," the employer did not expressly withdraw recognition and it did not implement unilateral changes until after the expiration of the contract.

[17] We shall dismiss the allegation that on 11 August the Respondent unlawfully refused to furnish the Union with the names of the employees in the unit. This conduct occurred well after the expiration of the contract.

[18] In joining his colleagues in finding that the remedy does not extend beyond the expiration of the contract, Member Zimmerman notes that there is evidence that the Union had actually lost its majority status before recognition was withdrawn.

(a) Withdrawing recognition from the Union about 3 June 1980, prior to the expiration of the collective-bargaining agreement.

(b) Refusing to administer the collective-bargaining agreement until its expiration on 30 June 1980.

(c) Unilaterally ceasing to make contractually required contributions to the health and welfare fund and the pension plan, while the collective-bargaining agreement was still in effect.

(d) Unilaterally implementing a new health and welfare fund, while the collective-bargaining agreement was still in effect.

(e) Unilaterally refusing to grant union representatives access to the kitchen areas of its facilities, while the collective-bargaining agreement was still in effect.

6. The unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, we shall order that it cease and desist from engaging in such conduct, and that it take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

We shall order that the Respondent make whole its employees for any losses they may have suffered as a result of the Respondent's unlawful unilateral changes. The make-whole order shall extend from the date that the unilateral changes were implemented until 30 June, the expiration date of the collective-bargaining agreement.

In this connection the Respondent has excepted to the judge's failure to provide for a comparison of the health and welfare fund of the Union and the Respondent, in order to determine whether the employees suffered any losses as a result of the Respondent's unilateral changes. We note that the judge provided for such a comparison in his discussion of the appropriate remedy, and we conclude that he inadvertently omitted the provision from his recommended Order. We have therefore modified his recommended Order accordingly.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Burger Pits, Inc., and Self Serv Food Corp., Inc., Santa Clara County, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Withdrawing recognition during the term of a collective-bargaining agreement from Hotel, Motel and Restaurant Employees and Bartenders Union, Local No. 19, Hotel and Restaurant Employees and Bartenders International Union, AFL–CIO as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the following appropriate unit.

> All full-time and regular part-time employees employed by Burger Pits, Inc. and Self Serv Food Corp., Inc., at their various facilities located within Santa Clara County, California, performing work set forth in the Wage and Classification Schedule contained in the collective-bargaining agreement between Burger Pits, Inc. and Self Serv Food Corp., Inc. and the Union effective during the period June 1, 1977, through June 30, 1980; excluding all other employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

(b) Refusing to administer, until the date of expiration, its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union.

(c) Unilaterally ceasing to make contractually required contributions to the health and welfare fund and the pension plan, while the collective-bargaining agreement was still in effect.

(d) Unilaterally implementing a new health and welfare fund, while the collective-bargaining agreement was still in effect.

(e) Unilaterally refusing to grant union representatives access to the kitchen areas of its facilities, while the collective-bargaining agreement was still in effect.

(f) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing its employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) After a comparison is made between its health and welfare fund and that of the Union to determine whether its employees suffered any loss, make whole the employees in the appropriate unit by transmitting the contributions owed to the Union's health and welfare fund and pension plan pursuant to the terms of its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union, and by reimbursing unit employees for any medical, dental, or any other expenses ensuing from the Respondent's failure to make such required contributions. This shall include reimbursing employees for any contributions they themselves may have made for the maintenance of the Union's health and welfare fund and pension plan after the Respondent unlawfully discontinued contributions to those funds; for any premiums they may have paid to third-party insurance companies to continue medical and dental coverage in the absence of the Respondent's required contributions to such funds; and for any medical or dental bills they have paid directly to health care providers that the contractual policies would have covered. All payments to employees shall be made with interest. The Respondent shall make its employees whole from the date on which it implemented unilateral changes in the health and welfare fund and pension plan, until the collective-bargaining agreement expired on 30 June 1980.[19]

(b) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(c) Post at all of its restaurants in Santa Clara County, California, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[20] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 32, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employes are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

[19] Because the provisions of employee benefit fund agreements are variable and complex, the Board does not provide at the adjudicatory stage of a proceeding for the addition of interest at a fixed rate on unlawfully withheld fund payments. Therefore, the interest owed with respect to the health and welfare fund and pension plan shall be determined in accordance with the procedure set forth in Merryweather Optical Co., 240 NLRB 1213, 1216 fn. 7 (1979). However, the interest owed with respect to the reimbursement of individual employees for their expenses and contributions shall be computed in the manner prescribed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977). See generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962). See also Kraft Plumbing & Heating, 252 NLRB 891 fn. 2 (1980).

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize

To form, join, or assist any union

To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To act together for other mutual aid or protection

To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT, during the term of our collective-bargaining agreement, withdraw recognition from Hotel, Motel and Restaurant Employees and Bartenders Union, Local No. 19, Hotel and Restaurant Employees and Bartenders International Union, AFL-CIO as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All full-time and regular part-time employees employed by Burger Pits, Inc. and Self Serv Food Corp., Inc., at their various facilities located within Santa Clara County, California, performing work set forth in the Wage and Classification Schedule contained in the collective-bargaining agreement between Burger Pits, Inc. and Self Serv Food Corp., Inc. and the Union effective during the period June 1, 1977 through June 30, 1980; excluding all other employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

WE WILL NOT refuse to administer, until the date of its expiration, our collective-bargaining agreement with the above Union.

WE WILL NOT unilaterally cease to make contractually required contributions to the health and welfare fund and the pension plan while the collective-bargaining agreement is in effect.

WE WILL NOT unilaterally implement a new health and welfare fund, while the collective-bargaining agreement is in effect.

WE WILL NOT unilaterally refuse to grant union representatives access to the kitchen areas of our restaurants, while the collective-bargaining agreement is in effect.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL make our employees whole for any losses they may have suffered as a result of our unfair labor practices in the manner required by the National Labor Relations Board.

BURGER PITS, INC., AND SELF SERV FOOD CORP., INC.

DECISION

ROGER B. HOLMES, Administrative Law Judge. Based on an unfair labor practice charge in Case 32–CA–2812 filed on June 16, 1980, by Hotel, Motel and Restaurant Employees and Bartenders Union, Local No. 19, Hotel and Restaurant Employees and Bartenders International Union, AFL–CIO and based on an unfair labor practice charge in Case 32–CA–3009 filed on August 25, 1980, by the Union, the General Counsel issued on September 30, 1980, a consolidated complaint alleging violations of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by Burger Pits, Inc., and Self Serv Food Corp., Inc. The General Counsel made two amendments to his consolidated complaint during the course of the trial proceedings. (Tr. 6–7 and 125–127.)

The trial was held on January 15, 1981, at Oakland, California. Posthearing briefs were due by February 19, 1981.

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE EMPLOYER AND THE UNION

The Board's jurisdiction is not in issue in this proceeding. At the times material herein, Burger Pits, Inc., and Self Serv Food Corp., Inc., have operated restaurants located in Santa Clara County and at other locations in California. Both corporations are affiliated business enterprises with common ownership, common officers, and directors, common officers and directors, common control and direction of operations, common control of labor relations policies, and shared equipment and facilities. It was admitted that the two corporations are an integrated enterprise, and/or a single employer, and/or a joint employer. The Respondent meets the Board's discretionary and statutory jurisdicitional standards for retail enterprises.

The status of the Union as a labor organization within the meaning of the Act was admitted.

II. THE WITNESSES

Four witnesses were called to testify at the trial in this proceeding. Two of those witnesses were identified with the interest of the Charging Party. They are Frank C. Marolda, who is the president and the business manager of the Union, and Steven L. Stemerman, who is an attorney in the law firm of Davis, Cowell & Bowe, which firm represents the Charging Party in this case. Two witnesses were identified as having interests with the Respondent. They are Albert A. Berger, who is president of Self Serv Food Corp., Inc., and vice president of Burger Pits, Inc., and Andrew Frank Castle, who is president of Triangle Consulting Company, and who has been representing employer associations and individual employers in labor relations matters since 1955.

The findings of fact to be made herein will be based on portions of the testimony of each one of the four witnesses. The findings will reflect the portions of their testimony, which in my view are accurate and reliable, after reviewing the entire record and considering the arguments made by the parties. The testimony of Marolda and Stemerman contradicts the testimony of Castle regarding the events which occurred on May 29, 1980, and which led to the signing of Respondent's Exhibit 3. After listening to all of the witnesses testify, and based on their demeanor on the witness stand, I credit the testimony of Marolda and Stemerman. The findings of fact to be set forth in section 5 will be based on their credited accounts.

The General Counsel points in his brief to several errors and inconsistencies in the testimony offered by Berger. Some of those matters were corrected by Berger during the course of his direct examination and cross-examination. There are some other matters which are difficullt to reconcile. For example, note Berger's testimony at transcript 25 regarding his conversation with Castle at a meeting of employers at a restaurant in March 1980. Contrast that version with Berger's subsequent testimony at transcript 69–70 and transcript 73–75 regarding Castle's alleged lack of bargaining authority. At transcript 25 Berger indicated that he said to Castle at the restaurant meeting, "I told him we'd go along with what he did in negotiating the contract for us." At transcript 28 Berger indicated uncertainty as to whether he had signed a written authorization to Castle. However, he finally testified, "I believe I did, I'm not sure, but I can't say for sure. But I'm pretty sure I did." Nevertheless, Berger subsequently asserted at transcript 69–70 and transcript 73–75 that Castle did not have any authority to negotiate for the Respondent in 1980 nor to sign any agreement for the Respondent. The former testimony, rather than the latter version, seems more accurate in view of Castle's actions to be described herein, and in view of the Respondent's past practice regarding its contracts with the Union. Accordingly, I shall credit the earlier version given in Berger's testimony. See the Board's decision in Krispy Kreme Doughnut Corp., 245 NLRB 1053 fn. 1 (1979).

In addition to basing the findings of fact upon portions of the witnesses' testimony, I shall also base certain findings of fact upon documentary evidence which was introduced by the parties at the trial.

III. THE COLLECTIVE-BARGAINING HISTORY BETWEEN THE RESPONDENT AND THE UNION

The Respondent's business was founded on March 13, 1953. From 1953 to 1977 the Respondent did not employ anyone outside of the Company to handle their labor relations matters. Instead, the practice was for the Respondent to accept the terms and conditions of the collective-bargaining agreement which the Union or its predecessor negotiated with the employer associations, and then the Respondent would negotiate separately with the Union for a wage agreement.

In 1977 the Respondent retained Andrew Frank Castle to negotiate a contract on the Respondent's behalf with the Union. Introduced into evidence as Charging Party's Exhibit 1 was a copy of a letter dated June 2, 1977, from Berger to Castle. In pertinent part it states, "This letter is your authorization to represent Self Serv Food Corporation and Burger Pits, Inc. in negotiations with Local 19. This further authorizes you to conclude a contract in our behalf."

The General Counsel's Exhibits 2(a) and 2(b) comprise the collective-bargaining agreement between the Respondent and the Union. The General Counsel's Exhibit 2(a) is the printed booklet form, which was negotiated with the employer association, and the General Counsel's Exhibit 2(b) is the one-page wage addendum which was agreed to between the Respondent and the Union. Section 2 of the General Counsel's Exhibit 2(a) pertains to "union membership and employment.". That section contains, among other things, a union-security clause. Section 10 of the General Counsel's Exhibit 2(a) pertains to "interviews" It provides:

> Sec. 10. INTERVIEWS: Duly authorized representatives of the Union shall be permitted to investigate the standing of all employees and investigate conditions to see that the Agreement is being enforced, provided that no interview shall be held during the rush hours, or unreasonably interrupt the duties of any employee. The employer shall be notified by the Union representative before he shall take action with the person involved. If the employer is absent the representative of the Union shall contact the person in charge of the shift and inform him of the circumstances. The employer and the Union representative shall conduct themselves in such a manner as to carry out the intent and spirit of this section.

Section 21 of the General Counsel's Exhibit 2(a) provides, among other things, for employer contributions on behalf of its employees to a health and welfare trust fund and to a pension plan. Section 32 of the contract contains the provisions relating to the effective dates of the agreement. It provides:

> Sec. 32. PERIOD OF AGREEMENT: This Agreement, including the attached wage scale and working conditions, shall be effect as of June 1, 1977. Said Agreement shall continue in full force and effective through May 31, 1980.
> It is further understood that either party may reopen this contract at least sixty (60) days prior to its expiration on May 31, 1980, and give notice of its desire to change, modify, or alter this Agreement. In the event no such notice is given prior to March 31, 1980, this contract shall be automatically extended from year to year beyond the expiration date set forth, said contract being this contract as it may be amended and as it is in effect with any such amendments on the 31st day of May, 1980.

The description of the appropriate collective-bargaining unit is set forth in paragraph 6 of the General Counsel's consolidated complaint. That paragraph was admitted in the pleadings. It provides:

> All full-time and regular part-time employees employed by Burger Pits, Inc. and Self Serv Food Corp., Inc., at their various facilities located within Santa Clara County, California, performing work set forth in the Wage and Classification Schedule contained in the collective-bargaining agreement between Burger Pits, Inc. and Self Serv Food Corp., Inc. and the union effective during the period June 1, 1977, through May 31, 1980; excluding all other employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

After the 1977 collective-bargaining agreement was concluded between the Respondent and the Union, the Respondent continued to retain Castle to handle its labor relations matters. Berger testified, "We gave him complete authority—any grievances or anything that came up, we called him on it." Castle continued to be retained by the Respondent at the time of the trial. His retainer was not in writing, but instead it was a verbal agreement. Berger had no contact with the Union with regard to the administration of the collective-bargaining agreement between 1977 and 1980. He said that Castle handled the Respondent's case involving an employee grievance and also the Respondent's interest in an alleged discrimination case.

On January 23, 1980, Ron Davis, the financial secretary-treasurer of the Union, wrote a letter to Castle and requested a complete list of the association members and addresses. (See G.C. Exh. 3(a).) In response to that request, the General Counsel's Exhibit 3(b) was furnished. Included among the numerous businesses on the General Counsel's Exhibit 3(b) was Berger's name and Self Serv Food Corp.'s name and address. There were also serveral meetings and telephone calls between Castle and Frank C. Marolda, the president and the business manager of the Union, regarding the upcoming contract negotiations. Marolda said that he spoke with Castle "numerous times" regarding the terms of a new contract and other matters.

In March 1980 Castle held a meeting at Roger's Restauraunt in Santa Clara with several employers. Berger was one of the employers who attended that meeting. Berger testified:

> Q. Did you talk to Mr. Castle at that meeting about the renewal or renegotiation of the Burger Pits contract?
> A. Yes, I did.
> Q. And what did you tell Mr. Castle?
> A. I told him we'd go along with the association on—I'm sorry, I told him we'd go along with what he did in negotiating the contract for us.
> Q. You told Mr. Castle that you would go along with letting him negotiate the contract for you?
> A. That's right, yes, sir.
> Q. Did you discuss the employer—employee sentiment within your stores regarding the Union with Mr. Castle?
> A. Yes, I did.
> Q. And what did you tell Mr. Castle?
> A. I told him that only about five stores out of the chain had ever been contacted within the last year or two by a union representative. And that if all my busboys had to join the Union, under the present terms, they would probably quit.
> Q. And what did Mr. Castle tell you if anything, in response?

A. He just said that I believe, he said that he'd negotiate the best contract he could.

Q. Did you express to Mr. Castle whether or not you had any doubts about majority support for the Union among your employees?

A. Yes, I did.

Q. And what did you express to him? In that regard?

A. I told him that inasmuch as only about 70 – about 30 percent of the people in our company were actually paying Union dues, that it was—that they just weren't in favor of the Union.

On March 18, 1980, Castle wrote a letter to Marolda on the letterhead of the "Restaurant & Hotel Owners Association." A copy of that letter was introduced into evidence as Respondent's Exhibit 2. In pertinent part it states, "This is to advise you that Burger Pits, because of their different contract, will not be represented by the Association, but will be represented by me personally." Castle stated at the trial that he wrote Respondent's Exhibit 2 in response to an inquiry by Marolda as to whether Castle would be representing the Respondent.

Some time in April, Castle sent Berger a paper requesting written authorization for Castle to represent the Respondent in the upcoming contract negotiations with the Union. As indicated on page 28 of the transcript, Berger revealed some uncertainty as to whether he had actually signed such an authorization. However, he testified with regard to that matter, "I believe I did, I'm not sure, but I can't say for sure. But I'm pretty sure I did." Berger did recall a telephone conversation between him and Castle in May 1980, and that Castle sent Berger a copy of the Union's contract demands. Castle said that he never received a written authorization from the Respondent in 1980. He said that his practice had been to submit to the Union a copy of all of the written authorizations which Castle had received from employers.

On April 22, 1980, the first meeting was held for negotiation of a new collective-bargaining agreement between the Union and the employer association. At that time Marolda discovered that the Union had not received a copy of a written authorization for Castle to represent Burger Pits. Marolda testified with regard to his inquiry of Castle, "I asked him where are the authorizations from Burger Pits. And he couldn't give me an answer."

With regard to whether either the Union or the Respondent gave notice to the other party to change, modify, or alter their collective-bargaining agreement as provided for in section 32 of the contract, Berger testified at transcript 11:

Q. Prior to May 31, 1980, did Local 19 give Respondent notice under section 32 of the collective bargaining agreement which we've just introduced into evidence?

A. No they didn't.

Q. Let me finish the question, that Local 19 wished to change, modify, or alter that agreement?

A. Not to the best of my knowledge.

Q. And did Respondent, that's you, give such notice to Local 19 that Respondent wished to change, modify, or alter that agreement under section 32 of the collective-bargaining agreement?

A. No, we didn't.

However, at transcript 46 and 47 Berger subsequently testified:

Q. Mr. Berger, you testified on your direct examination, or direct examination by Mr. Pernal, that you didn't give authorize—that you did not give notice to the Union of you intention to alter, amend or renew the contract. Did anybody give such notice to the Union on your behalf?

A. Yes, Mr. Castle did.

Q. Do you know when Mr. Castle did that?

A. I think that was in March sometime, I'm not sure, but I think it was in March. I know that Mr. Castle has a copy of the letter.

Berger acknowledged at transcript 62 that he made the following statement, among others, in his pretrial affidavit which he gave on July 17, 1980:

Burger Pits did not receive any notice from the Union that it wished to negotiate a new contract. Similarly Burger Pits did not send any letter to Local 19 requesting a meeting to negotiate a new contract. However, I did know that Local 19 was bargaining with the Santa Clara Hospitality Industry Inc. - The Association. Andy Castle is the executive secretary of the Association. Burger Pits had never been a member of the Association. It has only signed separate agreements with Local 19, that are in essence the Association's contract with a different wage scale.

The Respondent operates 15 restaurants and a commissary in Santa Clara County. The Respondent also has a restaurant in Santa Cruz County, but that restaurant is not within the geographical jurisdiction of the Union, and it is not part of the bargaining unit in this proceeding. On June 1, 1980, the Respondent had 276 employees in the bargaining unit.

IV. MATTERS PERTAINING TO UNION SUPPORT AMONG RESPONDENT'S EMPLOYEES DURING THE PERIOD PRIOR TO JUNE 1980

For "at least a year, or maybe two" Berger received reports at every Monday meeting with his supervisors that most of the Respondent's busboys and dishwashers would not join the union. In addition, Berger talked with some of the unit employees who told him that they had received warning notices about their union dues. Berger told those employees that they would have to pay the dues, or he would let them go.

Based on the information which Berger received from his supervisors, and based on Berger's having spoken with certain employees, Berger said that 10 of the Respondent's restaurants had not received a visit from a union agent in some cases for as long as 3 years. Berger said that at one location the Respondent had 16 unit employees, only 1 of whom was in the Union. At another location on Bascom Avenue, Berger said that the Respondent had 17 unit employees, only 2 of whom were in the Union.

Berger acknowledged that the Respondent had five restaurants where those employees "were very well organized." Those were the restaurants serviced by union agent Gerber.

V. THE EVENTS ON MAY 29, 1980

There had been a number of negotiating sessions between the Union and the Santa Clara County Hospitality, Inc., an employer association, prior to the final negotiating session on May 29, 1980. On that date the Union and the employer representatives met at the Le Baron Hotel in San Jose, California. The bargaining session began about 1 or 2 p.m., and it continued until about 11:30 p.m. when final initialing and signing of the documents had been concluded.

Present at that bargaining session for the Union were Attorney Stemerman, Union President and Business Manager Marolda, Union Financial Secretary-Treasurer Ron Davis, and Union Executive Vice President Vince Curce. Present for the employer association were Castle, his assistant Michael Gubner, and four or five employer representatives.

During the course of that bargaining session, the final details of a complete master agreement were agreed to by the parties to those negotiations. The agreement consisted of about 50 legal size pages, and it was typed double spaced. The Union and the employer representatives went through each paragraph of the agreement line by line to assure themselves that the document accurately reflected the agreements reached by those parties. Marolda and Castle initiated each paragraph as they proceeded through the document, and they signed the document at the conclusion of the agreement. Stemerman recalled that while the signing was taking place, Castle mentioned "that he had other concerns that he wanted to take care of before we left." Following the execution of the document, Marolda said that the following occurred:

> Q. Now after Mr. Castle and Mr. Gubner had gone through the initialled agreement, what then took place?
> A. Well after we initialled them, Mr. Castle and I sat down next to each other. And Mr. Stemerman was there assisting us. And after the contracts were initialled and also signed Mr. Castle had raised the initial about Bob's Big Boy, about getting a separate agreement for Bob's Big Boy in terms of a special rate for learners and trainees. He also was very concerned about the Western Chef-Air—which is a subsidiary of Marriot. And he also raised the issue of the Burger Pits.
> Q. And would you state what was said with respect to Burger Pits? And by whom?
> A. Well Mr. Castle had raised the issue that he wants to have an agreement where he extends the contract for thirty days. I of course referred to Mr. Stemerman since Mr. Stemerman was my spokesperson at all the meetings we had—other than the ones he might have missed. And he thought it was okay. So then upon my instructions I told them it was okay'd. And put together what Mr. Castle wanted in terms that he put together.
> Q. And did then you and Mr. Castle execute the agreement?
> A. Yes, we did.
> Q. And at the time that Mr. Castle executed the agreement did he make any qualifications as to the scope of his authority with respect to executing that one month extension?
> A. No, Sir.

A copy of the handwritten document executed by the parties that evening was introduced into evidence as Respondent's Exhibit 3. It provides:

> The contract between Burger Pits and Local 19 shall be continued from and after June 1, 1980 throught June 30, 1980.

The document is dated May 29, 1980, and it shows the signature of A. F. Castle for the Employer, and F. C. Marolda for the Union.

VI. THE EVENTS ON JUNE 3, 1980

A relief cook named Turrick Robbins presented a petition to Berger on June 3, 1980, in Berger's office in Campbell, California. A copy of that petition was introduced into evidence as Respondent's Exhibit 1. According to Berger's count, the petition reflects 198 names of Respondent's employees.

At the point in time Robbins worked in six of the Respondent's restaurants. He told Berger that he had started the petition on his own initiative because of the problems which the Respondent was having in retaining employees. According to Berger, Robbins also told him that the employees willingly signed the petition at almost every location to which Robbins went.

Berger immediately telephoned Castle. Berger informed Castle that he had received a petition from a majority of his employees that they wished to withdraw from the Union. Castle advised Berger to call Attorney Armon Cooper. Castle also advised Berger that, since the Union did not represent a majority of the employees, Berger could not talk to anyone. Castle further told Berger "to get some good legal advice." Castle also told Berger that the had signed an extension agreement to the 1977–1980 contract. Berger told Castle that Berger had never given Castle authority to sign any agreements or to negotiate for the Company. According to Castle, that was the first time that such question had ever been raised. (See Tr. 92.) Berger telephoned Attorney Cooper, and he instructed Cooper to notify the Union. On June 6, 1980, the Union received notification from Cooper that the Respondent was withdrawing recognition from the Union.

In addition, Castle sent a letter dated June 3, 1980, to Marolda. A copy of that letter was introduced into evidence as Respondent's Exhibit 4. In pertinent part, it states:

> As I was informed by Mr. Berger today that I would not be receiving authorization to represent him in upcoming negotiations at this time. I am enclosing the original copy of a signed letter that you and I signed giving him a thirty (30) day extension. As I did not have the authority then, nor do I have the authority now to sign such a letter.
> What the problem is I do not know!

After Marolda received Respondent's Exhibit 4, he telephoned his attorney Stemerman, and he also telephoned Castle whom he told that he felt that Castle had "sandbagged" the Union.

VII. THE EVENTS SUBSEQUENT TO THE WITHDRAWAL OF RECOGNITION

There is no dispute that the Respondent unilaterally implemented new health and welfare coverage for its employees after the Respondent had withdrawn recognition from the Union. There is also no dispute that the Respondent did not unilaterally implement a new pension plan as alleged in paragraph 9(c) of the General Counsel's complaint. In his posthearing brief, the General Counsel states in footnote 3, which appears on page 10 of his brief, the following, "General Counsel acknowledges that no new pension plan was unilaterally put into effect by Respondent, but of course contends that unilaterally ceasing contributions to the existing pension plan violates Section 8(a)(5) in any event."

Prior to May 31, 1980, union representatives had access to the kitchen areas of the Respondent's facilities but, after that date, the Respondent changed its practice. Berger stated at the trial that union representatives were no longer permitted in the kitchen areas after May 31, 1980. Berger acknowledged that it was a unilateral decision.

It was admitted in the pleadings that the Union had requested about August 11, 1980, that the Respondent furnish the Union with the names of Respondent's employees. It was further admitted that since that date the Respondent has refused to furnish the Union with that requested information. (See 11(a) and 11(c) of the General Counsel's consolidated complaint and the Respondent's answer.)

VIII. CONCLUSIONS

To determine whether the collective-bargaining agreement between the Respondent and the Union automatically renewed itself for another year, I have looked for guidance to section 32 of the contract. If Castle's letter of March 18, 1980, is read literally, I conclude that, by itself, the letter does not meet the notice requirements agreed to by the parties in section 32. (See R. Exh. 2 and see sec. 32 of G.C. Exh. 2(a), both of which are quoted in sec. III, herein.) That letter is the only document which conceivably could be construed as a written notice, and there is no evidence that a verbal notice was given. Furthermore, it was undisputed that the Union gave no notice of any kind to the Respondent of "its desire to change, modify, or alter this Agreement."

Nevertheless, if that letter is placed in the context of the events which were occurring during that period of time, and in the context of the subsequent actions of the parties, I conclude that the letter may be construed to meet the notice requirements of section 32. The contemporaneous events reveal that the Union and Castle were preparing for negotiations for a new contract. Without repeating here the findings of fact set forth in section III, herein, it will be remembered that the Union, understandably, was interested in knowing exactly which employers Castle was purporting to represent in the upcoming negotiations. (See G.C. Exh. 3, for example, and Marolda's verbal inquiries on this subject. Note also Castle's past practice in submitting copies of his written authorizations to the Union.) Thus, Castle's letter was sent in that context.

In addition, the past collective-bargaining history described in section III herein shows that the practice had been for the Respondent to accept the terms negotiated by the Union with the employer association and to sign a wage rate addendum. (See, for example, G.C. Exhs. 2(a) and 2(b).)

Finally, as described in section V herein, the Respondent and the Union agreed to extend their collective-bargaining agreement for an additional 30 days. If those parties had really considered that their contract had renewed itself automatically for another year, then the 30-day extension agreement signed by the parties on May 29, 1980, would have been superfluous.

The foregoing suggests that the Respondent's Exhibit 2 was, in fact, considered by the parties to be notice of a desire to change, modify, or alter the then-existing collective-bargaining agreement, notwithstanding the fact that the letter literally did not say so. Accordingly, I conclude that the collective-bargaining agreement between the parties did not automatically renew itself for another year. Since I have reached that conclusion, I further conclude that the portion of the allegations in paragraph 9(b) of the General Counsel's consolidated complaint which refer to a "Renewed Agreement" lacks merit. As I will discuss in the paragraphs to follow, I conclude that the collective-bargaining agreement did not renew itself, but instead that the parties agreed to extend their contract for another 30 days.

In the circumstances described in sections III and V, herein, I cannot accept Berger's assertion that Castle lacked any authority to negotiate and to sign Respondent's Exhibit 3 on the behalf of the Respondent. It will be remembered that Berger testified at transcript 25, "I told him we'd go along with what he did in negotiating a contract for us." The next question and answer reaffirmed Berger's testimony on that point. Without repeating the findings of fact in section III, herein, it is significant that the Respondent has never repudiated or disavowed Respondent's Exhibit 2, which is the lefter dated March 18, 1980, from Castle to Marolda. In that letter Castle informed the Union that the Respondent "will be represented by me personally." Furthermore, Castle was the one who had negotiated the 1977 contract on behalf of the Respondent (G.C. Exhs. 2(a) and 2(b)), and Castle had handled a written grievance and an alleged discrimination case on behalf of the Respondent. In addition, Castle continues to be retained by the Respondent.

Thus, I conclude that the Respondent was bound by the execution of Respondent's Exhibit 3, which was initiated by the Respondent's agent. Therefore, the collective-bargaining agreement, which is the General Counsel's Exhibits 2(a) and 2(b), was extended by written agreement of the parties from June 1 through 30, 1980. The Respondent's decision to withdraw recognition from the Union was made on June 3, 1980, after the petition was received. The notice of that decision was received by the Union on June 6, 1980. The Respondent's withdrawal of recognition was made at a time when the Respondent had a valid existing collective-bargaining agreement with the Union. In such circumstances, there existed "a presumption that the union was the majority representative at the time the contract was executed, and a presumption that its majority continued at least through the life of the contract. "Bartenders, Hotel, Motel & Restaurant Employers Bargaining Association of Pocatello, Idaho, 213 NLRB 651 (1974) (cases cited in the footnotes omitted). See also Burns Security Services, 225 NLRB 271 (1976); Pioneer Inn Associates v. NLRB, 578 F.2d 835 (9th Cir. 1978); NLRB v. Cornell of California, 577 F.2d 513 (9th Cir. 1978), and NLRB v. Vegas Vic, Inc., 546 F.2d 828 (9th Cir. 1976). Having agreed on May 29, 1980, to extend its 3-year contract for an additional 30 days, I conclude that the Respondent was not free 5 days later on June 3, 1980, to withdraw recognition from the Union because of the existence of a valid collective-bargaining agreement. Thus, I conclude that the matters set forth in section 4 herein and the petition described in section 6 herein do not justify the Respondent's withdrawal of recognition during the existence of a valid collective-bargaining agreement. Therefore, I conclude that the Respondent has thereby violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act. In United Supermarkets, 214 NLRB 958, 959 (1974), the Board stated, "We have repeatedly emphasized that stabilization in industrial relations is the ultimate objective of all provisions in the Act."

With regard to the Respondent's postwithdrawal-of-recognition actions regarding: (1) the cessation of contributions to the contractual health and welfare fund and pension plan; (2) the implementation of a new health and welfare plan; (3) the prohibition of access by union representatives to Respondent's employees in the kitchen areas of the Respondent's restaurants, and (4) the refusal of the Union's request to furnish the Union with the names of unit employees—all those were changes unilaterally made by the Respondent from the past practice and contractually established obligations. The fact that the contract expired on June 30, 1980, would not justify the Respondent's unilateral actions described in Section VII herein, nor would it limit the remedial action required by the Board in such circumstances. In Bay Area Sealers, 251 NLRB 89, 89–90 (1980), the Board held:

> 2. As found by the Administrative Law Judge, the contract in this case terminated on October 1, 1978. Because of the contract's expiration, the Administrative Law Judge limited Respondent's obligation to honor the terms and conditions of the contract to the period following Respondent's unilateral repudiation of the contract and the contract's expiration date. Respondent's obligation to make the employees whole for any loss of pay or fringe benefits occasioned by Respondent's unlawful repudiation of the agreement therefore ceased as of the contract's expiration date. For the reasons set forth below, we disagree with this portion of the administrative law judge's remedy.
> Although an employer's contractual obligations cease with the expiration of the contract, those terms and conditions established by the contract and governing the employer-employee, as opposed to the employer-union, relationship survive the contract and present the employer with a continuing obligation to apply those terms and conditions, unless the employer gives timely notice of its intention to modify a condition of employment and the union fails to timely request bargaining, or impasse is reached during bargaining over the proposed change. See Sir James, Inc, 183 NLRB 256 (1970); Waynes Dairy, 223 NLRB 260 (1976); Sioux Falls Stock Yards Company, 236 NLRB 543 (1978); James A. McBrady, Inc., and Maine Erection, Inc., 238 NLRB No. 113 (1978). See also NLRB v. Haberman Construction Company, 618 F.2d 288 (5th Cir. 1980).

In this connection, see also the Board's decisions in Pacific Intercom Co., 255 NLRB 184 (1981); Peerless Roofing Co., 247 NLRB 500 (1980), and Crest Beverage Co., 231 NLRB 116 (1977).

Based on the foregoing Board decisions, I further conclude that the Respondent's unilateral actions described above violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act. However, as pointed out in Section 7 herein, the Respondent did not implement a new pension plan, so I conclude that a portion of the allegations in section 9(c) of the General Counsel's consolidated complaint lacks merit. Accordingly, the reference to that particular portion in section 9(c) of the consolidated complaint is hereby dismissed.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. The following employees of the Respondent constitute a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective-bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act:

> All full-time and regular part-time employees employed by Burger Pits, Inc. and Self Serv Food Corp., Inc., at their various facilities located within Santa Clara County, California, performing work set forth in the Wage and Classification Schedule contained in the collective bargaining agreement between Burger Pits, Inc. and Self Serv Food Corp., Inc. and the union effective during the period June 1, 1977 through June 30, 1980; excluding all other employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

4. At all times material herein, the Union has been the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of all of the employees in the above-described unit.

5. The Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by the following acts and conduct:

(a) Withdrawing recognition about June 3, 1980, from the Union as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the appropriate unit described above.

(b) Refusing to abide by, and give effect to, the provisions of the collective-bargaining agreement which the Respondent and the Union agreed to extend through June 30, 1980.

(c) Ceasing unilaterally to make contributions to the contractually established health and welfare fund for its unit employees and the pension plan for its unit employees.

(d) Implementing unilaterally a new health and welfare plan for its unit employees.

(e) Prohibiting access by union representatives to its employees in the kitchen areas of the Respondent's restaurants.

(f) Refusing the Union's request to furnish the Union with the names of the employees in the unit.

6. The unfair labor practices set forth above effect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Since I have found that the Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act, I shall recommend to the Board that the Respondent be ordered to cease and desist from engaging in those unfair labor practices.

I shall recommend to the Board that the Respondent take certain affirmative action in order to effectuate the policies of the Act. Such affirmative action will include an order to make whole the unit employees who have lost wages, benefits, or incurred expenses as a result of the Respondent's unfair labor practices. Backpay, together with interest on such amounts of money, will be computed in accordance with the Board's decisions in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950); Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962), and Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

The Respondent points to the fact that the Respondent implemented a new medical plan for its employees after the Respondent withdrew recognition from the Union. However, as the attorney for the Respondent correctly notes in the Respondent's brief at 13 and 14, "There is nothing in the record which indicates what the comparative benefits of the union's and the respondent's plans were." Because there is no basis on which a comparison of the benefits of the plans may be made, and because there is no evidence at this point as to whether any unit employees suffered any losses as a result of the change in the health and welfare plans, I shall include a make-whole remedy in the order, and leave the monetary determination to the compliance stage of the proceeding. I shall follow the Board's order in its decision in Kraft Plumbing, 252 NLRB 891 (1980).

In accordance with the Board precedents cited above in section VIII, I shall not limit the time period for the Respondent's contributions to the pension plan to the 30-day extension of time period agreed to by the parties. The amount of interest, if any, due on such payments will be determined in the compliance stage.

The Respondent asked that a bargaining order not be imposed on the Respondent even if unfair labor practices are found in this proceeding. In view of the findings and conclusions that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act in withdrawing recognition from the Union as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the unit employees, and further in view of the unilateral actions taken by the Respondent following the withdrawal of recognition, I conclude that a bargaining order is an appropriate remedy in such circumstances.

In Hickmott Foods, 242 NLRB 1357 (1979), the Board held that a broadly worded cease-and-desist order "is warranted only when a respondent is shown to have a proclivity to violate the Act, or has engaged in such egregious or widespead misconduct as to demonstrate a general disregard for the employees' fundamental statutory rights." While the unfair labor practice violations in this case are serious, I conclude that the Board's standard stated in Hickmott Foods has not been met. Accordingly, I shall recommend to the Board that a narrowly worded cease-and-desist order be imposed.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

On 13 April 1984 Administrative Law Judge D. Barry Morris issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed a cross-exception and a brief in support of its cross-exception and in opposition to the General Counsel's exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings,[1] findings,[2] and conclusions[3] and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The recommended Order of the administrative law judge is adopted and the complaint is dismissed.

[1] In view of the dismissal of the complaint in its entirety, we find it unnecessary to decide whether the judge properly admitted into evidence over the Respondent's objection newspaper articles relating to the work stoppage of the Independent Truckers Association.

[2] Because we agree with the judge that the General Counsel has failed to establish that Jochum's working conditions were abnormally dangerous within the meaning of Sec. 502 of the Act, we find it unnecessary to determine whether Sec. 502 would have otherwise applied to Jochum's refusal to drive.

[3] Member Zimmerman agrees with the result reached, noting that employee Jochum's admission that he did not discuss the alleged unsafe working conditions with other employees and his statement that he was a "spokesman for himself" indicate that he acted specifically in his own self-interest and thus renders his conduct unprotected.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

D. BARRY MORRIS, Administrative Law Judge. This case was heard before me in Buffalo, New York, on November 2 and 3, 1983.[1] On a charge filed on February 8, a complaint was issued on June 27 and amended on August 25,[2] alleging that Gibraltar Steel Corporation, Seneca Steel Division (Respondent) violated Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act). Respondent filed an answer denying the commission of the alleged unfair labor practices.

The parties were given full opportunity to participate, produce evidence, examine and cross-examine witnesses, argue orally, and file briefs. Briefs were filed by the General Counsel and by Respondent.

On the entire record of the case, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent, a New York corporation, with a place of business in Buffalo, New York, is engaged in the manufacture, sale, and distribution of cold-rolled steel and related products.[3] It annually sells goods valued in excess of $50,000 to consumers located outside of New York State. Respondent admits that it is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act, and I so find.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Issues

The issues are:

1. Was the Charging Party engaged in "concerted" protected activity when he refused to drive to Corry, Pennsylvania, on February 2, 1983?

2. When the Charging Party refused to drive, did "abnormally dangerous conditions" exists, within the meaning of Section 502 of the Act?

B. The Facts

1. Background

Jack Jochum, the Charging Party, was employed by the Seneca Steel Division of Respondent since April 1981 as a truckdriver. His duties were to deliver steel from Respondent's plant in Buffalo to customers located in New York State and Pennsylvania. He was the only truckdriver employed by Seneca Steel Division and his position as driver was not covered by any collective-bargaining agreement. It was stipulated that, between January 31 and February 13, certain owner-operators of trucks under the auspices of the Independent Truckers Association engaged in a work stoppage to protest certain United States Government policies.

2. Refusal to drive

On the afternoon of February 2, Jochum learned that he was scheduled to take a load to Corry, Pennsylvania, the next day. Corry is approximately 8 miles south of the New York State border. Jochum testified that his normal route from Buffalo to Corry would be to take Interstate 90 until North East, Pennsylvania, and then Route 426 to Corry. Route 426 goes in a southeasterly direction, cutting through New York State.

Jochum credibly testified that he told Bob Jans, Respondent's dispatcher, that he was not taking the load to [1] All dates refer to 1983 unless otherwise specified.

[2] The complaint was further amended at the hearing to allege that the vehicle that the Charging Party was assigned to drive was overloaded.

[3] It was stipulated that Gibraltar Steel Corporation and Seneca Steel Division constitute a single employer, within the meaning of the Act.

Pennsylvania because "it was unsafe and that it was way overloaded." Jochum then proceeded to the office of Kenneth Martin, Respondent's general foreman, and testified as follows:

> A. And I told Kenny that I was not going to take that load down there on account of the unsafe conditions down there.
> Q. Unsafe conditions caused by what?
> A. By the truckers' strike, Independent Truckers' strike.

Jochum testified that he then turned in his credit card. Later that afternoon Jochum testified that he a telephone call from William Vicaretto, a truckdriver employed by Respondent's strip and strap division. Vicaretto told Jochum that after Jochum refused to take the load, Respondent called Gary Ellis, who had last worked for Respondent in 1981, but that Ellis had also refused to drive.

The next morning Jochum returned to the plant. Jochum testified that he asked Martin "what my status was and he said to me that I had quit." Jochum further testified:

> At that I told him that I had not quit and that I'm here for work. He told me that I was a truckdriver and that he didn't have any work for a truckdriver.

Ellis testified that when he was called by Respondent's foreman and asked if he would take a load for Seneca Steel into Pennsylvania, he refused. He told the foreman, "as far as I'm concerned, it was too dangerous and hazardous to my health." He further testified that he did not speak to Jochum on the day that Jochum refused to take the load. Jochum conceded that he did not discuss his refusal to take the load with any other employee. He testified, as follows:

> Q. Now, prior to your telling Company representatives on February 2nd, I believe that's the day that the 3:30 p.m. conversation roughly took place?
> A. Right.
> Q. Prior to that, did you discuss that matter with anybody else?
> A. No, I didn't.
> Q. Did anyone else urge you "Jack, I want you to refuse that load" or say that you should refuse the load?
> A. No. . . .
> Q. Were you acting as a spokesman for anybody else? . . .
> [A]. I thought it was unsafe to go down there.
> Q. . . . I didn't ask that. I asked if you were acting as a spokesman for anyone else at that time?
> A. A spokesman for who?
> Q. For anyone?
> A. Not that I know of. A spokesman for myself. I did refuse the load.

3. Vehicle overload

Jochum testified that on February 2, when he look at the freight bill for the Corry shipment, it showed a load of 51,000 pounds of steel. This would have been approximately 8000 pounds overweight. He further testified, and the record indicates, however, that in late 1982 he took a number of shipments to Pennsylvania which were overweight. On November 12, 1982, he took a load to Pennsylvania which weighed 47,530 pounds, approximately 4500 pounds overweight. At that time he checked the following box on the driver's vehicle inspection report, "I detect no defect or deficiency in this motor vehicle as would be likely to affect the safety of its operation or result in its mechanical breakdown." Similarly, on September 16, 1982, he took a load to Pennsylvania which weighed 58,540 pounds, approximately 15,000 pounds overweight. Again, he checked the box indicating no defect or deficiency in the motor vehicle "as would be likely to affect the safety of its operation." On November 11, 1982, he took a shipment to Pennsylvania which weighed 73,010 pounds. In connection with this load Jochum testified:

> Q. How much overweight was that load, Mr. Jochum?
> A. That was 30,000 pounds.
> Q. Did you regard that as unsafe?
> A. No, I did not.
> Q. That's significantly overweight, isn't it?
> A. Yes, sir.

The shipment which Jochum refused to take was delivered on February 3 by another driver, Ron Barber. Richard Fern, Seneca's billing clerk, credibly testified that the weight of that shipment was 42,340 pounds. Jochum testified that any load to Pennsylvania at that time exceeding 43,280 pounds would have been overweight. Accordingly, the shipment delivered by Barber was not overweight.

4. Conditions in Pennsylvania

Jochum was questioned as to how he became aware of "abnormally dangerous conditions" existing in Pennsylvania around February 1. He testified that he was informed through "newspaper articles, television, radio; also CB radio talk." When asked what he was told, he replied:

> That they were throwing bricks around in Erie, Pennsylvania; which I had already read in the newspapers, and stuff like that. Trucks were being shot at, tires shot out, radiators were being shot at.

The General Counsel introduced newspaper articles relating to the work stoppage. Representative of the articles is General Counsel's Exhibit 5, which is an article from The Buffalo News, dated January 31, entitled "Truck Strike Begins Amid Violence." General Counsel's Exhibit 8 is an article in The Buffalo News of February 1 entitled "Driver Killed, Seven Wounded in Nationwide Truck Strike." Similarly, General Counsel's Exhibit 13 is an article from the same newspaper dated February 2, entitled "Highway Violence Spreads to 27 States in Trucker Strike."

Vicaretto was questioned as to what he heard about driving conditions for truckers in Pennsylvania during the first few days of February. He testified:

> A. There were all kinds of news.
> Q. Well, what type of news did you hear or [see] in the newspaper?
> A. Guys being, you know, beat up, and their trucks torn up. A few shootings. But again, that all depended where you are in Pennsylvania. It doesn't mean the whole state of Pennsylvania was in turmoil. If you're talking—you're talking about mills, you know, when you're talking about truckers strikes in Pennsylvania, you're talking down at the mills; you're not talking about the whole state of Pennsylvania.

Vicaretto testified that Corry is not located in the mill area, nor is it in a particularly dangerous area known as the combat zone. The load which Jochum refused to take was delivered by Barber to Corry, without incident, on February 3. Similary, Ellis testified that employees working for the trucking company he then worked for did drive into Pennsylvania during the work stoppage. The parties also stipulated that Seneca Steel Division received shipments by truck from Cleveland, Ohio, on February 2, 3, and 4.

C. Discussion and Analysis

1. Concerted activity

In Myers Industries, 268 NLRB 493, 497 (1984), the Board stated: "In general, to find an employee's activity to be 'concerted,' we shall require that it be engaged in with or on the authority of other employees, and not solely on behalf of the employee himself." Before a violation of Section 8(a)(1) can be found, it must first be determined that the protected activity was "concerted." As the Board has stated in Myers if any employee acts alone, where no collective-bargaining agreement is involved, it does not constitute concerted activity.

Ellis, who had not worked for Respondent since 1981, testified that he did not speak to Jochum on the day Jochum refused to drive. Jochum clearly and unequivocally testified that he did not discuss his intended action with anyone prior to his refusal to take the load. When asked whether he was acting as a spokesman for anyone else he testified, "Not that I know of. A spokesman for myself."

It is clear that Jochum acted by himself and only on his behalf. Under the Myers decision, supra, the General Counsel has not shown that the Charging Party was engaged in "concerted" activity.

2. Abnormally dangerous conditions

The complaint, as amended at the hearing, alleges that, on February 2, "pursuant to Section 502 of the Act," the Charging Party "refused to make deliveries of goods and products to the State of Pennsylvania because of the abnormally dangerous and unsafe working conditions resulting from the violence associated with the national strike of the Independent Truckers and the overload of the vehicle in which he was assigned to drive."

I believe that this case must be decided under Sections 7 and 8(a)(1) of the Act, not under Section 502. As Administrative Law Judge Giannasi stated in Myers Industries, supra, 268 NLRB at 508 fn. 6:

> Sec. 502 offers no particular help in defining the contours of protected concerted activity in the circumstances of this case. Sec. 502 does not define either an unfair labor practice or concerted protected activity. And it adds nothing to the existing body of law interpreting the phrase "protected concerted activity."

Instead, Section 502 deals with the rights of employees who refuse to perform work in unsafe conditions where a contractual no-strike provision would make such activity unprotected. See Whirlpool Corp. v. Marshall, 445 U.S. 1, 17–18 fn. 29 (1980); NLRB v. Tamara Foods, 692 F.2d 1171, 1183 (8th Cir. 1982), cert. denied 103 S.Ct. 2089 (1983). In such a case Section 502 may be utilized to rebut an employer's defense that such rfusal is unprotected because it is a "strike" in violation of a contractual no-strike clause. See Banyard v. NLRB, 505 F.2d 342, 348 (D.C. Cir. 1974).

Even were Section 502 to be applicable, I believe that the General Counsel has not sustained his burden. The test for determining if conditions are "abnormally dangerous" under Section 502 is an objective one. Gateway Coal Co. v. United Mine Workers, 414 U.S. 368, 386–387 (1974); Redwing Carriers, Inc., 130 NLRB 1208, 1209 (1961), enfd. as modified 325 F.2d 1011 (D.C. Cir. 1963), cert. denied 377 U.S. 905.

In Redwing Carriers, the Board stated, in construing the term "abnormally dangerous conditions" (130 NLRB at 1209):

> We are of the opinion the term comtemplates, and is intended to insure, an objective, as opposed to a subjective, test. What controls is not the state of the mind of the employee or employees concerned, but whether the actual working conditions shown to exist by competent evidence might in the circumstances be considered "abnormally dangerous."

Similarly, in Gateway Coal, supra, the Supreme Court stated that the honest belief of employees that conditions were unsafe was insufficient to meet the criteria of Section 502.

With respect to the allegation that the load was abnormally dangerous because it was overweight, I find that the General Counsel has not shown by objective evidence that an abnormally dangerous condition existed. In uncontradicted testimony, Fern testified that the shipment which Barber delivered to Corry on February 3 weighed 42,340 pounds, which was not overweight. There was no corroboration for Jochum's testimony that a weight of 51,000 pounds was written on the freight bill. In addition, the record contains several instances of Jochum having taken loads to Pennsylvania which exceeded the maximum weight. Jochum signed reports concerning those deliveries that the loads were not unsafe. Jochum also testified that a load of 73,010 pounds, 30,000 pounds overweight, was not unsafe.

With respect to conditions being abnormally dangerous because of violence attending the Independent Truckers' work stoppage, the General Counsel has not shown by objective evidence that conditions on the route to Corry, Pennsylvania, were abnormally dangerous. While I have no doubt of the Charging Party's good faith and the fact that he was genuinely concerned for his health and safety, as the above-cited cases indicate, that is insufficient to meet the criteria of Section 502. While there was testimony that there was violence around the mills, the testimony also indicated that Corry was not in the mill area. And, although the newspaper articles spoke of violence in various places, there is no indication that such violence was present on the routes which the Charging Party would have taken to Corry. Accordingly, I conclude that the General Counsel has not shown by objective standards that abnormally dangerous conditions existed at the time the Charging Party refused to deliver the load.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.
2. Respondent has not engaged in the unfair labor practices alleged in the complaint.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[4]

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN, HUNTER, AND DENNIS

On 1 April 1983 Administrative Law Judge Howard I. Grossman issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions[2] and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.

The judge found, inter alia, that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) by coercively interrogating employee Rodney Gibbs and thereafter violated Section 8(a)(3) by laying off Gibbs because he engaged in union activity. In reaching this conclusion, the judge relied on his finding that Robert McMillan was acting as the Respondent's agent when he interrogated Gibbs and thus learned that Gibbs supported the Union. The Respondent excepts contending that McMillan was not its agent. We find merit in the Respondent's exception.

The Respondent is a corporation engaged as a general contractor at the North Carolina Phosphate jobsite in Aurora, North Carolina. The project requires the use of earthmoving equipment that has to be constructed at the jobsite. North Carolina Phosphate purchased a large piece of equipment, called a dragline, from the Marion Power Shovel Company. The Respondent contracted to install the equipment.

McMillan, an employee of Marion Power Shovel Company, worked at the site as a field weld specialist. McMillan's primary reason for being at the site was to serve as a representative of Marion Power and to recommend to Marion Power whether the welds were done in a manner so that Marion Power could warrant the equipment.

McMillan did make requests to the site superintendent that welds not done in accordance with the specifications be corrected. Additionally, McMillan participated in the testing of welders. He signed the test results on the signature line for "welding engineer, supervisor, or erection engineer." Based on the test results, McMillan made recommendations for or against a welder's employment. Most of his recommendations were followed. The only evidence that McMillan issued direct instructions to employees consists of McMillan's request to Rodney Gibbs that he get a union card from his car. Gibbs ignored the first such request but complied the second time the request was made.

As the judge correctly noted, McMillan's recommendations carried weight with respect to the employment of welders. While this evidence ordinarily would tend to establish that the Respondent had made McMillan its agent, we find that it is insufficient to support such a finding under the circumstances of this case. McMillan's role was to ensure that the Respondent was performing the welding in accordance with the standards established by his employer, Marion Power. Thus, in testing and making recommendations about welders, McMillan was acting solely on behalf of Marion Power. In following McMillan's recommendations the Respondent was simply seeking to satisfy him so that Marion Power would issue a warranty on the

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

We have examined the judge's findings that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(1) by interrogating employees in light of the Board's decision in Rossmore House, 269 NLRB 1176 (Apr. 25, 1984), and find, in agreement with the judge, that the interrogations were unlawful.

In finding Jones and Brooks to be supervisors, we do not rely on the judge's finding that welding constituted skilled work.

The judge inadvertently concluded that it was Douglas Lee who spoke to Heath about the Union in the beginning of September. It is clear from Heath's affidavit that the judge was referring to Jones, not Lee. However, it is not clear whether Jones' questioning of Heath regarding whether Heath was going to join the Union occurred prior to or after Mullins' takeover. Accordingly, we do not pass on this complaint allegation since, in any event, it would be cumulative.

The judge incorrectly cites Cumberland Farms Dairy, 258 NLRB 900 (1981), as being enforced at 674 F.2d 943 (1st Cir. 1982). That Board decision has not been addressed by the circuit court of appeals. The Board decision that was enforced in the First Circuit's 1982 decision is reported at 250 NLRB 1204 (1980).

[2] In finding that Welding Foremen Jones and Brooks are supervisors as defined by the Act, Member Hunter does not rely on the judge's conclusion that the Respondent would be responsible for their actions even in the absence of evidence that they possessed such authority or his reference to Sambo's Restaurant, 247 NLRB 777, 782 (1980).

Member Hunter agrees with the judge's conclusion at sec. III,C,2, par. 4, that Jones' telling employee Edwards that he could not talk about the Union during "working" time violated Sec. 8(a)(1) because Jones' admonition was discriminatory, i.e., it only prohibited talk about the Union but did not prohibit conversation about other subjects during the same time. In so concluding, however, Member Hunter does not agree that this one comment constituted a "rule," as the judge also found. The judge's cite to Pedro's Restaurant, 246 NLRB 567 (1979), in that regard is not apt as Pedro's involved the posting of a notice on a bulletin board. Here, we have a single unlawful admonition which Member Hunter finds clearly does not constitute the promulgation of a "rule."

equipment. In that sense the Respondent was in a position analogous to that of a provider of services who hires or fires based partially on the recommendation of an essential customer. In these circumstances, the Respondent's efforts to comply with the hiring recommendations McMillan made were not, without more, sufficient to make McMillan its agent. Moreover, the only evidence that employees may have thought the Respondent had given McMillan authority over them was the fact that, at McMillan's request, Gibbs left work to get the union card from his car. However, even here the evidence is weak in that the first such request was ignored.

Contrary to the judge, we therefore conclude that McMillan was not an agent of the Respondent. Accordingly, we find that the Respondent was not responsible for McMillan's action in questioning employees as to whether they had received cards, in asking Gibbs where the card was, and in requesting that Gibbs get the card from his car. Therefore, we shall dismiss this allegation of the complaint.[3]

Additionally, because we have found that McMillan was not an agent for the Respondent, we further disagree with the judge's finding that Gibbs' layoff was discriminatorily motivated. Absent a finding that McMillan's knowledge is attributed to the Respondent, there is no basis in the record for concluding that the Respondent was aware of Gibbs' union activity. Accordingly, we also dismiss the 8(a)(3) allegation involving Gibbs.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, F. Mullins Construction, Inc., Aurora, North Carolina, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Substitute the following for paragraph 2(a).

"(a) Offer Barry Edwards, Randall Walker, Jerry Eisenzimmer, and Douglas Lee immediate and full reinstatement to their former positions or, if those positions no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges, discharging if necessary any employee hired to replace any of them, and make them and the estate of Leslie Heath whole for any loss of earnings any of them or the estate may have suffered by reason of the Respondent's discrimination against them and Heath, in the manner described in the section of this decision entitled 'The Remedy.'"

2. Substitute the attached notice for that of the administrative law judge.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT ask employees whether they have received union cards, whether certain employees are trying to get other employees to sign union cards, or to describe the nature of union literature distributed to employees.

WE WILL NOT ask employees whether they intend to "carry on" the Union or lead its organizational efforts.

WE WILL NOT ask employees where they obtained union hats or other union paraphernalia, who gave it to them, or whether they had to sign union cards to obtain them.

WE WILL NOT direct employees to deliver union cards to company agents.

WE WILL NOT tell employees that they would probably lose their jobs if they voted the Union in.

WE WILL NOT tell employees that a supervisor would not be able to obtain a job with the owner of a jobsite who has engaged us to perform work there if the Union comes onto the jobsite.

WE WILL NOT discriminatorily tell employees after the beginning of a union campaign that they cannot talk about the Union during working time.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL offer Barry Edwards, Randall Walker, Jerry Eisenzimmer, and Douglas Lee immediate reinstatement to their former positions or, if the positions no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority and other rights and privileges, discharging if necessary any employee hired to replace any of them.

WE WILL make these employees, and the estate of Leslie Heath, whole for any loss of earnings they or the estate may have suffered, with interest, because we laid them off unlawfully.

WE WILL expunge from our personnel records or other files of these employees any reference to our unlawful layoffs of them and notify them in writing that this action has been taken and that evidence of these unlawful layoffs will not be used as a basis for further personnel actions against them.

F. MULLINS CONSTRUCTION, INC.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

HOWARD I. GROSSMAN, Administrative Law Judge. The charge in Case 11-CA-10124 was filed on September 24, 1981, by Local Lodge 30, International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Ship Builders, Blacksmiths, Forgers & Helpers, AFL-CIO (the Union). An amended charge was filed on October 13, and a complaint was issued on November 6, 1981. Thereafter, on November 16, the Union filed a second amended charge. The charge in Case 11-CA-10250 was filed by the Union on December 24, 1981, and a consolidated complaint was issued on January 28, 1982.

As subsequently amended at the hearing, the complaint alleges that F. Mullins Construction, Inc. (Respondent),[1] in September 1981 and thereafter, interrogated its employees concerning their union sympathies and the sympathies of fellow employees, created an impression among its employees that their union activities were under surveillance, orally promulgated a rule prohibiting employees from talking about the Union during working hours, and threatened employees with loss of jobs if they selected the Union as their collective-bargaining representative, all in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act). The amended complaint also alleges that Respondent laid off employees Barry Edwards, Randall Walker, and Jerry Eisenzimmer on September 24, 1981, and employees Leslie Heath, Rodney Gibbs, and Douglas Lee on December 3, 1981, because of their union activities, in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

A hearing was held before me on these matters in Washington, North Carolina, on July 27 and 28, 1982, and in Raleigh, North Carolina, on October 5, 1982. On the basis of the entire record, including a brief filed by Respondent, and my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, I make the following

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent is a Florida corporation licensed to do business in the State of North Carolina, where it has been engaged as a general contractor at the North Carolina Phosphate jobsite in Aurora, North Carolina. The complaint alleges that Respondent purchased supplies and materials for use at the Aurora jobsite valued in excess of $50,000 directly from sources outside North Carolina, and that it performs services valued in excess of that amount for customers located outside the State.

[1] Respondent's name appears as stipulated at the hearing.

Respondent's answer denies the direct outflow allegation, but appears to admit the direct inflow allegation.[2] The answer also admits that Respondent is an employer engaged in interstate commerce, and that it meets the Board's indirect inflow jurisdictional standard.[3] At the hearing Respondent appeared to contest, although not explicitly, the direct inflow allegation. However, the parties stipulated that Respondent receives materials, supplies, and services from an employer located within the State of North Carolina which is subject to the Board's jurisdiction under the "direct standards." I conclude that Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act under the Board's indirect inflow standard.[4]

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

Respondent admits and I find that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

The General Counsel introduced what he called background evidence tending to show union animus on the part of Respondent. This principally involved two other companies, North Carolina Phosphate, a firm engaged in phosphate extraction at the Aurora jobsite, and Mulberry Construction Co. of Mulberry, Florida, with whom North Carolina Phosphate had contracted to install very large earthmoving equipment, called a dragline, at Aurora. Mulberry was the original contractor on this job, and was succeeded by Respondent.

Charles L. Dover, a business manager for the International Union of Fire, Brakemen, and Engineers, associated with the North Carolina Building and Construction Trades Council, testified that Mulberry had a contract with his organization. About mid-June 1981, Dover discovered that Mulberry was in violation of the contract at a project in Aurora. He met with the president of Mulberry, and informed him that Florida unions would shut down every job that Mulberry had in Florida. The Mulberry official replied that he would get back to North Carolina Phosphate, and was sure that he could arrange with that company to employ union men at the Aurora jobsite. If not, Dover was assured, Mulberry would leave the job.

L. F. Shipman, a coordinator for the North Carolina Trades Council, testified that Mulberry asked him to speak to North Carolina Phosphate about the Aurora job. On July 9, 1981, Shipman had a meeting with the North Carolina Phosphate president, and was informed that the company had decided not to use union men on the job.

About the same time in July, Mulberry employed Barry Edwards at the Aurora jobsite. Edwards indicated his union affiliation on his application form, and began a campaign on behalf of the Union immediately. He distributed handbills on the day he was hired and obtained 8 to 10 signed union authorization cards from Mulberry employees. Mulberry's lead welder at that time was Terry Jones, who was later promoted to foreman. During his first week of employment, Edwards told Jones and other employees that he was attempting to organize the job, and that he would appreciate any support they could give.

[4] See Siemons Mailing Service, 122 NLRB 81 fn. 12 (1958); St. Francis Pie Shop, 172 NLRB 89, 90 (1968). The General Counsel elected not to litigate the direct outflow allegation.

Respondent protested the introduction of much of this evidence on the ground that it was irrelevant with respect to the issue of whether it had committed an unfair labor practice. The Company noted that an unfair labor practice charge had been filed by the Union against North Carolina Phosphate, but that it had been withdrawn.[5] Respondent also observed that the Union had filed a charge against Mulberry, but that that organization had entered into an informal settlement agreement.[6]

Barry Edwards and Douglas Lee, employees under both Mulberry and Mullins, testified that Steve Ryder, Mulberry's superintendent, told a group of Mulberry employees in July or August that North Carolina Phosphate would not "tolerate" union men on the job. Employee Randall Walker averred that Ryder called a meeting in the latter part of August, and said "they were changing the name of the company," and that the only difference would be the fact that Ryder would not be there any more. Employer Rodney Gibbs asserted that there was picketing at the jobsite during this meeting, and that Ryder said they would shut the job down rather than let the Union come in. Employee Jerry Eisenzimmer testified that Mulberry Supervisor Terry Seville [7] told union activist Barry Edwards in mid-August that the "Union would not be on that job."

Fred G. Mullins testified that he was the president of the Company bearing his name, Respondent herein, and that he had been with the Company since July 1, 1981. He agreed that Mulberry had previously been constructing a dragline for North Carolina Phosphate at Aurora, and that his company took over the job on September 9, 1981.

Mullins made a speech to employees at the time he took over the job. Walker averred that Mullins told employees that he wanted to retain all of them in their existing jobs, and that the job would last until April or May 1982. Employee Jerry Eisenzimmer gave similar testimony. Mullins denied telling employees that they would remain until the completion of the job, but admitted telling them that the job would take until July 1982. I credit Walker's testimony. Although Mullins may not have promised explicitly to keep all employees until the end of the job, his statement that it would last until the following year, coupled with his stated intention to retain all of them in their existing jobs, could reasonably have been interpreted as a promise of continued employment until the end of the project.

[6] R. Exh. 3.
[7] Seville was an admitted supervisor under Mullins.

Employee Jerry Eisenzimmer testified that he had a conversation with Mulberry Supervisor Terry Seville in mid-August, in which Seville told him that he could stay on the job "as long as they had work down there." I credit this testimony.

Mullins in fact employed all of the Mulberry employees except Superintendent Ryder, and utilized the same equipment which Mulberry had used.[8]

B. The Supervisory and Agency Issues

1. The issues

The pleadings establish that Respondent's president Mullins was a supervisor within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act, and the parties stipulated that Site Superintendent Jeffrey McGuire and Assistant Site Superintendent Terry Seville had the same status. The parties differ over the status of Terry Jones, John Brooks, and Robert McMillan.

2. Terry Jones and John Brooks

a. Summary of the evidence

Jones and Brooks were called leadmen by company witnesses. Brooks was on the day shift and Jones on the night shift.[9] They assigned work to employees in accordance with a "priority list" of jobs to be done, given to them by Site Superintendent McGuire or Assistant Site Superintendent Seville. According to Mullins, this list was given to Jones and Brooks "each morning." McGuire, however, testified that he "prepared a priority list weekly that was handed out Monday . . . to the leadmen—the work had been assigned to the leadman at that point, and at that time he had so many people and so many areas to work, so he distributed his people to those areas." Seville defined a priority list as a "list of things . . . to be done either during that week or to complete a phase of the project." I credit McGuire's and Seville's testimonies, and conclude that the priority list assigned work to Jones and Brooks on a weekly or job basis, but not on a daily basis.

Employee Douglas Lee testified that Jones moved him "from job to job." Jones said that he moved employees to a different "department" when they were finished with a prior "department." He also recorded the employees' time. Employee Rodney Gibbs gave similar testimony about Brooks. Site Superintendent McGuire stated that the "leadmen were given great independence in the distribution of their personnel." Comparing his own duties with those of Brooks, Seville testified as follows:

> I ran quite a few more areas. John was basically welding, and I did a lot more of the iron-work and sub-structures which he supervised the welding on . . . I shouldn't say "supervised," you know, but I'd tell him what to do and then he would just commence to take care of business.

[8] I credit the testimony of employee Barry Edwards corroborated by Walker on this issue.
[9] Jones said that he changed to the day shift the week before Thanksgiving 1981.

Employee Barry Edwards averred that Mulberry distributed a document with the titles of employees in the "chain of command," followed by their telephone numbers. Brooks was listed as welding foreman on the day shift. According to Edwards, employees who were going to be absent from work were required to call the appropriate person on the list and report the absence. Although Brooks described his position as "leadman" under Mullins, he did not expressly contradict Edwards' testimony, which I credit.

Edwards was employed on the night shift. He testified that Jones was promoted to "foreman" in late July or early August 1981, about 2 or 3 weeks after Edwards had been hired. Although Jones described himself as the lead welder, he did not expressly contradict Edwards' testimony about the promotion. Further, according to Edwards' uncontradicted testimony, he congratulated Jones after the promotion, to which the latter replied that there was no need for congratulations, since he had "been made foreman . . . to keep an eye on Edwards." I credit Edwards on the issues of Jones' promotion and his response to Edwards' congratulations.

Edwards testified that Jones "quit working with his tools and started passing out work assignments" after the promotion. There is implicit corroboration from Jones, who said that he "went back to [his] tools" after his transfer to the day shift just before Thanksgiving. On one night, apparently prior to this transfer, Jones did work with his tools, but was "reprimanded" by an individual whom Edwards, relying on Jones, believed to be associated with North Carolina Phosphate. Asked what percentage of time he spent in "manual labor," Jones replied: "Well, I'd say 90 percent, because . . . I had to drag leads, run and get drop lights; first one thing and then another. And then I would try to weld some, and go around and help as much as I could." Brooks, asked how much he worked with his hands, initially answered, "Some," which he later estimated to be 75 percent of his time. His description of his duties is similar to that of Jones.

I conclude that Jones and Brooks, in addition to their work assignment duties, engaged in some manual labor. However, this consisted of a variety of jobs, including help to other employees, unlike the steady "working with tools" of rank-and-file employees. I also conclude that Jones spent less time in manual labor after his promotion to foreman than he had previously done as lead welder.

I find that Jones and Brooks had the title of "foreman" or "welding foreman" under Mulberry at the time that Mullins took over the job on September 9, 1981. They also had the job characteristics outlined above. Inasmuch as Mullins told employees at the time of the takeover that he wanted them to continue in their existing jobs, I also conclude that Jones and Brooks continued in the same capacity under Mullins.[10]

[10] As indicated above, Jones transferred to the day shift just before Thanksgiving, i.e., in the week beginning November 16, 1981, and apparently returned to rank-and-file status at that time.

b. Factual and legal analysis

Section 2(11) of the Act sets forth various indicia of supervisory status, including the authority to "assign" or "to responsibly direct" employees, where the exercise of such authority "requires the use of independent judgment." "The functions of a supervisor listed in the statute are disjunctive; the Board need not show that an employee performed all or several of the functions to support a finding of supervisory status." NLRB v. Dadco Fashions, 632 F.2d 493, 496 (5th Cir. 1980), enfg. 243 NLRB 1193 (1979).[11]

Brooks and Jones were employed on a jobsite involving the construction of large earthmoving equipment. They assigned work to other employees, principally welders. I conclude that this direction of work was "responsible" and required "independent judgment." This conclusion is based on the following factors: (1) the work to be assigned was given to Brooks and Jones on a weekly or job-phase basis rather than more frequently; it included jobs to be completed followed by other jobs, and thus involved the scheduling of work in which Jones and Brooks were given "great independence in the distribution of their personnel"; (2) welding constitutes skilled work; (3) Jones and Brooks did less manual work than other employees, and almost no routine "work with tools"; (4) they had the title of "foreman" or "welding foreman"; (5) they kept employee timecards; (6) employees were required to call Brooks, and probably Jones, in the event of absence from work; (7) one admitted supervisor's description of his own duties was almost indistinguishable from his description of Brooks', and differed only as to extent of area covered; and (8) Jones' statement to Edwards—that he had been promoted to foreman to "keep an eye" on Edwards—suggested a position of authority over the latter. Although this statement was made under Mulberry's tenure, there was no change in Jones' status under Mullins, at least until his transfer to the day shift.

No two cases involving supervisory issues present exactly the same facts. However, at least two circuit courts of appeals have sustained the Board's findings of supervisory status in cases where responsible direction of work constituted a key factor in the Board's conclusions,[12] and one where the monitoring of timecards was a factor.[13] A similar conclusion is warranted herein, and I find that Brooks and Jones were supervisors within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act—Jones until his transfer to the day shift the week of November 16, 1981. Even in the absence of such finding, Respondent would be responsible for their actions since it placed them in positions where employees could reasonably believe that they spoke on behalf of management. Sambo's Restau-

3. Robert McMillan

a. Factual summary

The earthmoving equipment, or dragline, which was being constructed at the Aurora jobsite had been purchased by North Carolina Phosphate from Marion Power Shovel Company, a Division of Dresser Industries, located in Marion, Ohio. The equipment was so large that it had to be put together at the jobsite. McMillan worked for Marion as a field weld specialist at the Aurora jobsite from about June 1981 until about June 1982. One of his duties was to witness the contractor's construction of the dragline, and to determine whether it was in accordance with Marion's specifications. Based on his reports, Marion could then decide whether to give a warranty to North Carolina Phosphate. If certain welds had not been done in accordance with the specifications, McMillan would report this fact to the site superintendent and request that the work be corrected.

McMillan also participated in the testing of welders. Edwards testified that McMillan "gave" him a welding test. McMillan disputed this, stating that he only "witnessed" tests given by the contractor. However, he signed a document recording the test results for welders, and the description of his capacity underneath his signature is that of "welding engineer, supervisor, or erection engineer" (R. Exhs. 13 and 14). McMillan also informed the site superintendent whether the applicant had passed the test, with a recommendation for or against his qualification and employment as a welder. Most of his recommendations were followed, according to McMillan.

Another issue is whether McMillan tested welders and made recommendations after Mullins took over the job. Part of the testing involved X-ray analysis of the welds done by the applicant. Asked whether any tests of welders were conducted after Mullins took over from Mulberry, McMillan "guessed" that none had been conducted, but then expressed doubt that all the X-ray results were back by the time of the takeover. Other evidence suggests the probability of testing after September 9. Thus, the welding qualification form provides for expiration of the qualification if the employee had not welded for 6 months. The earliest known qualification form is dated July 2, 1981 (R. Exh. 14). Respondent contends that welding work diminished in late 1981, warranting the layoff of welders. On the other hand, Mullins admitted that he had welding work subsequent to December 3, 1981, and McGuire said that two welders were "rehired" in December. As noted above, McMillan was at the jobsite until June 1982. I conclude from this evidence that McMillan made at least some recommendations concerning the qualifications of welders subsequent to the time that Mullins took over the job on September 9, 1981.

As appears hereinafter, an employee engaged in work was asked by McMillan to get a union card which was located in the employee's automobile. The employee stopped working, obtained the card, and gave it to McMillan.

b. Legal analysis

The Board has concluded with judicial approval that an employer was responsible for the actions of a safety director where it appeared to employees that his comments "carried some weight with respect to their employment." Cumberland Farms Dairy, 258 NLRB 900 fn. 3 (1981), enfd. as modified 674 F.2d 943 (1st Cir. 1982). It is obvious that McMillan's recommendations concerning the employment of welders, based on the test results, carried "some weight" with respect to their employment. Indeed, his recommendations were followed most of the time. Moreover, one employee perceived McMillan as having sufficient authority to warrant the employee's leaving work to get McMillan a union card. I conclude under these circumstances that Respondent is responsible for McMillan's actions.

C. The Alleged Violations of Section 8(a)(1)

1. The facts

a. Terry Jones

(1) Summary of the evidence

The complaint does not allege any violations of the Act prior to September 1981. However, some of the evidence adduced at the hearing relates to events allegedly having taken place prior to that month, i.e., during Mulberry's tenure. The General Counsel's apparent position is that this constitutes background evidence.

Randall Walker testified that Jones asked him in August whether he had signed a union card. "No, not yet," Walker replied. In another conversation in August, Jones told employees that Edwards "would be an all-right guy if he wasn't a union man," according to Walker. Jones denied making this statement, but asserted that he heard another employee make it.

One of employee Leslie Heath's affidavits affirms that Jones asked him several times in August whether he was for the Union, and Heath replied, "Yes, one hundred percent." Heath signed a union card in August, and asked 10–15 other employees to join the Union. Seville and Jones were present during one of these discussions in August or September.[14]

[14] G.C. Exh. 3. During the hearing in July 1982, the General Counsel represented that Heath was ill with a heart attack and requested admission of his affidavit under Rule 804(b)(5) of the Federal Rules of Evidence. The General Counsel acknowledged, however, that he had not complied with the requirement of that rule that he give advance notice to Respondent and argued that he was precluded from giving Respondent a copy of the affidavit by Sec. 102.118 of the Board's Rules and Regulations. During the recess between the hearing dates on July 28 and October 5, I received Heath's affidavit into evidence on condition that he still be unavailable as a witness on the date the hearing resumed and directed the General Counsel to give a copy to Respondent. Respondent appealed this ruling, which was sustained by the Board. On October 5, the date the hearing resumed, it appeared that Heath had died during the recess. The General Counsel stated that he had complied with my order. I thereupon reaffirmed, during the hearing on October 5, my prior ruling, and two of Heath's affidavits were received, dated October 2, 1981, and January 15, 1982, respectively (G.C. Exhs. 3 and 4). Respondent submitted evidence to contradict some of Heath's averments.

Randall Walker described conversations about the Union with employees, including Jones, in August and September. The Union had started its campaign, and Edwards had given Walker a union card. The first conversations took place in the lunchroom. Jones was "putting the Union down," and Walker on two occasions said that he had been a member of the Steelworkers Union in Tennessee, and that he did not see anything wrong with the Union. Edwards corroborated this testimony. In the first part of September, after Mullins had taken over the job, according to Walker, Jones approached him at his work station and asked whether Barry Edwards was trying to get Walker to sign a union card. Walker replied, "Yes." About a week later, while driving to work with Jones and employee Johnny Williams, Walker asked Jones how the Union worked, and Jones replied that the employees would probably lose their jobs if they voted the Union in.

Jones agreed that he rode to work with Walker and Johnny Williams, but denied that the former ever asked him to explain the Union. They would talk about the Union, Williams testified, and Walker gave the impression that he was against it. Jones denied threatening any employees with loss of jobs. He agreed that he had a conversation with Walker about Edwards' union activities, but gave a different version of it. According to Jones, Walker came to him one day and said that Edwards was talking to Walker about the Union.

Employee Jerry Eisenzimmer testified that Jones asked him about the first of September whether he supported the Union, and Eisenzimmer replied affirmatively. Eisenzimmer's pretrial statement indicates that this conversation took place prior to the Mullins takeover. Jones denied having this conversation.

Employee Douglas Lee averred that Jones told employees on top of a revolving rig in late September, i.e., after the Mullins takeover and the September 24 layoffs, that he would not have anything to do with the Union himself, because North Carolina Phosphate had given the company the first chance to do the job as long as it kept the Union out, and bringing the Union in would mean that Jones could not work "with Carolina Phosphate." Jones admitted having this conversation but contended that what he said was that he intended to "get out of construction" and take a job with North Carolina Phosphate and, therefore, saw no reason to get a union book. He mentioned the cost of union dues.

Barry Edwards testified to a conversation with Jones in the first week of September, i.e., probably under Mulberry. Jones told him that the union organizer on the day shift had been fired, and asked Edwards what chance he had organizing the night shift. Union Organizer James Phillips in fact had been fired, according to Edwards.

Edwards affirmed that employees normally engaged in conversation during working time when it did not interfere with work. He testified that he talked to employees about the Union under these circumstances. In late September, according to Edwards, i.e., under Mullins, Jones told him that he would have to quit talking about the Union on company time. About the same time, Jones asked Edwards how many organizers he had, how many people supported the Union, and whether Edwards thought he would be able to get a union onto the job. Edwards replied that he thought he could get a union in, and that the rest of the information was privileged. Jones denied prohibiting Edwards or anyone else from talking about the Union during working hours.

One of Heath's affidavits[15] avers that Lee, "around the beginning of September," said that he would never join a union, that he would cross a picket line, and admonished Heath to "look at all the money you'd lose like the people picketing down at New Bern." I infer that Heath referred to statements allegedly made prior to the Mullins takeover. The affidavit thereafter states that "sometime in September" Jones asked Heath whether he was going to join the Union, and Heath replied that he would if it would benefit his pocketbook. From the sequence of allegations in the affidavit, I infer that Heath was alleging an event which took place after September 9, i.e., after the takeover. "During the week of September 28," the affidavit also relates, Jones noted that Edwards had been laid off, and asked whether Heath would carry on for the Union or take Edwards' place. According to his affidavits, Heath replied, "Whatever will turn me on," or "Yes, if it becomes necessary."

In addition to the specific denials listed above, Jones was asked on direct examination whether he had ever interrogated employees concerning their union activities and sympathies. He replied, "Not that I recollect." Asked whether he had ever interrogated other employees concerning the union sympathies of other employees, Jones answered, "No, I don't think so."

(2) Factual analysis

Walker's testimony about the lunchroom conversations in August and September was not contradicted. I credit it and find that Walker stated in Jones' presence on two occasions that he had been a member of another union, and saw nothing wrong with the Union. I do not credit Jones' account of the conversations with Walker and Williams during the automobile ride, since it is unbelievable, in light of my prior finding, that Walker could have given the impression that he was opposed to the Union. Inasmuch as Jones was thus an unreliable witness, I credit Walker's account of the conversation and find that Jones, after September 9, told employees that they would probably lose their jobs if they voted the Union in.

Since Walker was a union supporter, it is also improbable, as Jones contended, that Walker would have come to the welding foreman with a statement that Edwards was talking to Walker about the Union. I credit Walker's account of this conversation, and find that Jones, after September 9, asked Walker whether Edwards was trying to get Walker to sign a union card.

Jones' account of the conversation on top of the revolving rig with Lee and other employees admits essential elements of Lee's version of the conversation—Jones' desire to work with North Carolina Phosphate, and the relationship of the Union to this goal. I credit Lee's addition of the missing element—that Jones said bringing the Union onto the Aurora jobsite would mean that Jones could not obtain employment with North Carolina Phosphate. I also find that this conversation took place after September 9.

Jones was a less reliable witness than Edwards, and I do not credit his denial that he prohibited Edwards from talking about the Union during working hours. Accordingly, I find that, subsequent to Mullins' takeover of the job, Jones told Edwards that he could not talk about the Union during working hours, while it was customary practice for employees to talk about other subjects during working hours. I also reject Jones' general denial of interrogation, and find that, subsequent to September 9, he asked Edwards how many organizers he had, how many people supported the Union, and whether Edwards thought he would be able to get a union onto the job.

I also credit Heath's uncontradicted averments that, subsequent to September 9, Jones asked Heath whether he was going to join the Union, and, after Edwards' layoff, whether Heath was going to "carry on the Union."

I also credit the General Counsel's evidence in the following instances, and find that each took place prior to September 9: Jones' asking Walker whether he had signed a union card yet; Jones' telling employees that he did not see anything wrong with the Union; Jones' asking Eisenzimmer whether he supported the Union, and Eisenzimmer's reply that he did; Jones' telling Edwards that the organizer on the day shift had been fired, and asking him what chance he had to organize the night shift; Jones' asking Heath whether he was for the Union, and Heath's replying, "Yes, one hundred percent"; and Jones' advising Heath to look at all the money pickets were losing at another location.

b. Terry Seville and John Brooks

Douglas Lee affirmed that on September 24, after Edwards had been laid off, another employee informed Seville that Edwards had been passing out union information in the yard. Seville inquired about the nature of the information, and Lee told him that it was an "authorization for a representation card." Seville said that he would like to see one, and another employee brought a card to Seville a few days later. Seville looked at it, and said that he did not need it any more, that the "problem had been taken card of." A short time later Seville asked Lee what kind of cards Edwards was distributing, and Lee gave the same answer. This testimony was partially corroborated by Seville, and I credit it.

Lee was laid off on December 3, 1981. He testified that, about 2 or 3 weeks before that event, i.e., in mid-November, he was wearing a union cap at a party. Seville and Brooks were in attendance at the party. According to Lee, Brooks asked him where he managed to get the hat, saying that he had been unable to get one even though he was a union member. Seville then walked over and asked Lee whether Edwards had given him that hat. Lee replied affirmatively. Seville then asked whether Lee had to "sign one of those little blue cards" to get the hat. Lee replied that he had signed a card "a long time ago." I credit this testimony, which was corroborated by Brooks and Seville. I infer that Seville, by his reference to "little blue cards," meant union cards. Seville asserted that the reason for his inquiry was the fact that he collects hats as a hobby, wanted one like the hat Lee was wearing.

c. Robert McMillan

Rodney Gibbs testified that Lee was handing out union cards at the gate in "late November." The next day McMillan asked employees, including Gibbs, whether they had received union cards. This took place in the shelter where the welding tests were given. Gibbs replied that he had received one, and McMillan asked where it was. Gibbs replied that it was in his car, and McMillan told him to get it. Gibbs did not do so at the time, and went back to work. Later in the day, when Gibbs was working, McMillan again asked him to get the card. Gibbs complied, and gave the card to McMillan.

McMillan first testified that he had no recoilection of this event, and then said: "I am going to state that it didn't happen. I don't remember it ever happening." McMillan contended that he received a card in early July while going through the gate. McMillan's denial is inconclusive and Gibbs' version shows that he had superior recollection of the event. I credit the latter's testimony, and, in light of McMillan's authority, consider his request to Gibbs—to get the union card—to be an order.

2. Legal analysis

The evidence thus shows that, subsequent to September 9, 1981, Respondent asked its employees: (1) to describe union information being distributed to employees; (2) whether one employee was trying to get another employee to sign a union card; (3) whether employees had received union cards; (4) whether employees supported or intended to join the Union; (5) after the layoff of the leading union activist, whether another employee intended to "carry on the Union"; and (6) where an employee had obtained a union hat, whether a specific employee who was a union activist had given it to him, and whether the employee had to sign a union card to get it. The first five inquiries conveyed to employees Respondent's displeasure with the union activity at the jobsite and were, therefore, coercive. The same reasoning applies to McMillan's order to Gibbs to give one of the cards to McMillan. Accordingly, these inquiries and order violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.[16]

Respondent argues the innocence of the various inquiries grouped under number 6 above because of Seville's asserted hobby of collecting hats. I do not accept this argument. Brooks professed no such hobby, and there is no evidence that Seville stated his hobby as the alleged reason when he asked Lee the question. Therefore, nothing was said to offset the inherently coercive nature of the questions. Nor is there any good reason for the questions about Edwards and the signing of union cards. Accordingly, I find that such questions also violated Section 8(a)(1).

Jones' statement to Walker and other employees—that they would probably lose their jobs if they voted the Union in—was coercive under established Board law, and I so find. Jones' statement to Lee and other employees—that Jones could not get a job, with North Carolina Phosphate if the Union came onto the Aurora jobsite—must be interpreted in light of Respondent's other unlawful conduct, and Jones' threat concerning loss of jobs made to Walker and other employees, which threat, I find, preceded the statement to Lee. Even though the latter ostensibly concerned only Jones' employment prospects with North Carolina Phosphate, in the context of the preceding events the employees could reasonably interpret Jones' statement as meaning that their own jobs with Mullins, or Mullins' continued presence on the jobsite, would be endangered if they selected the Union as their collective-bargaining representative. Accordingly, Jones' statement to Lee and other employees was also violative of Section 8(a)(1).

Jones' telling Edwards that he could not talk about the Union during working time was a discriminatory no-solicitation rule because it did not prohibit employee conversation about other subjects during such time. The rule was promulgated after the commencement of union activities in which Edwards played a leading role. Accordingly, it discouraged employees from engaging in union activities, and thereby violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Pedro's Restaurant, 246 NLRB 567, 573, 583 (1979), enfd. as modified 652 F.2d 1005 (D.C. Cir. 1981).

D. The Alleged Violations of Section 8(a)(3)

1. Evidence of adverse working conditions

The General Counsel elicited evidence of adverse working conditions selectively applied against Edwards and Walker. There is no complaint allegation concerning this evidence, and the General Counsel's apparent intention was to establish discriminatory motivation with respect to Edwards' and Walker's layoffs. The evidence concerns "overhead welding," and the measures used to ameliorate its rigors. According to Walker, in this kind of welding the employee is lying down on an "angled" chair, welding over his head with the sparks falling down on him. The parties differed over the issues of alleged rotation of this work among employees and protective clothing used to guard against the sparks.

Walker testified that, during Mulberry's tenure, Seville told Walker that it was company policy to rotate jobs among employees; that this policy continued under Mullins; and that Walker saw overhead welding jobs being rotated under Mullins. Edwards asserted that Superintendent Ryder told him under Mulberry that employees were rotated from one job to the next, and that Mullins told employees at the time of the takeover there would be no change in working conditions. However, Foreman Brooks said that, as far as he knew, there was no policy on rotation of jobs, and Jones gave similar testimony. Brooks' and Jones' testimonies do not meet the specific averments of Walker and Edwards, and the latter are probably accurate because they reflect an employment practice which was reasonable. Moreover, they are consistent with the authority of Brooks and Jones to switch employees from job to job. I conclude that Mulberry and Mullins had a policy of rotating job to job. I conclude that Mulberry and Mullins had a policy of rotating among employees, particularly jobs which are onerous, such as overhead welding.

In addition to job rotation, both Mulberry and Mullins utilized protective clothing against the sparks. This consisted of leather sleeves, vests, and aprons.

Edwards testified that, shortly after Jones' promotion to welding foreman, i.e., under Mulberry, he was placed on overhead welding under "the tub." He asked for protective clothing, and Jones replied, "This ain't no union job and we ain't got to furnish you none." Jones first testified that Edwards asked for a set of welding sleeves, but that he said, "They don't furnish them." However, Jones asserted, "If a man needed a pair he could go get a pair." Then, Jones "offered Barry a pair when we were welding under the tub," but Edwards failed to get them. This testimony from Jones is contradictory and unintelligible, and I credit Edwards.

Edwards asserted that he was given some job rotation, but on some occasions he was left on overhead welding as much as 7 days in a row. Walker testified that three employees, Walker, Edwards, and one other, were not rotated as frequently as other employees. Edwards protested to Jones and Seville, but was told that the overhead welding had to be done. In the middle of September, i.e., under Mullins, Edwards asked what it would take to get off the overhead welding job. Would he have to burn his union card? Seville replied, "No comment," and Jones, laughing, said that "it might help." Jones testified that there was a "lot of joking" going around, and that he might have said this. I credit Edwards.

Edwards was assigned to welding the revolving frame in mid-September. He asked for protective clothing, and Jones replied: "This ain't no union job. How many times do I have to tell you we ain't going to furnish you none." Edwards complained that Jones was "discriminating" against him. The two of them then went to Seville, who arranged for Edwards to weld on top of the frame. Jones testified that he "didn't think" he was discriminating against Edwards.

It started to rain, and Jones put all employees except Edwards in a protected position inside the frame. Edwards got wet, informed Jones that he was not going to work in the rain, and went home after arranging to clock out.

I conclude that Respondent gave Edwards and Walker more onerous work assignments than those given to other employees.

2. The continuation of the union campaign—the union sympathies of Edwards, Walker, and Eisenzimmer

Edwards continued to engage in union activities throughout the change in contractors from Mulberry to Mullins. He obtained 10 to 12 signed union cards after the Mullins takeover. On September 21, the Charging Party's attorney signed unfair labor charges against Mullins, Mulberry, and North Carolina Phosphate.[17] The next day, September 22, Edwards informed Foreman Jones that he had filed the charges. On the following day, September 23, Edwards distributed handbills to Respondent's employees at its front gate. On the day after, September 24, he was laid off.

As noted above, Edwards had given Walker a union card, and Jones interrogated Walker about it. Also as noted, Walker spoke up for the Union in the lunchroom when Jones was "putting it down." Further, Walker told Jones that he had been a member of another labor organization and saw nothing wrong with the Union.

Eisenzimmer signed a union card when Mulberry was the contractor and gave it to Edwards. He signed another card when Mullins became the contractor. Walker testified that he did not see Eisenzimmer manifest any inclinations for or against the Union. However, as set forth above, Eisenzimmer told Jones that he supported the Union. He also testified credibly that he rode to work "every day" with Barry Edwards, and that company supervisors saw him doing so. Since he did this every day, I infer that this took place under both Mulberry and Mullins. Edwards testified on cross-examination that Eisenzimmer wore a union hat on several occasions.

Mullins, McGuire, and Seville admitted knowledge of Edwards' union sympathies, but denied knowing that Walker or Eisenzimmer had the same sentiments. I reject this latter contention. The evidence is unmistakable in the case of Walker. Although he himself was unaware of similar sentiments on the part of Eisenzimmer, this does not negate the evidence which clearly establishes that Respondent was also aware of Eisenzimmer's union sympathies.

3. The September 24 layoffs

According to Edwards, Respondent laid off six employees on September 24—Edwards, Walker, Eisenzimmer, Guy Jeanette, Russell Caroway, and a sixth employee whose first name was "Joe." Although only two of them had signed cards prior to the layoffs, all were union supporters, according to Edwards. Caroway told Edwards the day before the layoff that he was seriously considering signing a card, and Joe attempted to sign one after the layoff—an attempt which Edwards rejected because it did not take place during Joe's employment.[18]

According to Walker, he was assigned to the night shift on September 24. He was laid off without advance notice at 5 p.m. together with the other employees by Site Superintendent McGuire. The latter told the employees to turn in their gear and get off the premises as soon as possible. The employees were not allowed to complete the shift. According to Walker, McGuire told them that they were being laid off because of lack of work. Walker was then welding a revolving frame, and said that about 60 percent of this work had been completed. Edwards was also working on the revolving frame, said that it was unfinished, and was told that he had no job and to get off the premises immediately.

Eisenzimmer gave similar testimony—McGuire told them that most of the welding work had been completed, and that the employees were not needed any more. Eisenzimmer said that there were 2 to 3 days of work left on the job on which he had been working.

Seville gave reasons for the lack of notice of the layoff and the employees' rapid departure from the jobsite after the layoff. As to the first, he said that advance notice makes an employee "edgy," and the employer gets no work out of him thereafter. He also said that it was his experience to ask people to leave as soon as they were dismissed. McGuire averred that the employees were given "showup" pay for 2 hours on the day of the layoff. As for the degree of completion of the work, McGuire estimated "total machine completion at approximately 30 percent by September 24. The welding phase of the work involved two projects—assembly and welding of the "tub" and the "revolving frame." McGuire said that the tub was completely welded by September 24, and that the welding of the revolving frame was 30 to 40 percent completed. This is even less than Walker's estimate.

Site Superintendent McGuire described Edwards as an "excellent welder," while Assistant Site Superintendent Seville said that he was a "very good welder and he worked." Employee Douglas Lee affirmed that Foreman Jones, during the above-described conversation with employees in late September on top of a revolving rig, said that he "would hate to see Barry go because he was a good welder." Jones could put him on a job, and "he would go and do the job." However, Jones added, Edwards "had to go because he was a union organizer." Jones denied saying this. As noted above, I have credited Lee's version of the "revolving rig" conversation, and I also credit his testimony concerning Jones' statement about Edwards during this conversation. Lee's testimony is consistent with supervisory assessments of Edwards' ability, and Lee was a more reliable witness than Jones.

4. The December 3 layoffs

As set forth above, Jones asked Heath in August whether he was for the Union, and Heath answered, "Yes, 100 percent." Heath solicited other employees to join the Union in the presence of supervisors. Later, in September, Jones asked Heath whether he was going to join the Union, and Heath replied that he would do so if it would benefit his pocketbook. After Edwards was laid off, Jones asked Heath whether he was going to take Edwards' place, and Heath answered affirmatively.

Lee testified that, after Edwards was let go, he started "taking up where Barry left off." He distributed handbills, solicited union cards, and wore a union hat, about which Seville and Brooks interrogated him in mid-November.

Gibbs received two union cards, and talked to several employees about the Union. In late November, when

[17] G.C. Exh. 1(a); R. Exhs. 2 and 3. The charges were received and filed by the Board on September 24.

[18] Respondent points to Edwards' pretrial affidavit in which he said that four out of the six employees laid off were union supporters. Walker expressed a similar opinion. However, Edwards gave the reasons described above to explain his judgment that Caroway and Joe might also be appropriately described as union supporters. I do not consider this to be a contradiction of sufficient importance to impeach Edwards' credibility.

McMillan asked employees whether they had received union cards, Gibbs said that he had received one, and McMillan ordered him to get it.

As in the cases of Walker and Eisenzimmer, Respondent's witnesses denied knowledge of the union "affiliations" of Heath, Lee, and Gibbs. I reject this testimony. It is clear that all three employees were supporters of the Union, and that Respondent knew this fact.

The Company laid off Lee, Gibbs, and Heath on December 3, 1981.[19] About six other employees were laid off at the same time. About 3 p.m. on December 3, when the employees were on break, McGuire said that some employees would get an envelope with two checks and some with one check. Those with two checks were to turn in their equipment and get off the premises immediately. There had been no advance notice, and McGuire did not give any reason for the layoff, according to the uncontradicted testimonies of Lee and Gibbs. One of Heath's affidavits states that the layoff made no sense—he was then cutting holes for electrical wire, and there were 6 to 8 months of work left on the job (G.C. Exh. 3). McGuire testified that the "total machine" was 50 to 60 percent complete by the time that the welding on the tub was complete, and welding on the revolving frame was 90 percent complete.

5. Respondent's economic defense

As stated by Mullins, Respondent decided to lay off employees as phases of the work were completed. The entire project was finished by July 14, 1982, at which time everyone was gone except some maintenance employees. The alleged discriminatees were those selected for these phased layoffs for business rather than discriminatory reasons. Mullins asked McGuire for "manpower study" on taking over the job in September 1981.

McGuire testified that his study resulted in a conclusion that a reduction in force was necessary, taking into consideration the projected completion date and the degree of work which had been done. He and Mullins decided on "productivity" as the factor to be determinative in the selection of employees to be laid off. There were no records on productivity, and McGuire did not make any as a result of his investigation. He asked himself, "Who is most productive?" He kept a list, and relied on reports from Seville and Jones. Seville, however, denied that McGuire ever asked him to observe the productivity of employees for layoff purposes and denied that he reported on this to McGuire. On the other hand, Seville said that he made a study of productivity "in a sense," and reported his "feelings" about the alleged discriminatees to McGuire. However, he could not remember what his feelings were with respect to other employees.

McGuire's testimony on productivity in relevant part is as follows:

> The same criteria was used [sic] every time we laid off people—overall productivity, what we were getting out of people. I must say, though, that the people who were selected, I didn't say "this person is less productive, and this one is less productive, and so is this one." I said, "Who is most productive?" And I made my list there and I said, "Here is how many I can afford to keep. Who's at the top of the list?" And you come down here, and the ones at the bottom. I decided that 6 were going, or 10 were going . . . . It doesn't mean he isn't a good worker, it means I may not have considered him to be one of the best overall performers.

McGuire added that he considered quality and quantity of work performed, attendance records, "general attitude," and "personal problems" which might affect productivity.

McGuire said that he personally observed each of the 26 welders on the day shift for a minimum period of 5 minutes to 1 hour each day. On the other hand, the site superintendent also testified that he considered only the qualifications of 10 welders and 4 laborers on the night shift for the September 24 layoff. The night shift was selected because of a planned elimination of that shift and because of inadequate lighting. However, a short time after the September 24 layoffs Respondent started running a 12- or 24-hour-a-day, 7-day-a-week "millwright" operation,[20] which must also have had lighting problems. McGuire explained that the problem was too much sunlight rather than too little—the final "machine cuts" could not be made in the heat of the day, and the millwright area had proper lighting. These hours were made necessary by the "field machining" phase of the operation.

Mullins testified that the accelerated millwright operation involved jobs that were "associated with the millwrights. Sometimes there's some small welding that goes along with it." Accordingly, the work was performed by millwrights, laborers, and welders who had "dual classifications."

Mullins said that he did not know whether McGuire had determined the skills of the laid-off employees, and the site superintendent admitted that he was only "partially" familiar with their skills. They were all "qualified," he said, but he had simply determined to make the cuts from the night shift.

With respect to Respondent's contention that phased construction projects such as draglines involve progressive layoffs of employees, Eisenzimmer asserted that such layoffs are usually preceded by notice. Assistant Site Superintendent Seville agreed that it is customary in the construction industry to shift employees from one type of a job to another if they are qualified, since their other skills might be needed on the first job at a later time.

[19] The consolidated complaint alleges the date as September 24—the date of the first three layoffs—and the answer admits this (G.C. Exhs. 1(o) and (q)). At the hearing, the General Counsel moved to amend the date to December 3, and Respondent stated that it had no objection. This motion is granted, and the pleadings thus establish December 3 as the date of the layoff of all three alleged discriminatees, a fact buttressed by the testimonies of Lee and Gibbs and one of Heath's affidavits (G.C. Exh. 3).

[20] Mullins and Lee affirmed that it was 12 hours per day, McGuire said that it was 24 hours.

Barry Edwards testified that he was qualified as a welder, construction boilermaker, rigger, fitter, electrician, aligner, and general laborer. As noted above, McGuire considered him to be an "excellent welder," but noted his complaints about overhead welding and his "unauthorized" departure from work in the rain. Randall Walker, in addition to being a welder, was also qualified as a carpenter and in fitting and setting up machinery. Eisenzimmer qualified in welding, operating a drill rig, and a little "carpentry." McGuire claimed that Walker and Eisenzimmer "barely" passed their welding tests under Mulberry. Eisenzimmer agreed that his overhead welding was deficient under Mulberry, and that he received a reprimand for it, but testified that he thereafter improved and received Ryder's assurances of a job as long as there was work at the project.

Despite the September layoffs, Respondent hired new employees thereafter. Company records show that it hired the following employees after September 24: two welders (December 29, 1981); two operators (October and November 1981); two millwrights (October 1981); two millwright helpers (October 1981); one laborer (December 15, 1981); and four electricians (November 1981; December 7, 1981; January 1982; March 1982) (R. Exh. 7). Mullins claimed that two of these were "rehires." He also admitted that the classifications of some employees were changed when the accelerated operation began in October. Lee identified two of these as Dale Ipock and A. J. Cahoon, and testified that during the accelerated operation in October they were transferred to the millwright operation and were "drilling holes." One of Heath's affidavits states that Ipock and another employee, who were retained, were "known antiunion" employees.[21]

McGuire asserted that the same criteria were used in selecting employees for the December 3 layoff. Gibbs was qualified as a welder. He had been reprimanded twice for lack of production, once under Mulberry and again under Mullins, but McGuire considered him to be "very qualified as a welder." As described above, Respondent had no records on productivity. Lee, employed as a welder, had been in construction work for 15–16 years, and could do "most anything on construction that comes along," including millwright work. McGuire described Lee as a "good welder" and a "good worker." He was laid off because McGuire thought he had a death in the family, and had missed work because of this. Heath's affidavits affirm that he had 21 years' experience as a welder. Respondent never disciplined him. On September 21, Mullins complimented Heath and six other employees, saying that they were the "best men," and that he was going to keep them working "with other trades" when the welding work ran out (G.C. Exh. 3). McGuire admitted that Leslie was a good welder and a good worker, but claimed that he was selected for layoff because he "liked to chat more than he liked to weld."

[21] G.C. Exh. 3. Heath also affirmed that Ipock and the other employee had less welding experience than he did, and Respondent introduced their welding certificates to rebut this (R. Exhs. 13 and 14).

6. Legal conclusions

Respondent's violations of Section 8(a)(1) establish its union animus,[22] and tend to show discriminatory motivation in the layoffs. The evidence is particularly strong in the case of Edwards. He was the leading union activist, a factor tending to establish Respondent's unlawful motive. Comet Corp., 261 NLRB 1414 (1982). The Company had subjected him to working conditions more onerous than those of other employees. Ward Products Corp., 243 NLRB 354 (1979). The timing of events preceding his layoff also supports the General Counsel's case—Edwards' acquisition of signed union cards after the September 9 takeover by Mullins, the filing of the unfair labor practice charge on September 21, Edwards' informing Foreman Jones of this fact on September 22, and Edwards' handbilling at the gate on September 23 followed by his layoff the next day. Injected Rubber Products Corp., 258 NLRB 687, 696 (1981). The fact that Respondent admitted his excellence as an employee but nonetheless laid him off is additional evidence. Boyer Ford Trucks, 254 NLRB 1389, 1396 (1981).

Walker and Eisenzimmer were both known union sympathizers, and Walker, like Edwards, had been subjected to onerous working conditions not applied to other employees. Ward Products Corp., supra. All three employees had been told by Mullins on September 9 that the job would last until the following year, which the employees could reasonably have interpreted as an implied promise of continued employment. The short time interval between Mullins' speech and the September 24 layoffs, coupled with the absence of any warning of a pending layoff, constitutes additional evidence of Respondent's discriminatory intention. Glengarry Contracting Industries, 258 NLRB 1167, 1174 (1981). I reject Seville's argument against such notice—that it makes an employee "edgy," and that the employer thereafter gets no work out of him—and conclude that this was simply manufactured testimony to justify the absence of notice.

The fact that the project was incomplete at the time of the layoffs, and that work remained to be done, is additional evidence.[23] One of the two principal components of the dragline was the revolving frame, and only 30 to 40 percent of the welding on this part had been completed by September 24, according to Site Superintendent McGuire. Edwards, Walker, and Eisenzimmer were all

[22] Although Respondent objected to what the General Counsel called "background evidence" of events under Mulberry, in the absence of any proved connection between Mullins and Mulberry, I have not relied on background evidence, as there is sufficient evidence of events taking place after the Mullins takeover to support the General Counsel's case. It may be noted in passing that knowledge of some of the alleged discriminatees' union activities and sympathies was first acquired under Mulberry by individuals who later became supervisors under Mullins, and that such knowledge must be presumed to have been retained.

Although there is also evidence that North Carolina Phosphate was opposed to having a union at the Aurora jobsite, that Mulberry, a unionized firm, left the job because it could not persuade North Carolina Phosphate to change this policy, and that Mullins was selected by North Carolina Phosphate to take over the job—Respondent calls this the General Counsel's "conspiracy" theory of the case—I have not found it necessary to rely on this evidence.

welders, yet they were laid off. There is no rational business reason for this action. The fact Respondent thereafter hired welders is simply more evidence that it was opposed to the three alleged discriminatees for discriminatory reasons,[24] as is the fact that some of the laid-off employees were recalled. Industrial Erectors, Inc., 261 NLRB 888 (1982).

The accelerated production schedule beginning in October, a few weeks after the September 24 layoffs, shows Respondent's continuing need for employees, and further detracts from its case. Respondent's argument that this was a "millwright" operation, for which it did not need welders, is pure sophistry partially admitted by Mullins. The Company hired welders after September 24. Edwards had many other construction skills, and was an electrician. After getting rid of him, Respondent hired four electricians. Finally, the Company simply reclassified employees for the millwright operation, including Ipock, a welder and a known antiunion employee, further demonstrating its unlawful intention. Daniel Construction Co., 264 NLRB 569 (1982). Eisenzimmer's reprimand for deficient overhead welding under Mulberry, a fault which he corrected, is insignificant in the fact of the General Counsel's evidence.

The record further shows that, after Edwards' layoff, Respondent asked Heath whether he was going to take Edwards' place, while Lee actually did so. One of Lee's activities consisted of handbilling, engaged in at Respondent's front gate in late November. Gibbs also engaged in union activity, and was subjected to coercive interrogation concerning it.

The same pattern of events which preceded the September 24 layoffs is also present in the later layoffs. There was continued union activity and unlawful conduct from Respondent concerning it. Matters came to a head with Lee's handbilling at Respondent's front gate in late November. As in Edwards' case, this was followed almost immediately by the layoff of known union sympathizers. As in the earlier layoffs, this timing suggests unlawful motivation.

Although McGuire attempted to give a reason for the September 24 layoffs—telling employees that there was no more welding work—he did not give any reason to the employees in connection with the December 3 layoffs, thus suggesting Respondent's illegal motive. Acme Die Casting Corp., 262 NLRB 777 (1982).

Respondent's economic defense is no more valid in connection with the later layoffs than it was with respect to the earlier ones. It still had work to be done on the project, and, after the December 3 layoffs, hired two welders, one laborer, and three electricians. Heath, with 21 years' experience in the construction industry and praise on September 21 from Mullins as one of the "best" men, was laid off without notice or reason on December 3. The explanation given at the hearing by McGuire—Heath liked to "chat more than he liked to weld." Respondent's professed reason for the layoff of Lee is even more bizarre. Although he was a "good welder" in McGuire's opinion, and could do almost anything in construction, he was laid off because he suffered the misfortune of a death in the family (presumably, although not certainly, requiring him to take time off for the funeral). Although Gibbs had been twice reprimanded, this could not have been the reason for his layoff in light of McGuire's opinion that he was "very" qualified as a welder.

Respondent may well have reduced its employee complement as the project progressed toward completion.[25] However, the asserted "productivity" criteria for the order of layoffs, enunciated by McGuire, was completely vague and subjective. In lieu of objective standards, Respondent relied on supervisory "feelings" about the alleged discriminatees' "general attitudes" and "personal problems." Seville's inability to remember his "feelings" about other employees, the contradiction between his testimony and McGuire's, and his admission that he made a productivity study only "in a sense" show that the alleged study was a sham. Unlike other enterprises, every construction project comes to an end, one way or another. Respondent seized on this fact to rid itself of known union adherents long before completion of the job.

For these reasons, the General Counsel has established a very strong prima facie case that Respondent discharged all six alleged discriminatees because of their union sympathies and activities. And, for the reasons given above, Respondent has not rebutted that case by showing that they would have been discharged in the absence of those activities or sympathies. Accordingly, I find that Respondent laid off all six employees for the reasons alleged in the consolidated complaint, in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act. Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980).

In accordance with my findings above, I make the following

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. F. Mullins Construction, Inc. is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. Local Lodge 30, International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Ship Builders, Blacksmiths, Forgers & Helpers, AFL–CIO is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By engaging in the following conduct, Respondent committed unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act:

(a) Asking employees whether they had received union cards, whether one employee was trying to get another to sign a card, and the nature of union information being distributed to employees.

[24] Franchet Metal Craft, 262 NLRB 552 (1982); Coil-ACC, Inc., 262 NLRB 76 (1982); Rain-Ware, Inc., 263 NLRB 50 (1982).

[25] Respondent attempted to bolster its case with an appendix attached to its brief assertedly showing a reduction in its employee complement throughout the life of the project. This document was not received at the hearing, and does not constitute part of the record within the meaning of Sec. 102.45 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, since Respondent's brief is not an "answering brief" within the meaning of Sec. 102.46(d) of the Rules. I note in passing that said appendix suggests that Respondent continued to employ millwright workers, electricians, rigger workers, operators, and pipefitter helpers at least until June 1982—skills possessed by some of the discriminatees.

(b) Asking employees whether they supported or intended to join the Union.

(c) After the layoff of the leading union activist, asking another employee whether he intended to "carry on" the Union or lead its organizational efforts.

(d) Asking an employee where he obtained a union hat, whether a specific employee gave it to him, and whether he had to sign a union card to get it.

(e) Directing an employee to give a union card, which he had received from another employee, to a company agent.

(f) Telling employees that they would probably lose their jobs if they voted the Union in.

(g) Telling employees that a supervisor would not be able to find employment with the owner of the site where the employees' employer had been engaged by the owner to perform work if the Union came onto the jobsite.

(h) After the beginning of the union campaign, discriminatorily telling employees that they could not talk about the Union during working time.

4. By laying off Barry Edwards, Randall Walker, and Jerry Eisenzimmer on September 24, 1981, and Leslie Heath, Rodney Gibbs, and Douglas Lee on December 3, 1981, because of their union activities or sympathies, Respondent thereby violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

5. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

6. Respondent has not violated the Act except as herein specified.

THE REMEDY

It having been found that Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, it is recommended that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative actions designed to effectuate the purposes of the Act.

It having been found that Respondent unlawfully laid off Barry Edwards, Randall Walker, and Jerry Eisenzimmer on September 24, 1981, and Leslie Heath, Rodney Gibbs, and Douglas Lee on December 3, 1981, and Leslie Heath having died, it is recommended that Respondent be ordered to offer Barry Edwards, Randall Walker, Jerry Eisenzimmer, Rodney Gibbs, and Douglas Lee immediate and full reinstatement to their former positions or, if those positions no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, dismissing if necessary any employee hired to fill any of said positions, and to make them and the estate of Leslie Heath whole for any loss of earnings they or said estate may have suffered by reason of Respondent's unlawful conduct, by severally paying them and said estate sums of money to the amount each individual would have earned from the date of his unlawful layoff to the date of an offer of reinstatement, and in the case of the estate of Leslie Heath up to and including the quarter in which he died, less net earnings during such period, with interest thereon to be computed on a quarterly basis in the manner established by the Board in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[26] In addition, it is recommended that Respondent be required to expunge from its personnel records all references to its unlawful layoffs of the aforesaid employees, except Heath, and to notify each of them except Heath's estate, in writing, that this action had been taken and that evidence of their unlawful layoffs will not be used as a basis for future personnel actions against them.

I shall also recommend that Respondent be required to post appropriate notices.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[27]

ORDER

The Respondent, F. Mullins Construction, Inc., Aurora, North Carolina, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Asking employees whether they had received union cards, whether certain employees are trying to get other employees to sign union cards, or to describe the nature of union literature being distributed to employees.

(b) Asking employees whether they support or intend to join the Union, or any other labor organization.

(c) Asking employees whether they intend to "carry on" or lead the union organizational efforts.

(d) Asking employees where they obtained union hats or other union paraphernalia, whether specific employees gave such items to them, and whether they had to sign union authorization cards in order to get them.

(e) Directing employees to give union cards to company agents.

(f) Telling employees that they would probably lose their jobs if they voted the Union in.

(g) Telling employees that a supervisor would not be able to obtain employment with the owner of the site where the employees' employer had been engaged by the owner to perform work if the Union came onto the jobsite.

(h) Discriminatorily telling employees after the beginning of a union campaign that they may not talk about the Union during working time.

(i) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer Barry Edwards, Randall Walker, Jerry Eisenzimmer, Rodney Gibbs, and Douglas Lee immediate and full reinstatement to their former positions or, if those positions no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges, discharging if necessary any employee hired to replace any of them, and make them and the estate of Leslie Heath whole for any loss of earnings any of them or said estate may have suffered by reason of Respondent's discrimination against them and Heath, in the manner described in the section of this decision entitled "The Remedy."

[27] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

(b) Expunge from its personnel records, or other files of the aforesaid individuals, any reference to their unlawful layoffs, and notify them, except the estate of Leslie Heath, in writing, that this action has been taken and that evidence of their unlawful layoffs will not be used as a basis for future personnel actions against them.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at the North Carolina Phosphate jobsite at Aurora, North Carolina, if any of its employees are still employed there, and mail to each of its employees at any time employed on that jobsite, to his or her last known address, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[28] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 11, after being signed by Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that insofar as the complaint alleges violations of the Act not specifically found herein it is hereby dismissed.

14 December 1984

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN, HUNTER, AND DENNIS

On 4 March 1982 Administrative Law Judge Walter H. Maloney Jr. issued the attached decision. The General Counsel and the Respondent filed exceptions and supporting briefs, and the Respondent filed a brief in answer to the General Counsel's exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions,[2] except as modified below, and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.[3]

We agree with the judge's conclusions that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5), (3), and (1) of the Act by unilaterally instituting a formalized progressive disciplinary system based on discriminatory consideration and by unilaterally promulgating an employee handbook which, among other things, memorialized that system and invited employees to take unresolved grievances directly to representatives of management, thereby circumventing the newly certified Union with whom it has a statutory duty to bargain.[4]

We disagree, however, with the judge's finding that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by granting a wage increase. This violation was not alleged in the complaint, argued at the hearing, or urged in the General Counsel's brief to the judge. Thus, because the Respondent was deprived of notice and an opportunity to litigate the issue, we reverse the judge's finding that the Respondent thereby committed an unfair labor practice. See Cardivan Co., 271 NLRB 563 (1984).[5]

Having found that the Respondent disciplined employees in accordance with its unilaterally instituted progressive disciplinary system, discussed above, the judge recommended, among other things, that the Respondent be required to make whole those employees affected, as a means of restoring the status quo ante. In his complaint, the General Counsel alleged that the Respondent unlawfully "instituted" the offending disciplinary system. Thereafter, 19 days before hearing, the General Counsel amended the complaint by notifying the Respondent that:

> . . . the General Counsel intends to request, as part of an appropriate remedy for the unfair labor practices herein, that Respondent make whole employees for any discipline or lost wages suffered by employees . . . as a result of Respondent's instituting a policy for suspending or disciplining employees for tardiness, absenteeism and leaving work early.

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

The Respondent also alleges bias on the part of the judge based solely on the judge's reference to one of the Respondent's witnesses, whose testimony on a particular matter was not found worthy of belief, as having "botched his lines badly." We find this allegation to be totally without merit.

[2] In finding that the Respondent discriminatorily discharged employee Lewis in violation of Sec. 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act, we rely on the following reasons, as well as those set forth by the judge. Lewis was a well-known, active union supporter who had been identified as the employees' likely choice for union steward. He had never been warned about his attendance. While other discharged employees were permitted to return if their foreman agreed, Lewis was told it would be futile to seek reinstatement because Ross, the Respondent's manager, did not want Lewis working for him. Ross, who apparently made the decision to discharge Lewis, did not ordinarily participate in such decisions. (Both Ross and another of the Respondent's witnesses, McGee, each testified that he made the decision to terminate Lewis. Such inconsistent testimony lends further support to the judge's finding of unlawful motive.) Finally, the Respondent threatened to and did fire another vocal union activist, Maden, and discharged Lewis within days of the Union's certification as the employees' collective-bargaining representative.

Having adopted the judge's conclusion that employee Lewis was discriminatorily discharged in violation of Sec. 8(a)(3) of the Act, Members Hunter and Dennis deem it unnecessary to reach the question as to whether Lewis' discharge also violated Sec. 8(a)(4). In their view, such a finding would be cumulative.

For the reasons stated by the judge, Member Zimmerman would find the additional violation. He considers such a finding necessary, in applying the Board's remedial powers, to fully restore the status quo ante.

[3] Certain inadvertent errors in the judge's decision have been noted and corrected.

We also correct the judge's erroneous finding that Lewis missed eight Mondays in 1980. The accurate figure is 12 to 13 Mondays.

[4] Inasmuch as Member Dennis agrees that the Respondent unilaterally instituting a new disciplinary system for absenteeism and tardiness violated Sec. 8(a)(5) and (1), she finds it unnecessary to consider whether that same conduct also violated Sec. 8(a)(3). As a practical matter, such a finding and any additional remedy would be cumulative.

[5] Member Zimmerman finds, as did the judge, that the Respondent's granting of a unilateral wage increase was fully litigated. The facts surrounding the violation were conceded by the Respondent's plant manager. During cross-examination the judge asked Plant Manager Swartz if employees had received wage increases in the preceding 18-month period. Swartz admitted that management decided to grant its employees a general cost-of-living increase in September 1981 and that lower paid personnel were given an additional increase. No objection was taken to this line of questioning, and Swartz' testimony stands uncontroverted. The Respondent also admitted that, despite the existence of a Board certification, it has refused to bargain with the Union. Thus, unlike the situation in Cardivan Co., there is here an admission of the facts constituting the unlawful conduct. Member Zimmerman, therefore, would affirm the judge's conclusion that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by making increases in wages without notifying the Union and offering to bargain with it.

In these circumstances, the Respondent was plainly apprised that it faced potential economic liability for the consequences flowing from its implementation of the disciplinary system here found unlawful. The Respondent's records bearing on the implementation were subpoenaed and, without objection, adduced into evidence by the General Counsel. Aided by these evidentiary tools, it is appropriate to determine the extent of the Respondent's liability at the compliance stage of this proceeding.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, Harvard Folding Box Co., Inc., Lynn, Massachusetts, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Delete paragraph 1(c) and reletter the subsequent paragraphs.

2. Substitute the following for paragraph 1(e).

"(e) Unilaterally instituting bonus plans, or changing bonus plans, without first notifying the Union of the proposed changes and offering to bargain collectively with it concerning such changes; provided that nothing in the Order shall be construed to require the Respondent to decrease the compensation of any employee."

3. Substitute the following for paragraph 2(b).

"(b) Rescind and cease giving effect to any and all changes in disciplinary procedures and work rules which were announced to employees about 3 June 1980, or which were included in an employee handbook which was distributed about 1 August 1981; expunge from employee personnel records any notices or warnings which were given as a result of the adoption of such rules and procedures; and notify those employees affected that this has been done and that the evidence thus expunged will not be used as a basis for future personnel action against them."

4. Insert the following as paragraph 2(e) and reletter the subsequent paragraphs.

"(e) Expunge from their files any reference to the terminations of George Maden and Robert Lewis and notify Maden and Lewis in writing that this has been done and that evidence of their unlawful terminations will not be used as a basis for future personnel actions against them."

5. Substitute the attached notice for that of the administrative law judge.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT tell employees that they will be fired because they have voted for the Union.

WE WILL NOT discourage membership in or activities on behalf of Boston Local No. 600, Graphic Arts International Union, AFL–CIO–CLC, or any other labor organization, by discharging employees, unilaterally instituting disciplinary rules and procedures, or otherwise discriminating against them in their hire or tenure.

WE WILL NOT make unilateral changes in bonus plans, disciplinary procedures, grievance procedures, or any other term or condition of employment without notifying the Union and affording it an opportunity to bargain collectively concerning such proposed changes.

WE WILL NOT by any other means or in any other manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed to them by Section 7 of the Act. These rights include the right to form, join, or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in concerted activities for their mutual aid and protection.

WE WILL cease giving effect to any changes in work rules and disciplinary procedures which were announced to employees about 3 June 1980, or which are contained in an employee handbook which was distributed about 1 August 1981, and WE WILL expunge from employee personnel records any disciplinary warnings which were given as a result of the adoption of such rules and procedures. WE WILL NOT discharge or suspend employees pursuant to the provisions of illegally instituted disciplinary rules or procedures, WE WILL offer full and immediate reinstatement to any employee who has been discharged pursuant to illegally instituted disciplinary procedures, and WE WILL make whole any employees who have been suspended or discharged pursuant to such procedures, with interest.

WE WILL recognize and bargain collectively with Boston Local No. 600, Graphic Arts International Union, AFL–CIO–CLC as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of all our production and maintenance employees, including truck drivers, employed at our Lynn, Massachusetts plant, exclusive of office clerical employees, sales employees, professional employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

WE WILL offer to George Maden and to Robert Lewis immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or any other rights or privileges which they previously enjoyed and WE WILL make them whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits resulting from their discharges, less any net interim earnings, plus interest.

WE WILL expunge from our files any reference to the terminations of George Maden and Robert Lewis and WE WILL notify them in writing that this has been done and that evidence of their unlawful terminations will not be used as a basis for future personnel actions against them.

HARVARD FOLDING BOX CO., INC.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

WALTER H. MALONEY JR., Administrative Law Judge. This case came on for hearing before me at Boston, Massachusetts, on an unfair labor practice complaint,[1] issued by the Regional Director for Region 1 of the Board and amended thereafter, which alleges that Respondent Harvard Folding Box Co., Inc.[2] violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), (4), and (5) of the Act. More particularly, the amended complaint alleges that Respondent told an employee that he was going to be discharged because of his union sympathies, discharged employees Robert Lewis and George Maden because of their membership in and activities on behalf of the Union, and refused to bargain collectively with the Union by unilaterally instituting a new policy with reference to discipline for absenteeism, unilaterally discontinuing a bonus system, and unilaterally instituting a performance bonus system. The complaint also alleges that the Respondent discharged Lewis because he gave testimony under the Act.

It should be noted that the Union herein was certified and Respondent refused to bargain with it in order to test the certification. The Board issued a bargaining order on December 11, 1981, directing Respondent to honor the certification (259 NLRB 686). Respondent denies the commission of any independent violations of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, claims that Lewis was discharged for chronic absenteeism, and asserts that Maden, in effect, quit by refusing to abide by a company order to work full time rather than part-time. Respondent insists that a disciplinary system and procedure found in a newly promulgated employee handbook merely incorporates in writing the practices of the Employer and thus does not constitute a change in working conditions which warrants bargaining with a certified union. Respondent announced at the hearing in this case that it would pursue its remedies respecting the bargaining order just issued against it in 259 NLRB 686 to the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. On these contentions the issues in this case were drawn.[3]

I. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES ALLEGED

A. Background

Respondent operates a factory in Lynn, Massachusetts, where it manufactures boxes and cartons used by businesses to display and package various products. These boxes are cut to order and are completely fabricated at Respondent's premises from cardboard stock. This fabrication includes the design, cutting, printing, and gluing of the finished product. Respondent's principals are Mel Ross and Al Levine. It employs about 90–95 employees although, at the time the events in this case took place, a temporary upsurge in business required it to employ about 115 persons.

Respondent has never had a collective-bargaining agreement with any labor organization. In the spring of 1980, the Union herein organized its production and maintenance employees, petitioned the Board for a representation election, and won the election conducted on May 29, 1980, by a vote of 52 to 38. Despite the existence of a Board certification and a bargaining order based on that certification, Respondent has yet to bargain with the Union concerning any matter.

B. The Discharges of Robert Lewis and George Maden

One of the principal in-house activists in the union effort was pressman Robert Lewis. Lewis had worked for Respondent since 1962, starting as a helper and working his way into one of the most skilled positions in the plant. He was one of the senior employees at the plant. Respondent's plant manager Michael Swartz, who once was trained in the pressroom by Lewis, described him as one of the most qualified men in that department. As a pressman, Lewis reported to Jay Goldfarb, who in turn reported to Swartz and Plant Superintendent James McGee.

Charge filed herein by Boston Local No. 600, Graphic Arts International Union, AFL–CIO–CLC (the Union), on October 2, 1980; complaint issued by Regional Director for Region 1, on November 17, 1980; Respondent's answer filed on December 24, 1980; amendment to complaint issued on May 28, 1981; Respondent's answer to amendment to complaint filed on June 2, 1981; hearing held in Boston, Massachusetts, on December 14–16, 1981; briefs filed by the General Counsel and Respondent with me on February 16, 1982.

[2] Respondent admits, and I find, that it is a Massachusetts corporation which maintains its principal office and place of business in Lynn, Massachusetts, where it is engaged in the manufacture, sale, and distribution of folding boxes and related products. In the course and conduct of this business, Respondent annually ships from its Lynn, Massachusetts plant directly to points and places located outside the Commonwealth of Massachusetts goods valued in excess of $50,000. Accordingly, Respondent is an employer within the meaning of Sec. 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Sec. 2(5) of the Act.

[3] Certain errors in the transcript are noted and corrected.

Lewis distributed union leaflets from time to time. About May 1, 1980, along with one other employee, he attended a representation case conference on behalf of the Union at the Board office in downtown Boston. At this conference a "stip" election agreement was worked out with Respondent. Lewis then served as the union observer at the election on May 29. At some point in time between the date of the Union's election victory and Lewis' discharge on September 16, Lewis was described by a fellow employee to his supervisor, Goldfarb, as the future shop steward.

The other discriminatee, George "Sandy" Maden, started working for Respondent in 1956. His job was to catalogue, file, and retrieve printing plates and dies and make them available to operating personnel in accordance with job tickets which he received from the front office. He became quite ill in 1976 and, for that reason, was anxious to retain his health insurance benefits with Respondent until he became eligible for Medicare at age 65. Maden, who was approaching the age of 63 in 1979, also desired to retire. He worked out an arrangement with Swartz whereby he would reduce the number of hours worked to 20 to 25 per week and would take a cut in wages from $4.17 to $3 per hour (which was then the minimum wage). In exchange for this cut in pay Respondent would continue to pay Maden's health insurance premium. With the reduction in hours and wages, Maden would then become eligible for monthly social security payments. However, he had to be careful not to earn in excess of $3480 per year or he would lose social security. In 1979, the first full year of this arrangement, Maden earned slightly in excess of $3400.

Late in 1979, Maden approached Swartz to request a raise to $3.50 an hour. His justification for the raise was the increase in the price of gasoline which made it difficult for him to make ends meet on the money he was receiving. Swartz told Maden that he would "get back to him" but, according to Maden, he never did. The first paycheck Maden received in 1980 did not even reflect a 10-cent increase in the minimum wage which went into effect on January 1, 1980. After Maden complained to Swartz about this omission, Respondent complied with the law and began to pay him $3.10 an hour but, despite repeated requests for additional money, Maden was given nothing more. He signed a union card in April during the organizing drive and, on two different occasions, told Swartz and McGee that he hoped the Company would lose the election by one vote because that one vote would be his. He cast a challenged ballot at the election. The challenge was never resolved because it was not determinative of the results.

As noted above, Respondent decided to challenge the results of the election and filed objections claiming that the Union had engaged in misrepresentations during the course of the campaign. On July 3, 1980, the Regional Director issued a report recommending that the objections be overruled in their entirety. On September 11, 1980, the Board adopted the report and certified the Union.

From February 1, 1979, until his discharge on June 17, 1980, Maden normally worked from 7 a.m. to 2 p.m., 4 days a week. He did not work at all on Wednesday. The record is clear that during this period of time he was able to line up and make available to operating personnel in advance of his off time the dies and plates which they normally required. However, it occurred from time to time that a job would suddenly be switched and a different die would have to be pulled immediately and sent to the cutting room or the pressroom. If Maden was absent, someone from the die cutting department would get the die. This task might take 15 minutes and it fell, on occasion, to Dave Katz or to Remo Avellani, the foreman of the die cutting department. Avellani complained to Swartz from time to time about having to do so.[4]

Sometime early in June 1980, William Lemmo, the superintendent in the die cutting department and a friend of Maden, asked Maden if he had told Mel Ross that he had voted for the Union. Maden replied that he did not tell Ross but he had told just about everyone else in the front office. I credit Maden's testimony that Lemmo told Maden that he thought he was going to get "canned" and suggested to Maden that he speak with Ross and explain the circumstances that prompted him to support the Union.[5] Maden's reply was why should he go in and beg for a job which only paid the minimum wage. Lemmo asked Maden on a second occasion if he had spoken with Ross about this question, but Maden had not done so.

Early in June, Maden was told to train David Barcalo, a new employee, to classify, file, and retrieve plates and dies. On June 17, early in the after noon, Lemmo told Maden that he thought he would be "canned" at the end of the week. Maden was scheduled to take a long-planned vacation trip beginning at the end of the week, so he told Lemmo that he was going to take the bull by the horns and go into the front office to announce that he was beginning his vacation at the end of the day instead of on Friday, as originally scheduled. He did so, and when he announced his intention to Swartz, the latter made no reply. When Maden returned to his work station, he saw Lemmo on the phone and overheard Lemmo saying, "Why don't you tell him? I'm not his boss." When Lemmo finished the conversation, he slammed down the phone and told Maden, "Mike Swartz says to tell you that you are all done." Maden picked up his private belongings and immediately left the plant.

I credit Maden's testimony that at no time did Lemmo or anyone else give him any explanation, either orally or in writing, as to the reason for his discharge. I also credit Maden's testimony that at no time did Lemmo or any other supervisor tell him that he could continue to work for the Company if he would do so on a full-time basis. It is true that, in a conversation which took place some days before the discharge, Lemmo had expressed to Maden the opinion that he could think of no reason why the Company might fire him, whereupon Maden had replied that the only excuse that it could use was that he was not a full-time employee.[6]

[5] While denying the specifics of this conversation, Lemmo admits that he told Maden that if he went around shooting his mouth off about the Union Ross would "blast him."

Respondent normally shuts down the plant for a 2-week vacation early in July. In 1980, production schedules were so demanding that while the vacation period was taken much of the plant continued to operate. Lewis was given a 2-week vacation in early July, during which time he injured his back while performing some chores at home. This was not the first time that Lewis had suffered a back injury so he treated it without going to a physician. When the back injury failed to respond quickly enough to permit him to return to work as scheduled, he called his foreman, Jay Goldfarb, and obtained permission to take a third week of the 4 weeks of vacation to which he was entitled. About July 25, Lewis visited the plant, spoke with McGee, told him about the back injury, and said he was ready to come back to work. McGee complained that Lewis was missing a lot of time but said he did not want him to return until he had the approval of a physician. Lewis said this might take some time to obtain since he was not under the care of a physician. McGee then suggested that Lewis go to the Northgate Medical Clinic, to which the Company referred employees, and have an examination performed by a physician at the clinic. Lewis did so and obtained a letter saying that he could return but only to limited duty. McGee said that such a letter was not satisfactory and informed Lewis that he did not want him to return until the doctor could certify that he was able to perform his job without restrictions. After a second examination, Lewis obtained unrestricted clearance to return to work and did so on August 6.

Regardless of the hours which others might work at the plant, Lewis' regular workday was from 7 a.m. to 5:30 p.m., 5 days a week. He refused to work more than a 10-hour day and refused to work on Saturdays, Sundays, or evenings. His regular job was to operate a two-color 40-inch press, the smallest of several presses which Respondent owned.[7] Despite repeated requests over the years from Respondent's management that he change to one of the larger and more elaborate presses, Lewis insisted that he did not want the responsibility associated with operating one of those presses and insisted on working only the smaller two-color machine. When Lewis was absent, Respondent either did not operate the two-color machine, which it kept on hand for certain smaller jobs which its major customers insisted that it perform, or it shifted one of the pressmen assigned to a larger press to operate Lewis' press. Such a personnel shift might entail shutting down the larger machine.

Lewis missed 1 day of work in August after his return to duty. He developed a case of bronchitis and missed the 4 working days in the week following Labor Day. He worked the entire week of September 8–12 but his bronchitis flared up again over the weekend of September 13–14. He called in sick on Monday, September 15. It was at this point that Respondent decided to discharge Lewis. On the following day, when Lewis again called in sick, he spoke with Swartz who informed him of the discharge. Swartz read to Lewis the text of a discharge letter which was later forwarded by mail. The letter read:

> Your employment by this Company is terminated effective today.
> This action is taken because of the numerous occasions on which you have failed to report to work when scheduled to do so.
> The pressman's job for which you were employed is a full-time position. Your numerous absences, which have included absence from work on Mondays, have created unnecessary difficulty in operating our Press Department.
> We have come to believe that you are either unable or unwilling to perform a full-time job on a regular full-time basis.

Swartz told Lewis that the decision to discharge him was made "higher up" and that his hands were tied respecting it. Lewis then asked to speak with Ross, who was not available at the time. Lewis called again the following day and asked to speak with Ross but was referred to a Quinn, the comptroller. Quinn told Lewis that Ross was unavailable and suggested to Lewis that it would be pointless to call back. He told Lewis that Ross had made up his mind and that he did not want Lewis working for him, adding that the matter was settled.

C. Unilateral Changes in Wages, Benefits, and Working Conditions

Shortly after the election, Swartz and McGee held a meeting of the employees in the printing department. McGee complained about the poor attendance record of the Printing Department employees and told employees that their absentee record was fouling up the scheduling of work. Swartz echoed McGee's statement and went on to state that in order to combat the absenteeism problem Respondent was instituting a new disciplinary system. According to the new system, an employee would receive a verbal warning for his first tardiness or his first failure to call in at the beginning of the day to notify the Company that the employee would not be coming in. For the second infraction, the offending employee would receive a week's suspension. For the third infraction, the employee in question would be discharged.

In the summer of 1981, the city of Lynn provided various business firms in the area with the services of an industrial relations or personnel consultant as a means of inducing companies to remain in the city. The consultant, Robert Bernstein, held a series of interviews with various members of Respondent's management team and wrote a personnel handbook based on his interviews. This handbook was distributed to all of Respondent's employees about August 1, 1981. It contained a wide variety of items relating to an individual's employment status, including matters relating to attendance and to grievances. On the subject of attendance, the booklet exhorted employees to come to work regularly and on time, stating that "Repeated unsatisfactory attendance, including reporting late or quitting early, may be cause for disciplinary action. Employees are expected to leave the plant at the end of their shift." It also outlined certain leaves of absence which would be available upon advance request but required employees to make their requests in writing.

[6] Sometime after he was discharged, Maden returned to the plant and spoke with Lemmo. He told Lemmo that he did not want to do anything that would disturb their friendship and asked Lemmo if he would testify on his behalf if he filed a grievance. Lemmo's reply was that he would have to say that he "assumed" that Maden had been fired because he voted for the Union but that he could not honestly take the stand and assert it as a fact. Maden replied that this was good enough for him.

With respect to disciplinary problems, the booklet outline noted that, for some infractions of company rules there would be written warnings which would be kept in an employee's personnel file for a period of year. For other infractions there would be verbal warnings, a written record of which would be put in an employee's personnel file and kept for a period of 1 year. For very serious infractions, immediate discharge would follow. The booklet then went on to outline the types of conduct which would be considered major or minor infractions of company rules and set forth the type of punishment which would be imposed for major infractions or repeated for minor infractions. With respect to grievances, the handbook said that any questions about the job, wages, hours, or any other related matter should be discussed with an employee's supervisor. If an employee did not receive word within 3 working days when an appointment is scheduled, he was authorized to go to the office and speak with the plant superintendent without an appointment.

In September 1981, Respondent granted an across-the-board cost-of-living increase of 8 percent to all employees. In addition, it granted other individual increases to specific employees who were at the lower end of the company wage scale. Late in 1980 or early in 1981, Respondent made substantial revisions in its existing attendance bonus and instituted a performance bonus. The exact requirements of these incentive bonuses is rather vague in the record. The previous attendance bonus operated on a system of points given to each individual for perfect attendance during a given workweek. At the end of the year, the employee's total bonus points were added up and he was given a certain amount per point over and above his regular salary. The amount of money assigned to each bonus point depended on the Company's profit during the preceding year. Respondent's management was unhappy about the operations of the attendance bonus. Absenteeism and tardiness was and remains a serious problem at Respondent's plant and management felt that deserving employees were not receiving a sufficient incentive from the old bonus system. They held a series of meetings with employees in which the management's dissatisfaction with the plan was discussed and during which the outlines of a new plan were also announced. The new plan would permit foremen certain flexibility in excusing absences and tardiness in a manner which would not jeopardize attendance bonus points. Moreover, the awards would thereafter be computed and distributed on a quarterly rather than an annual basis. The performance bonus was also announced. It was a new incentive award, whose exact requirements were not set forth in the record except for the fact that the amount of the bonus also depended on the profitability of the Company.

II. ANALYSIS AND CONCLUSIONS

A. The Discharges of George Maden and Robert Lewis and Related Matters

It is an unfair labor practice for a supervisor to tell an employee that he is going to be discharged because of his union sympathies. H. B. Zachry Co., 233 NLRB 1143 (1977); Bradford Furniture Co., 254 NLRB 109 (1981). When Lemmo told Maden that he thought Maden was going to be discharged for voting for the Union, he violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, even if this prediction did not express Lemmo's personal sentiments. This statement, as well as Lemmo's admitted statement that Ross would "blast" Maden for letting it be known he was a union supporter, provides independent evidence of animus as well as an admission against interest which bears Respondent's true motivation in discharging Maden and Lewis. Other evidence of animus can be derived from the cavalier treatment given to the Union's bargaining rights by Respondent following the election. This treatment is discussed more in detail, infra.

Maden had been with the Company for 26 years. Company General Manager Ross testified that he did a "hell of a job" when he was present. The problem asserted by Respondent is that Maden was not always present because of the arrangement he had concluded with Swartz to work part-time in order to keep his earnings below the statutory maximum allowed to a social security annuitant who is under the age of 65. It was well known that Maden was a union supporter and that he voiced his support to Respondent's management in an impertinent manner. The timing of his discharge, taking place as it did within 3 weeks of a representation election, gives rise to a suspicion of union animus, especially when it was imposed on an employee of 26 years' service whose only shortcoming was that he was not always present for work under an arrangement of 17 months' duration which Respondent had previously approved. The actual job content of Maden's assignment did not take more than 20 or 25 hours a week to perform and Maden was able to keep up with its requirements within that span of time. So were Maden's replacements, none of whom worked at the job more hours than Maden did and who were given other assignments, principally training as diemakers, to fill out the balance of their week. The problem posed by Respondent is that an occasional rush job meant that sometimes a die had to be pulled from its shelf in a hurry and, if Maden was not around to pull it, someone else had to perform this chore. This happened only rarely and, when it did, it consumed only a few minutes out of another employee's day. Maden discussed this problem with Swartz in January 1979. When his part-time working arrangement was first established, Swartz told Maden that he was not at all concerned about pulling dies for an occasional rush job and that Avellani or Katz could take care of it. Suddenly, within weeks of a union victory, to which Maden had tried to make a contribution, an arrangement which had been satisfactory for 17 months suddenly became intolerable. It was the kind of complaint which was plainly contrived and hardly the basis for the drastic personnel action which took place on June 17.

Respondent insists, on the one hand, that Maden was not discharged and that, in effect, he quit. It also argues that he was discharged for cause. According to Respondent, Maden was offered the option of working full-time rather than leaving the Company so it was Maden who made the choice which resulted in his final separation. The contention is wholly without merit. Swartz admits that he never confronted Maden with this choice at the time of his termination but left the matter to Lemmo. Lemmo botched his lines badly when he testified on this point. He said that he told Maden that he had to work full time or leave and asked Maden to think the matter over on his vacation and let him have an answer when he returned. Even Swartz commented on this error in Lemmo's testimony, since the record is otherwise undisputed that Maden was discharged before and not after his vacation. I credit Maden, an unusually straightforward and convincing witness, to the effect that no one, including Lemmo, ever told him he could stay on provided that he would work full time. The best and only plausible explanation for Maden's discharge is the one which Lemmo gave to Maden a few days before the event took place, namely that he was being fired for voting for the Union. Since this was the obvious motive which prompted Respondent's action, I conclude that Respondent, in discharging Maden, violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

Lewis, an employee of 18 years standing and admittedly Respondent's best pressman, was fired for excessive absenteeism. Respondent counted that Lewis was absent from work during the calendar year 1980 some 36 days, in addition to the period in July and early August when he was on an extended vacation break because of a back injury. In particular, Respondent contended that Lewis missed an inordinate number of Mondays, this assertion being evidence that Lewis was not interested in his job and permitted weekend carousing to render him unfit for work. While Respondent's count of days missed by Lewis was considerably in excess of the number of absences reflected on Lewis' timecards, it is indisputable that Lewis missed a great deal of time in 1980. Of these absences eight fell on Monday. Respondent admits that Lewis always called in to notify the Company that he would not be working but claims that such short notice frequently interrupted or caused difficulties with its job scheduling. Printing jobs are normally assigned to a particular press at the time the order is taken from the customer and they cannot easily be shifted from one press to another. Respondent asserts that it is not particularly bothered by long-term injury, long absences due to illnesses, or vacations because it has adequate advance notice in such situations and can revise production schedules to accommodate such problems. However, unanticipated absences can and do cause serious scheduling headaches, especially when it involves a position as pivotal in the production process as that of a pressman. It was these repeated and unanticipated daily absences which Respondent claims it could no longer abide and which prompted it to discharge Lewis when he called in sick on Monday, September 15.[8]

Respondent was perennially plagued with absenteeism, not only from Lewis but from its entire production staff. Record evidence indicates that Respondent experienced and tolerated from other employees absentee records comparable to that of Lewis. In 1978, Lewis was off the job for several months and nothing in the way of discipline was said or done concerning it. What Respondent's basic contention fails to take into account is that in the late summer of 1980, following Lewis' return to work from his back injury, Lewis' attendance had improved considerably over his record earlier in the year. What Respondent's contention also fails to note is that, despite Lewis' asserted indifference to the Company's production schedules and business requirements, during 1980 Lewis worked 54 hours of premium overtime (at time and one-half) during the first quarter, 50 hours of premium overtime during the second quarter, and 20 hours of premium overtime during the third and final quarter of his employment. Moreover, Respondent admits that Lewis was never suspended nor even warned about any serious consequences which might flow from his own absentee record. Swartz admits that because of his long personal acquaintance with Lewis he could not bring himself to give Lewis any kind of verbal or written warning, and McGee's complaint carried with it no warning of any sort. In light of these facts, it is most understandable that Lewis could and should have believed that his attendance pattern in August and September 1980 was acceptable to Respondent as it had been over a long period of time, and that his decision to call in sick on September 15, when in fact he was sick, would have been treated by Respondent in the same manner that Respondent had treated many such calls over a period of many years. Moreover, when Lewis was discharged, Respondent had no replacement available to take his place and still has none. If the pressures of production were the real motivating factor in eliminating Lewis at this time, normal procedure would dictate that such action would not be taken until Respondent had someone available to fill in and keep Lewis' press running. In fact, Lewis' press operated only 3 or 4 days during August and September, despite his continued presence at the plant, and it was sold after he was terminated.

A more plausible explanation for Respondent's behavior on this occasion is that it had just received from the Board a certification, dated September 11, and was then faced with the hard fact that it had in its midst a labor organization with whom it was legally obligated to deal and which Lewis was instrumental in organizing. It was Lewis who assisted in representing the Union at the representation case conference. It was Lewis who served as the union observer at the election and who was advertised to Respondent as being the Union's new shop stew-

[8] Lewis' excuse for not coming to work on that occasion was that he had a flareup of a bronchial condition and was confined to bed. Respondent does not contest that Lewis was, in fact, sick on this occasion. Implicit in this position is the contention that Lewis should have showed up for work on September 15, notwithstanding the fact that he had bronchitis, in order to save his job.

ard. And now it was Lewis who could be counted on to provide leadership through the months ahead during which Respondent would be trying to chew up time in a tedious and fruitless effort to avoid meeting its duty to engage in collective bargaining. Accordingly, I conclude that Lewis' illness of September 15 was merely a pretext for removing him from Respondent's payroll and that its real reason for discharging him was, as in the Maden case, to eliminate from its shop an active and vocal union supporter. Accordingly, I find that by discharging Robert Lewis Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. Pyro Mining Co., 253 NLRB 233 (1977). Inasmuch as Lewis' union activities included his presence at the Board office at a representation case conference (and hence a potential union witness if the conference failed to produce agreement and the matter went on for hearing before a hearing officer), the discharge also violates Section 8(a)(4) of the Act.

B. Unilateral Changes in Wages, Benefits, and Working Conditions

It is well established that it is an unfair labor practice for an employer in a represented shop to make unilateral changes in the wages, benefits, or working conditions of its employees without first notifying the bargaining representative and giving it an opportunity to discuss the proposed changes. NLRB v. Katz, 369 U.S. 736 (1962). This requirement of good-faith bargaining applies to changes which are undertaken while objections to an election are pending, as well as to changes which may be made after a certification has issued. Mike O'Connor Chevrolet Co., 209 NLRB 701 (1971); Portsmouth Lumber Treating, 248 NLRB 1170 (1980); Evans Rotork, Inc., 251 NLRB 660 (1980). A new policy of strict enforcement of previously existing work rules is subject to the requirement of notice and bargaining just as much as is the promulgation of brand new work rules. Pak-Mor Mfg. Co., 241 NLRB 801 (1979). Likewise, the transformation of an informal, unstructured system of work rules and practices into a formalized set of rules and procedures is a mandatory subject of bargaining. Boland Marine & Mfg. Co., 225 NLRB 824 (1976). In this case, it is Respondent's initial position that it had no duty to bargain at all with the Union, notwithstanding the certification, because the underlying representation election was tainted with irregularity. The Board disposed of this defense by its decision in 259 NLRB 686 (1976).

In this case, it is admitted on the record that after the certification issued Respondent gave its employees an 8-percent across-the-board cost-of-living increase and made other adjustments in the wage rates of its lower paid personnel. There is no suggestion that these increases were negotiated. While this element is not formally alleged as a violation in the amended complaint, the matter was fully litigated at the hearing, inasmuch as the facts of the violation candidly admitted in the testimony of the Respondent's plant manager. Accordingly, I find that by making increases in wages without notifying the Union and offering to bargain with it Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

Shortly after the election, Respondent's management held a meeting with its press department, at which time it scolded employees about their repeated tardiness and unannounced absences and informed them that new disciplinary procedures would be invoked to discourage such practices. Among other things Respondent stated that it was instituting a practice of progressive discipline by terms of which offending employees would be subject to a warning and then to suspension and discharge. The failure of Respondent to negotiate these changes in its disciplinary practice and its decision to institute them unilaterally violates Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act. The timing of this announcement, coming as it did immediately following a union violation in the representation election, makes it clear that the imposition of the new rule was discriminatorily motivated and hence a violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act. Electri-Flex Co., 228 NLRB 847 (1978); Transportation Management, 256 NLRB 101 (1981).

Late in the fall of 1980 and early in 1981, Respondent announced to employees that it was instituting a performance bonus, based in part on earnings, and that it was changing the terms of its previous attendance bonus because it was dissatisfied with the results it achieved under old attendance bonus. The failure of Respondent to negotiate changes in the old bonus system and its unilateral institution of a new bonus arrangement violates Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

In August 1981, as a result of a study conducted by a city-paid consultant, Respondent prepared and distributed to its employees a handbook in which it set forth a highly structured disciplinary system replacing the flexible, unwritten rules and practices which Respondent had formerly observed. A system of written warnings and written records of verbal warnings was instituted. Respondent argued that this was essentially the procedure it followed before the representation election, but it was unable to produce so much as one written warning which had been issued to any employee previous to May 29, 1980. Indeed, it did not even keep personnel records before this date, maintaining only a card file containing the names and addreses of its current and former employees and an occasional note concerning their employment status. The handbook outlined a detailed plan of progressive discipline, as well as steps to be utilized by an employee in presenting what the Employer calls a grievance. The issuance of this handbook, containing as it does formalized disciplinary rules and procedures as well as new rules and procedures, took place without notification to the Union or negotiation over the contents. Though a detailed compendium of rules and procedures, the handbook made no provision for participation by the certified bargaining representative in the sensitive and critical matter of handling grievances. Accordingly, the issuance of this document and the institution of the matters set forth therein constitutes a violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

On these findings of fact and on the entire record, I make the following

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent Harvard Folding Box Co., Inc. is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Boston Local No. 600, Graphic Arts International Union, AFL–CIO–CLC is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. All production and maintenance employees, including truck drivers, employed by Respondent at its Lynn, Massachusetts plant, exclusive of 25 office clerical employees, sales employees, professional employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act, constitute a unit appropriate for collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

4. Since about May 29, 1980, Boston Local No. 600, Graphic Arts International Union, AFL–CIO–CLC has been and continues to be the exclusive representative of the employees employed in the unit described above for the purposes of collective bargaining with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, and other terms and conditions of employment, within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

5. By unilaterally granting an increase in wages; by unilaterally changing the terms of its attendance bonus and instituting a performance bonus; by unilaterally announcing and instituting a new disciplinary system respecting tardiness and attendance; and by unilaterally announcing and instituting a new system of discipline and of processing grievances, all without notifying the Union and offering it an opportunity to bargain, Respondent herein violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.

6. By discriminatorily discharging George Maden and Robert Lewis because of their sympathies for and activities on behalf of the Union; and by instituting a system of warnings, suspensions, and discharge in reprisal for the action of employees in selecting the Union as their bargaining representative, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

7. By discharging Robert Lewis because he gave or offered to give testimony under the Act, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(4) of the Act.

8. By the acts and conduct set forth above in Conclusions of Law 5, 6, and 7; and by telling employees that they were going to be discharged because they had voted for the Union, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

9. The unfair labor practices recited above have a close, intimate, and substantial effect on the free flow of commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and 2(7) of the Act.

REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I will recommend that it be required to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative actions designed to effectuate the purposes and polices of the Act. Since the violations of the Act found herein are repeated and pervasive and evidence an intention to ignore its basic purposes and policies, I will recommend to the Board a so-called 8(a)(1) remedy designed to suppress any and all violations of that section. Hickmont Foods, 242 NLRB 1357 (1979). I will recommend that Respondent be required to bargain collectively with the Union as the exclusive representative of its production and maintenance employees, that it rescind certain unilaterally imposed rules, regulations, and procedures which it instituted in June 1980, and about August 1981, and that it cease and desist from instituting changes in wages, benefits, or working conditions of its employees without first notifying the Union and offering to bargain with it concerning such changes. I will also recommend that Respondent be required to offer full and immediate reinstatement to George Maden, to Robert Lewis, and to any other persons who have been discharged pursuant to illegally instituted rules and disciplinary procedures, and to make them whole for any loss of earnings which they may have suffered by reason of the discrimination practiced against them, in accordance with the Woolworth formula,[9] with interest thereon at the adjusted prime rate used by the Internal Revenue Service for the computation of tax payments. Olympic Medical Corp., 250 NLRB 146; Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962). I will also recommend that Respondent be required to post the usual notice, advising its employees of their rights and the results in this case.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[10]

ORDER

Respondent Harvard Folding Box Co., Inc., Lynn, Massachusetts, its officers, agents, supervisors, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Telling employees that they are going to be discharged because they have voted for the Union.

(b) Discouraging membership in and activities on behalf of Boston Local No. 600, Graphic Arts International Union, AFL–CIO–CLC, or any other labor organization, by discharging employees, imposing stricter disciplinary rules and procedures, or otherwise discriminating against them in their hire or tenure.

(c) Discharging or otherwise discriminating against employees because they have given or have offered to give testimony under the Act.

(d) Refusing to recognize and bargain collectively with Boston Local No. 600, Graphic Arts International Union, AFL–CIO–CLC as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of all production and maintenance employees, including truck drivers, employed by Respondent at its Lynn, Massachusetts plant, exclusive of office clerical employees, sales employees, professional employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

(e) Unilaterally making increases in wages, instituting bonus plans, changing bonus plans, or otherwise changing the compensation of its employees without first noti-

[9] F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950).

[10] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

fying the Union of the proposed changes and offering to bargain collectively with it concerning such changes; provided that nothing in the Order shall be construed to require Respondent to decrease the compensation of any employee.

(f) Unilaterally instituting changes in disciplinary procedures concerning tardiness and absenteeism, unilaterally instituting changes in disciplinary practices, work rules, and grievance procedures, and unilaterally changing any other term or condition of employment without first notifying the Union and giving it an opportunity to bargain collectively concerning such changes.

(g) Discharging or suspending employees pursuant to the provisions of an illegally instituted disciplinary procedure.

(h) In any other manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action designed to effectuate the purposes and policies of the Act.

(a) Recognize and, on request, bargain collectively with Boston Local No. 600, Graphic Arts International Union, AFL–CIO–CLC as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of all production and maintenance employees, including truck drivers, employed by Respondent at its Lynn, Massachusetts plant, exclusive of office clerical employees, sales employees, professional employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

(b) Rescind and cease giving effect to any and all changes in disciplinary procedures and work rules which were announced to employees about June 3, 1980, or which were included in an employee handbook which was distributed about August 1, 1981, and expunge from employee personnel records any notices or warnings which were given as a result of the adoption of such rules and procedures.

(c) Make whole any employees who were suspended as a result of the implementation of changes in work rules and disciplinary procedures which were made about June 3, 1980, or in the employee handbook which was distributed about August 1, 1981, with interest.

(d) Offer to George Maden, to Robert Lewis, and to any other employees who have been discharged pursuant to illegally instituted disciplinary procedures, full and immediate reinstatement to their former or substantially equivalent employment, without prejudice to their seniority or to other rights which they previously enjoyed, and make them whole for any loss of pay or benefits which they may have suffered by reason of the discrimination found herein, in the manner described above in the section entitled "Remedy."

(e) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(f) Post at its Lynn, Massachusetts plant, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[11] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 1, after being signed by Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(g) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps Respondent has taken to comply.

[11] If this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

14 December 1984

DECISION AND CERTIFICATION OF REPRESENTATIVE

BY MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN, HUNTER, AND DENNIS

The National Labor Relations Board, by a three-member panel, has considered objections to an election held 18 and 19 August 1983 and the hearing officer's report recommending disposition of them. The election was conducted pursuant to a Stipulated Election Agreement. The tally of ballots shows 139 for and 77 against the Petitioner, with 7 challenged ballots, an insufficient number to affect the results.

The Board has reviewed the record in light of the exceptions and brief, has adopted the hearing officer's findings[1] and recommendations,[2] and finds that a certification of representative should be issued.

Contrary to our dissenting colleague, we agree with the hearing officer's recommendation to overrule the Employer's Objection 3. (Excerpt from hearing officer's report attached as an appendix.) We find that the list compiled by union observer Jackson while the election was in process did not interfere with the employees' free choice.

During the balloting, Jackson had a list of voters to be challenged on a table in front of her. She covered the list with her arm. As employees gave their names to vote, Jackson would make a hash mark in a column on the reverse side of the list if the employee was wearing a "Vote No" shirt. A similar mark would be placed in an adjacent column if the employee displayed a union button. The columns were not labeled.

The hearing officer found that, while the tally kept by Jackson did not comport with Board precedure, it was de minimis conduct. He noted that no actual names were recorded and that there was no evidence that employees waiting to vote were aware that notations were being made. The Employer's observer apparently was the only one aware of this activity and did not report it to the Board agent until after the polls had closed.

The facts in this case do not support the conclusion that there was a substantial violation of the Board's longstanding policy which prohibits anyone keeping a list of persons who have voted[3] aside from the official eligibility list used to check off voters as they receive their ballots. To sustain his conclusion, our colleague relies on Sound Refining, Inc., 267 NLRB 1301 (1983). We find, however, that Sound Refining is factually distinguishable.

In Sound Refining, the union observer kept a copy of the Excelsior list[4] inside a folder or notebook during the election. As employees appeared to vote, the union observer made a notation next to the names of the voters. The Board set aside the election, finding "that, in the circumstances, it can be inferred that the voters knew that [the union observer] was recording their names." The Board noted that the union observer was a conspicuous presence at the election who made no attempt to conceal his conduct.

In this case, unlike Sound Refining, the Petitioner's observer Jackson did not have a list of the voters. The paper she had in front of her during the election had a list only of the names of six employees to be challenged. She used the reverse side of the paper to keep a tally which bore no names, but consisted solely of hash marks arranged in two unidentified columns. Further, Jackson attempted to conceal her activity by keeping her arm over the paper. In the absence of evidence to the contrary, the more reasonable conclusion would be that Jackson did effectively conceal the tally and that the voters neither could nor did infer that a tally of their votes was being kept.

Even assuming that some voters were aware of Jackson's conduct, the absence of names to which the hash marks could be related and Jackson's failure to label the columns under which the hash marks were recorded would make it impossible for them to ascertain the nature of Jackson's tally.[5] Accordingly, we conclude that any breach of the aforementioned rule which may have occurred in this case did not constitute grounds for setting aside the election. The objection is therefore overruled.

[1] The Employer has excepted to some of the hearing officer's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule a hearing officer's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Stretch-Tex Co., 118 NLRB 1359, 1361 (1957). We find no basis for reversing the findings.

[2] We adopt the hearing officer's recommendation to overrule the Employer's Objection 2, but we rely solely on his finding that Rick England was not an agent of the Petitioner.

In adopting the hearing officer's recommendation that the Employer's Objection 5 be overruled, Member Zimmerman does not rely on A.G.S. Graphics, 262 NLRB 1071 (1982), in which he dissented and which he finds factually distinguishable. Member Dennis finds it unnecessary to rely on A.G.S. Graphics.

[5] We emphasize that Jackson's conduct involved only the making of hash marks, not the recording of names. See Masonic House of California, 258 NLRB 41 fn. 4 (1981).

CERTIFICATION OF REPRESENTATIVE

IT IS CERTIFIED that a majority of the valid ballots have been cast for IBEW Local Union 1100, AFL–CIO and that it is the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All production and maintenance employees employed by the Employer at its Hartselle, Alabama facility, including all janitorial employees and production clerical employees, but excluding all office clerical employees, professional employees, quality control employees, technical employees, leadpersons, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

MEMBER HUNTER, dissenting.

Contrary to my collegues, I would find that the Union's observer Kimette Jackson interfered with the employees' free choice by compiling a list of voters while the election was in progress.

The record establishes that Jackson possessed a proper list of voters whose ballots she intended to challenge. However, the hearing officer found that, when each employee stated his name to the Board agent on entering the polling area to vote, Jackson made a hash mark in one of two unmarked columns on the reverse side of that list. Jackson marked one column if she considered the voter to be a union supporter, and marked the other if she thought the voter opposed the Union. Jackson kept her arm over the paper, which was located on top of the table where the observers were seated.

In Sound Refining, Inc., 267 NLRB 1301 (1983), the Board reiterated the principle that election rules designed to guarantee free choice "must be strictly enforced against material breaches in every case."[1] The Board also stated that an election should be set aside where it can be affirmatively shown or reasonably inferred that employees knew their names were being recorded.[2] I note first that the marks made by Jackson constitute the type of list generally proscribed by the Board's rules.[3] Contrary to the majority, I would also find it appropriate under the circumstances to infer that the voters were aware that Jackson was compiling a list. In this connection I emphasize Jackson's conspicuous presence at the polls as an election observer, as well as the absence of evidence that she attempted to conceal her conduct from the voters.[4] Indeed, rather than conceal her conduct, Jackson recorded the marks in the presence of employees as they stated their names to the Board agent, and she maintained the list on top of the observer's table where it could be seen. That she kept her arm over the list does not warrant a different result because, in doing so, she simply highlighted the overt nature of her conduct.[5] In my view, the voters would reasonably believe that Jackson's conduct was designed to identify them.[6]

In view of the above, and because Jackson compiled the list thoughout the balloting,[7] I do not agree with my colleagues that her breach of the Board's rules was de minimis. Consequently, I would sustain the Employer's Objection 3 and set aside the election.[8]

[2] The Board cited A. D. Juilliard & Co., 110 NLRB 2197, 2199 (1954).

[3] The hearing officer specifically found that Jackson was keeping a "personal tab" of the progress of the vote, and he noted that her conduct "did not comport with the Board's election rules."

[4] See Sound Refining, above at 1302.

[5] In these circumstances, I see no basis for the majority's conclusion that Jackson "did effectively conceal" her conduct. Rather than wait until the employees had left the polling area, Jackson recorded the marks while they were giving their names to the Board agent. Rather than keep the list out of sight, she kept it in plain view on top of the observers' table. Placing her arm over the paper in an attempt to be secretive would clearly have the effect of drawing attention to her activity. In my view, the record warrants the inference that the employees were aware that Jackson was compiling a list.

[6] My colleagues assert that, even if the voters were aware of her conduct, Jackson's failure to label the columns or record names would make it impossible for them to ascertain the nature of the tally. In my view, a voter who states his name and immediately sees an observer record a mark would reasonably believe that the observer was trying to identify him in some manner. That Jackson did not use a more specific identification technique does not mean that her conduct was not coercive.

[8] In view of my disposition of the Employer's Objection 3, I find it unnecessary to consider the remaining objections.

APPENDIX

OBJECTION 3:

> During the election, the union, by its agent Kimette Jackson, engaged in electioneering at the polling place.

The Employer presented employee Donnie Luke in support of this objection. Luke is classified as a leadperson and served as the Employer's observer in the 5:30 a.m., to 8:30 a.m., polling period on August 18, 1983. Luke testified that he observed that Petitioner's observer, Kimette Jackson, had a list of six (6) names to be challenged, and that the list was folded from left to right. Jackson held the list on the top of the table where the observers were stationed, and kept her arm over the piece of paper. Luke testified that she would make a hash mark on the reverse side of the list as employees would give their name to vote. (See Employer's Ex. 3). The record is clear that Jackson was not writing the voter's name down; however, the record is equally clear that Jackson was keeping personal tab of how she thought the vote was going. Luke testified that an employee who wore a "Vote No" shirt would prompt Jackson to mark in one column; while a union button would prompt a hash mark in the adjacent column. However, as Employer's Ex. 3 demonstrates, the columns are not labeled in any way which would indicate which column signified a "yes" or "no" vote.

Given the foregoing, I find the list keeping by Jackson to be de minimis. While Jackson's conduct undoubtedly did not comport with the Board's election rules, I am not convinced that her transgression warrants the setting aside of the election. Of special significance is the fact that no actual names were recorded by Jackson, and there is no evidence that the employees waiting to vote actually noticed Jackson's practice of making these marks as they gave their names to the observers. To the contrary, Luke apparently was the only individual that was aware Jackson was making hash marks as the voters entered the polling area:

> HEARING OFFICER ROX: . . . When you discovered that Miss Jackson was making marks on the left side for a vote "no" or "yes"—I'm not sure the record will reflect—and marks on the right side, did you bring that to the Board agent's attention? Did you tell the Board agent that she was doing that?
> LUKE: No sir.
> HEARING OFFICER ROX: Why didn't you?
> LUKE: Because the lawyer told me to observe it and tell him at the end of the session.
> HEARING OFFICER ROX: Did the Board agent tell you to [inform him of] anything that was going on that you felt was improper? Didn't he tell you that at the beginning of this, before the polls opened?
> LUKE: He might [have].
> HEARING OFFICER ROX: But you never mentioned it to the Board agent while the polls were open, that she was doing this?
> LUKE: No, sir.

Accordingly, I find Objection 3 to be without merit, and shall recommend that it be dismissed. Robert's Tours, Inc., 244 NLRB 818 at fn. 5 (1979).

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN, HUNTER, AND DENNIS

On 5 July 1983 Administrative Law Judge Richard H. Beddow Jr. issued the attached supplemental decision. The Respondents filed exceptions and supporting briefs.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

1. The Respondents contend that Brian Lucas is not entitled to the back wages set forth in the Order because there were more applicants than openings for Respondent Employer's job and Lucas might not have been hired. We find no merit in this contention. In backpay cases, it is the Board's longstanding rule that

> . . . while the general burden of proof is on the General Counsel to establish the damage which has resulted from Respondent's established discriminat[ion] . . . i.e., the gross backpay over the backpay period, the burden of proof is upon the Respondent as to diminution of damages, whether from the willful loss of earnings . . . or from the unavailability of a job at Respondent's plant for some reason unconnected with the discrimination." [Mastro Plastics Corp., 136 NLRB 1342, 1346 (1962), enfd. 345 F.2d 170 (2d Cir. 1965), cert. denied 384 U.S. 972 (1966).]

Here, the General Counsel established that 4 out of 11 applicants were hired. The Respondents, on the other hand, proffered no evidence to indicate Lucas would not have been one of the applicants selected for the job, absent the discrimination against him. In these circumstances, we find that the Respondents failed to meet their burden of proof. To hold otherwise would, as the judge pointed out, allow the Respondents to benefit from the uncertainties caused by their own misconduct. See Famet, Inc., 222 NLRB 1180, 1182 (1976).

2. We agree with the judge's conclusion that Lucas is entitled to reimbursement for medical expenses which occurred during the period from 14 to 19 October 1980 under the Union's health insurance plan. Using the average hours worked by four temporary employees, the judge estimated that Lucas would have been only 2 workweeks short of attaining eligibility for health benefits. The judge then inferred that Lucas would have met the eligibility requirements because he would have had a 14-week period in the construction season to get the necessary 2 weeks of work. We find that the judge's inference is sufficiently grounded in objective evidence to overcome the Respondents' contention that it is too speculative to support an award of backpay. The prospect of 14 weeks in the season when work is normally more available is adequate support for the inference that Lucas would have met the 2-week shortfall. As the judge observed, it is necessarily speculative to resolve whether Lucas actually would have obtained eligibility; on the other hand, it is clear that the Respondents' unlawful conduct destroyed Lucas' opportunity for inclusion in the insurance plan. To deny reimbursement of the medical expenses would, as we found with respect to backpay, allow the Respondents to benefit from the uncertainties caused by their own misconduct.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondents, Berry-Mahurin Construction, Inc., Marion, Iowa, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, and United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, Local 308, AFL–CIO, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

MEMBER DENNIS, dissenting in part.

Unlike my colleagues, I agree with the Respondents' contention that the record does not establish that Lucas would have been eligible for health benefits. I find speculative the judge's calculations of additional hours that Lucas might have worked to gain health benefit eligibility.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

RICHARD H. BEDDOW JR., Administrative Law Judge. This matter was heard in Cedar Rapids, Iowa, on March 21, 1983 and, subsequently, briefs were filed by all parties. The proceeding is based on backpay specifications dated November 30, 1982, following court of appeals enforcement on July 16, 1982, of a Board Decision and Order of September 30, 1981, reported at 258 NLRB 1259 (1981). The Board found that the Respondent Union violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the National Labor Relations Act by its refusal to refer Brian Lucas to employment with Respondent Employer, and by its requirement that job applicants become members of the Union as a prerequisite for referral through the hiring hall. The Board further found that Respondent Employer's rejection of Lucas for employment was due to Respondent Union's unlawful refusal to refer Lucas and, therefore, Respondent Employer violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

I.

The General Counsel submits that the most appropriate measure of the earnings Lucas would have received, but for Respondents' unlawful conduct, and the proper measure of the length of the backpay period, as set out in the backpay specification, should be based on the duration of employment and the earnings received by carpenter Bryan T. Reilly while he was employed by Respondent Employer at the Duane Arnold Energy Center. More specifically, the General Counsel points out that Lucas was denied the opportunity to go through the application and testing process on January 14, 1980, whereas Reilly took his test on January 15, 1980, and worked until June 4, 1980, and it is argued that the latter dates therefore should establish the backpay period.

At the particular jobsite involved, Respondent Employer was under contract to perform certain regular work as well as special work during the power plant's annual "outage." The outage was scheduled for the period between February 8 and April 18, 1980, and Lucas understood that he was applying for temporary outage-related work. Although Reilly sought work contemporaneously with Lucas, he had a continuing work record with Respondent Employer and he was assigned to regular remodeling type work not related to the outage work engaged in by most of the other carpenters hired at that time. He also continued with that work beyond the date when the outage work was completed. As pointed out by Respondent Employer, the court of appeals herein specifically referred to the compliance stage of this proceeding suggesting "the temporary nature of the work for which Lucas was applying will undoubtedly be taken into consideration." Under these circumstances the Respondents contend that Reilly is a dissimilarly situated employee who cannot be used for comparative backpay purposes and that, at the most, the dates of the outage, February 8 through April 18, 1980, would constitute the maximum backpay period.

The record, however, shows that those carpenters hired contemporaneously with Lucas' application actually started on various dates in January. Specifically, the following carpenters were hired the week of January 14 or shortly thereafter:

	Date Hired	Date Laid Off	Gross Wages
Dwayne Donels	1/17	4/7	$5305
Michael Hughes	1/15	3/7	4814
James Kalina	1/15	4/15	9759
Dennis Deklotz	1/28	4/7	6126

Respondent Union also disputes that employee Kalina could be considered to be representative inasmuch as he formerly had been a carpenter foreman and worked longer because of his ability (layoff on the job was not related to seniority). Respondent Employer suggests that the gross wages for seven other carpenters, who contemporaneously applied for employment and were paid for a day of testing, should be included with those in the table above and that the figures be averaged in keeping with the method of backpay computing set forth in Central Freight Lines, 266 NLRB 182 (1983). The General Counsel, on the other hand, suggests that the latter case is inapplicable because it involved permanent rather than temporary employment.

Based on the overall record and arguments of counsel, I conclude that Brian Lucas is due backpay computed on the basis of average gross pay full-time temporary employees hired the week of January 14, 1980, or shortly thereafter (when Lucas was wrongfully denied the opportunity of employment) and employed as carpenters for and during the period of the 1980 plant outage at the Duane Arnold Energy Center. Accordingly, the backpay period should begin January 14, 1980, and end April 15, 1980, when the last comparable employee hired for the outage was laid off. Contrary to the arguments of the General Counsel, I find that carpenter Reilly is a dissimilarly situated employee who worked essentially as a regular carpenter for Respondent Employer and who was not hired at the Energy Center for the purpose or the period of the temporary work related to the annual outage.

Moreover, I find that the application of a Central Freight Lines type formula based on averaging is especially relevant and desirable where, as here, there exists a category of similarly situated employees with relatively consistent pay records throughout almost all of the entire backpay period. Also, carpenter Kalina, although perhaps more skilled and experienced than others, was hired as a journeyman carpenter, the same classification as Lucas and the others were hired, and I find no reason to exclude his figures from inclusion in the relevant group of employees. In a similar vein, I find that the decision in Central Freight Lines, supra, clearly shows that data for the several unsuccessful job applicants tested during mid-January should not be averaged into the category for computation purposes.

As noted by the General Counsel, Respondents also have argued that there was an unlikelihood that Lucas would have been employed by Respondent Employer because it is not known whether he would have successfully passed the preemployment examinations and courses, and because even if Lucas had successfully passed the tests and courses, he would have merely entered a pool of potential employees. Clearly, however, the prior decisions of the Board and court of appeals in the instant case raise the effective presumption that except for the discrimination against him, Lucas would have been hired and, therefore, must be placed in a category of those similarly situated, namely, those carpenters who were hired. Moreover, the Board will not give Respondents the benefit of uncertainties caused by their own misconduct, and the policy of the Board is to presume from the underlying unfair labor practice finding that Respondents are liable for backpay as determined by the backpay specifications. Famet, Inc., 222 NLRB 1180 (1976).

Under the circumstances, I find that the average gross pay of the four similarly situated employees was $6484 for the backpay period of January 14 through April 15, 1980, and that Brian P. Lucas is due that amount minus net interim earnings,[1] which shall be recomputed to reflect the appropriate backpay period.

II.

The backpay specification also asserts entitlement to reimbursement to Lucas for medical expenses which occurred October 14–19, 1980, for the birth of a child.[2] Lucas paid the expense which amounted to $974, without the aid of insurance.

Respondent Union's health insurance plan states that to establish initial eligibility a member must accumulate at least 600 hours in his or her hour bank during not more than four consecutive work quarters. "Work Quarter" is defined as a period of three consecutive calendar months commencing on August 1, November 1, February 1, or May 1. During the relevant backpay period Lucas could have accrued up to approximately 520 hours during three quarters, if he had not been denied employment. According to the plan, if Lucas would have had the necessary hours for the work quarter of May, June, and July 1980, he would have been eligible for insurance benefits in the insurance quarter of October, November, and December, and medical expenses in that latter insurance quarter would have been covered. Also, if Lucas would have satisfied the initial eligibility requirement by working 600 hours in four consecutive work quarters, he could have continued coverage by contribution, regardless of continued employment status.

Although Lucas would not have fully established his initial eligibility during the backpay period, he would have accumulated a significant proportion of the total number of hours needed and could have initially qualified with approximately 2 more weeks of work within Respondent Union's jurisdiction in April or in the May-June-July work quarter. While it is necessarily speculative to resolve whether or not Lucas actually would have obtained eligibility, it otherwise is clear that Respondents' violation of the Act destroyed his opportunity for inclusion within the insurance plan. Inasmuch as Lucas would have had an opportunity to gain his 2-week short-fall over an approximate 14-week period during what is normally considered the construction season and, in the absence of any indication to the contrary,[3] I infer that Lucas would have been able to work the necessary minimum under the hour qualifications of the insurance plan and that he would have been eligible for benefits were it not for Respondents' violation of the Act. Lucas would not have had to pay the medical charges under these circumstances and thus, in order to restore Lucas as nearly as possible to the economic position he would have enjoyed in the absence of the unlawful conduct, I find that the specified medical expenses should be awarded.

According to the General Counsel's exhibit of the health plan, it pays 100 percent of the hospital's daily rate to a maximum of $3100, 80 percent of all other covered expenses, with a maximum of $100 for diagnostic laboratory and X-ray expenses, and includes a cash deductible of $100. Applying the above to the itemized medical expenses, it is shown that Lucas paid $561 in total for the hospital's daily rate, which is 100 percent covered; paid $51 for diagnostic laboratory services, which is less than the $100 maximum and, therefore, 80 percent covered; and paid $362 for medical supplies, drugs, an I.V., and operation room use, all apparently 80 percent covered. Thus, the covered amount is $899.40, less the $100 cash deductible. Accordingly, I conclude that Lucas is entitled under the plan to reimbursement for $799.40.

III.

The backpay specification also claims that Respondent Employer is obligated for each hour Lucas would haved worked in the backpay period to contribute to the Five Rivers Carpenters' District Council Health and Welfare Fund, the Geneva Pension Fund, and the Apprenticeship Committee Fund. These contributions owed by Respondent Employer are the result of its contractual agreements with Respondent Union. The agreement effective August 4, 1977, to April 30, 1980, states that employers bound by it shall pay 45 cents per hour for each hour worked by employees covered by the agreement to the Health and Welfare Plan; 45 cents per hour for each hour worked by employees covered by the agreement to the Geneva Pension Plan; and 8 cents an hour worked to the Apprenticeship Committee. I find that contributions to the described funds are necessary and proper in order to effectuate the policies of the Act, see Fruin-Colnon Corp., 244 NLRB 513 (1979), and they will be allowed; however, both Respondents should be jointly and severally liable for the contributions, see Fruin-Colnon Corp.,

[1] The interim earnings shall appropriately reflect as deductions from interim earnings those expenses set forth in the backpay specifications, totaling $251, including transportation expenses incurred by the discriminatee in connection with seeking interim employment, which would not have been incurred but for the discrimination. See Aircraft & Helicopter Leasing, 227 NLRB 644 (1976). Possible unemployment compensation paid to Lucas during the backpay period shall not be included in interim earnings. See Gullett Gin Co., 340 U.S. 361 (1951).

[2] Although the health plan document subpoenaed by the General Counsel and placed in the record does not specifically explain the coverage of pregnancy expenses, it is the best evidence available and it does not specifically exclude such coverage. In view of Respondent Union's failure to provide any other material to the contrary, the basic presumptions relative to backpay specifications apply and I find that expenses incurred due to a pregnancy should be considered to be covered under the health insurance plan.

[3] The Union's records pertaining to membership and dues shows that various new members were paying monthly dues during Lucas' period and some joined the Union during the next quarter, in September 1980.

supra, and the specific amount should be recomputed to reflect the backpay period of January 14 through April 15, 1980.

IV.

In the Board's decision herein, it was determined that Respondent Union violated the Act because it required that job applicants become members of the Union as a prerequisite for referral through the hiring hall (contrary to applicable state law), and it ordered that Respondent Union "reimburse those individuals who have paid initiation fees or dues to it, either directly or indirectly through payroll deductions, unless those individuals are shown to have agreed to make such payments voluntarily and without regard to the referral system."

At the hearing, the General Counsel amended the backpay specification to delete the names of 42 individuals under this section of the Board's Decision and Order. In addition, based on information obtained after the close of the hearing, the General Counsel moved to delete the name of David Trickle, which motion was granted, thereby reducing Respondent Union's total liability for fees and dues to $19,020.39 (see the attached Appendix.) The specifications were based on questionnaires sent by the Board to all persons (approximately 88) who paid initiation fees and dues from September 1979 through 1982.

Respondent Union did not subpoena or call to testify the claimants listed in the backpay specification but instead relied on the testimony of business agents Calvin E. Kennedy and James C. Christensen, who each testified in a generalized manner about what each perceived to be the motives of various named claimants in joining the Union as well as their history of membership based on their union dues and payment records. In substance, Respondent Union has shown that those persons listed came to the Union and joined, that some are still members, that some transferred to other locations, and that some dropped out or were suspended for nonpayment of dues.

As argued by the General Counsel, the Board made it clear that it is Respondent Union's burden to establish that the claimants paid their dues and fees voluntarily and without regard to the referral system. Under these circumstances, I cannot conclude that the union business agents' self-serving testimony that the claimants did not say they were subject to coercion at the time they joined, as well as the showing of such things as current membership status, are sufficient to support an inference that the listed claimants joined the Union voluntarily. Moreover, Respondent Union's showing begs the question with respect to the role of the referral system, as specifically mentioned in the Board's Order.

Under these circumstances, and in view of the basic presumption inherent in the Board's prior finding of unfair labor practices regarding union fees and the referral system, I conclude that Respondent Union has failed to present sufficent and reliable evidence that would substantiate its burden of proof. Accordingly, I find that the backpay specification in this respect, as amended, should be allowed and that checks for the amounts requested should be remitted to the Regional Director for Region 18 for all individuals still listed, see attached Appendix, whom Respondent Union failed to subpoena to testify, unless Respondent Union was unable to locate such individuals. With regard to those individuals Respondent Union was unable to locate, Respondent Union shall pay to the Regional Director the amounts owed, to be held in escrow for a period not exceeding 1 year from the date of the Supplemental Decision and Order, to afford Respondent Union and the General Counsel an opportunity to locate and question such individuals.

The record does show that Respondent Union could not locate Thomas O. Mitton, Damon H. Gardner Jr., Kevin L. Gallagher, Luck Godar, Norman L. Luloff, Roy Williams, Dann A. Doty, Kevin M. Jensen, David L. Marks, and Charles K. Lange. Therefore, reimbursement for those individuals should be placed in escrow in order to give the General Counsel an opportunity to locate and examine such individuals with regard to the issue of whether they joined voluntarily. The Regional Director then shall make a final determination whether any factors are revealed which might indicate that such individuals joined voluntarily. See Coast Delivery Service, 198 NLRB 1026 (1972).

ORDER

Respondent Berry-Mahurin Construction, Inc., Marion, Iowa, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, and Respondent United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, Local 308, AFL–CIO, its officers, agents, and representatives, jointly and serverally liable, shall make whole Brian P. Lucas by paying him $799.40 as reimbursement for medical expenses, and backpay of $6484, minus net interim earnings as computed in the manner set forth in this supplemental decision, plus accrued interest computed in the manner set forth in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977), minus any tax withholding required by Federal or state laws; and by payment to the Five Rivers Carpenters' District Council Health and Welfare Fund, Geneva Pension Fund, and Apprenticeship Committee Fund, as computed in the manner set forth in this supplemental decision, plus accrued interest to the date of payment pursuant to Florida Steel, supra.

In addition, Local 308 shall reimburse those individuals listed in the attached Appendix the amount specified for initiation fees, dues, and assessments, plus accrued interest to the date of payment pursuant to Florida Steel, supra, by remittance of individual checks to the Regional Director for Region 18 to be distributed or, where appropriate, held in escrow pursuant to the method set forth in this supplemental decision.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND DENNIS

On 15 February 1984 Administrative Law Judge Jerrold H. Shapiro issued the attached decision. Respondent Employer and Respondent Union each filed exceptions and supporting briefs.[1] The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and Respondent Union filed an answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions as modified.

1. We agree with the judge, for the reasons stated at length in his decision, that Respondent Employer violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by refusing to assign unscheduled overtime to nonmembers of Respondent Union (travelers) employed on its Shell Oil Project in Carson, California, from 1 March through 31 May 1982, and by laying off 87 travelers named in Appendices A and B of the judge's decision because of their nonmembership in Respondent Union, and committed numerous independent violations of Section 8(a)(1).[3] We disagree, however, with the judge that Respondent Employer did not violate Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by laying off the remaining 42 travelers named in Appendix C of the judge's decision.

Applying the Wright Line[4] analysis, the judge properly found that the General Counsel made a prima facie showing that nonmembership in Respondent Union was a motivating factor in Respondent Employer's decision to deny unscheduled overtime to travelers and to lay off each of the alleged discriminatees. In so deciding, the judge found the "grossly disproportionate" number of travelers selected for layoff and the number of Respondent Union's members assigned unscheduled overtime work to be persuasive evidence of discriminatory motivation. The judge also found that Respondent Employer's foremen's statements that the travelers could not be assigned overtime work and would be laid off before the project's shutdown phase because they were not members of Respondent Union constituted an "outright confession of unlawful discrimination," as did their testimony that such was the Employer's practice. The judge found further evidence of illegal motivation in the foremen's statements that their discrimination against the travelers was due to pressure from Respondent Union, and in Respondent Employer's deviations from its usual policy of having the crew foremen select the persons for layoff and overtime work. The judge also found that the disparate treatment of traveler Foster compared with the treatment of other travelers, retaining him to work the shutdown because Respondent Employer mistakenly thought he was a member of Respondent Union, further demonstrates discriminatory motivation.

The judge also found Respondent Employer failed to establish that the 87 travelers would have been laid off, or travelers denied unscheduled overtime, for legitimate business reasons notwithstanding their nonmembership status with Respondent Union. Of the 87 travelers 75 were pipefitters by trade, and the judge found there was insufficient evidence that as a group they were less competent or experienced than Respondent Union's members. Of the 87 travelers 12 were plumbers by trade, but the judge found they were competent and experienced pipefitters or their supervisors regarded them as such, and Respondent Employer produced insufficient credible evidence to prove that the 12

[1] Respondent Employer has requested oral argument. The request is denied as the record, exceptions, and briefs adequately present the issues and the positions of the parties.

[2] Respondent Employer has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

In sec. I,A,2,(a),(6), par. 1 of his decision the judge inadvertently substituted the word "light" for "like." As corrected, the sentence reads: "It is established that 'the essence of discrimination in a Section 8(a)(3) violation consists of treating like cases differently.'"

[3] The judge found that Respondent Employer violated Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act by informing employees that travelers could not be assigned overtime work and would be laid off from work before the shutdown phase of the project because of their nonmembership in Respondent Union; by informing a traveler that if he transferred his membership into Respondent Union he would be eligible to work the project's shutdown phase; by telling a traveler that he was laid off because Respondent Union had given instructions that all the travelers were to be laid off; by telling a traveler that he and another traveler could not work overtime because of instructions from Respondent Union; and by telling travelers that it was Respondent Union's policy that Respondent Employer could not assign the travelers any overtime work.

[4] Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980), enfd. 662 F.2d 899 (1st Cir. 1981), cert. denied 455 U.S. 989 (1982), approved by the Supreme Court in NLRB v. Transportation Management Corp., 462 U.S. 393 (1983).

plumber-travelers would have otherwise been selected for layoff. The judge found Respondent Employer presented no evidence that its refusal to assign unscheduled overtime to the travelers was motivated by their being either less competent or less experienced than members of Respondent Union the foremen selected to perform the overtime. The judge emphasized that Respondent Employer failed to call any of its foremen or general foremen who made the overtime and layoff selections to explain their motivation for selecting the travelers for layoff and failing to assign them unscheduled overtime work.[5]

The judge found, however, that the 42 travelers in Appendix C of his decision would have been selected for layoff irrespective of their nonmembership in Respondent Union because they were not qualified pipefitters. The judge found:

> [The 42 travelers] are all plumbers by trade, who . . . were presumably less qualified to perform the pipefitting work required of them, than those pipefitters employed on the project who were pipefitters by trade. There is no evidence that any one of the 42 was an experienced pipefitter or that supervision regarded any one of them as just as competent as those pipefitters employed on the project who were pipefitters by trade.

In reaching this conclusion, the judge considered that the foremen failed to testify as to their motivation in selecting the travelers for layoff. The judge found, nevertheless, that circumstantial evidence warranted the inference that these travelers would have been selected for layoff in the normal course of business.

The General Counsel contends that the judge improperly relied on his erroneous findings that there was no evidence that supervision was satisfied with the 42 travelers' work, that as a class the plumbers were presumably less qualified to perform pipefitting work, and that there is no evidence that any of the 42 travelers was an experienced pipefitter. The General Counsel argues that the record reveals that many of these plumber-travelers had been working as pipefitters on the Shell Oil Project for months without having been terminated for cause.[6] The General Counsel claims that this raises an inference that Respondent Employer was satisfied with their work. Furthermore, the General Counsel points out that Respondent Employer failed to present testimony from these travelers' foremen as to why they selected them for layoff, or that the plumber-travelers would have been laid off in any event despite their nonmember status.[7]

We find merit in the General Counsel's analysis that the judge, by relying on his presumption that these travelers were less qualified pipefitters and therefore would have been laid off regardless of their nonmembership in Respondent Union, improperly substituted his own standards for those the foremen actually relied on in making the layoff selections and shifted to the General Counsel the burden of proof a respondent must meet under Wright Line. The judge erroneously distinguished between the group of 42 plumber-travelers (listed in Appendix C of the judge's decision) and the 12 plumber-travelers (listed in Appendix B), whose layoffs the judge found to violate Section 8(a)(3) and (1), merely because the General Counsel presented evidence of supervisory satisfaction with the 12 plumber-travelers' work, but not concerning the 42. Furthermore, the judge erred in distinguishing between plumber-travelers and pipefitter-travelers in determining that Respondent Employer established a nondiscriminatory, legitimate business reason for laying off the 42 plumber-travelers before Local members. In making their layoff selections, Respondent Employer's foremen made no distinction between plumber-travelers and pipefitters-travelers. Accordingly, we conclude that Respondent Employer violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by laying off the 42 plumber-travelers listed in Appendix C of the judge's decision.[8]

[5] Respondent Employer and the General Counsel presented evidence of a longstanding industry practice to give preference in overtime and layoff decisions to local members over nonmember travelers. The judge found that Respondent Employer failed to establish the existence of such an industry practice. The judge further found that even if such a practice existed, there was insufficient evidence to show that it was based on legitimate business rather than simply union membership considerations.

Respondent Employer and Respondent Union admitted, and we find, for reasons described below, that such a practice existed, but we agree with the judge that the practice is based on unlawful union membership considerations, rather than legitimate business reasons, and does not provide justification for granting preference to Local Union members over traveler nonmembers for purposes of unscheduled overtime and layoff selection.

[6] Respondent Employer had a practice of terminating pipefitters for cause such as poor production during the course of the project.

[7] There was, however, evidence that some foremen laid off travelers even though they considered them competent pipefitters.

[8] We specifically reject, as did the judge, Respondent Employer's 8(f)(4) defense because, in granting preference to members of Respondent Union over travelers in layoff and unscheduled overtime decisions, it did not rely on the permissible criteria of length of service with the Employer, in the industry, or in the particular geographical area.

Respondent Employer contends that the Union's priority book dispatch system insulates it from liability. The four book system grants priority in dispatch in the following order: (1) journeymen pipefitters with 3000 hours of employment in the Local 250 area; (2) journeymen pipefitters with 3000 hours in the area covered by the Local agreement; (3) journeymen pipefitters with 3000 hours in California; and (4) journeymen pipefitters with less than 3000 hours regardless of their place of employment. When, however, Respondent Employer's foremen made layoff and unscheduled overtime decisions, they did so based only on each employee's status as a local member or traveler, not on their book dispatch priority. That most Local Union members may have been in book I and most travelers in book IV does not make the Employer's dependence on membership status in decision-making valid under Sec. 8(f)(4).

2. The judge also found, and we agree, that Respondent Union violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act by threatening an employee with loss of employment if he contested Respondent Employer's unlawful policy of laying off travelers because of nonmembership in Respondent Union and by refusing to permit certain travelers to examine its hiring hall's dispatch books. Contrary to the judge, however, we also find that Respondent Union violated Section 8(b)(2) and (1)(A) of the Act by causing or attempting to cause Respondent Employer to discriminate against travelers with regard to unscheduled overtime and layoff selection because of nonmembership in Respondent Union, and Section 8(b)(1)(A) through certain statements about the discriminatory treatment of travelers.

The judge concluded the General Counsel failed to prove Respondent Union caused or attempted to cause Respondent Employer to discriminate against the travelers in violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act. The judge found no direct evidence of causation, and no direct or circumstantial evidence of either a written or oral understanding between the Respondents that Respondent Employer would discriminate against the travelers in favor of Respondent Union's members. He also found the Respondents' contention that a discriminatory longstanding practice in the pipefitting industry exists does not amount to an admission by the Respondents of an understanding between the Respondents to grant preferential treatment to Respondent Union's members. The judge rejected the Respondents' contention that such a longstanding industry practice exists. The judge found that "the understanding relied upon by the Respondents in their post-hearing briefs is not the type of understanding which exists by virtue of an overt or affirmative act engaged in by the Respondent Union," and thus did not constitute union causation under Section 8(b)(2) of the Act.

The General Counsel contends that all the surrounding circumstances support a reasonable inference that a union-employer understanding exists to discriminate against travelers in layoff and overtime selection. We agree.

To establish a violation of Section 8(b)(2) of the Act, direct evidence that the Union expressly demanded the discrimination is not necessary.[9] A union can be found to have caused employer discrimination if there is sufficient evidence to support a reasonable inference of a union request or a union-employer understanding.[10]

Respondent Employer and Respondent Union both admitted the existence of a discriminatory practice to which they were parties. Respondent Union's business manager Richard Slawson and its steward at the Shell Oil Project Richard Wareham testified that the practice of granting preference to local members over travelers for overtime and layoff purposes has been followed within Respondent Local's jurisdiction, as well as within that of other locals. Wareham also testified that if the travelers had not been laid off first, he would have considered it a violation of the members' rights and that he would have had to "try to help the members out." Foremen on the project informed their crewmembers that the travelers would not work overtime and were being laid off because of Respondent Union's policy.[11]

Union Steward Wareham was responsible for "checking in" the new hires on the project and explaining project work rules to them. During check-in, Wareham informed the employees that they would not be assigned unscheduled overtime because Respondent Union's members would do this work. Wareham also told traveler Cangi that he had been assigned overtime because the foreman mistakenly thought Cangi was a member of Respondent Union. When traveler Gilbert Smith complained to Steward Wareham about the layoffs, noting that new Local members were being hired at the same time travelers were being laid off, Wareham replied, "[T]hat's the way it is." When Smith said he did not think it was fair and intended to fight it, Wareham said if Smith fought it he would never work in the area again.

In addition, Respondent Union's agents refused to allow at least three travelers to view the dispatch books to determine their placement and verify that Respondent Union properly followed the dispatch system. Traveler Hector Martel testified that after his layoff he spoke to Union Business Manager Slawson concerning changing his book status to book I. Slawson stated that he wanted to keep the work for the Local hands. According to Martel, Slawson said, "[I]f you want to press the issue, you can, but I'll never dispatch—but you'll never get dispatched out of this office." Traveler Gerald Mayes testified that when he gave Slawson

[11] For example, Foreman Al Thuotte informed the travelers on his crew that "it was the policy of Local 250 that he just could not give [them] any overtime." Foreman Bill Springer told traveler Mayes that he was unable to remove Mayes' name from the layoff list because "word come down from 250 that all the Travelers will go" and that the instructions that the travelers would not work the overtime had come from Local 250. (The judge inadvertently attributed the latter statement to Foreman Wayne Springer, Bill Springer's son.)

verification of his 3000 hours to change to book I status, Slawson stated, "[Y]ou're still not going to work out of here."

We find these circumstances clearly demonstrate the existence of a union-employer understanding that Local members would receive preference over travelers for layoff and unscheduled overtime purposes. Indeed, as noted, Respondent Union and Respondent Employer have admitted its existence. The additional evidence in the form of statements by Respondent Union representatives and Respondent Employer foremen, recited above, is overwhelming confirmation of the parties' understanding. We therefore find that Respondent Union violated Section 8(b)(2) and (1)(A) of the Act by causing or attempting to cause Respondent Employer to discriminate against travelers in regard to selection for layoff and unscheduled overtime, and find it jointly and severally liable with Respondent Employer for any loss of earnings and benefits the travelers suffered as a result of the discrimination against them.[12]

We disagree with the judge that Union Steward Wareham did not violate Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act by, as previously recounted, telling employees "checking in" at the jobsite that they would not be assigned unscheduled overtime because Respondent Union's members would do this work, and informing traveler Cangi that he had been assigned overtime because the foreman mistakenly thought Cangi was a member of Respondent Union. The judge found these statements did not violate Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act because Respondent Union did not cause, nor was it responsible for, the Employer's illegal discrimination. Furthermore, according to the judge, the circumstances under which Wareham made the statements do not lead to the conclusion that "Wareham by his conduct placed himself in a situation reasonably calculated to lead the employees to believe that the Respondent Union was a party to the Respondent Employer's illegal discrimination." The judge found that Wareham was merely acting as a conduit for Respondent Employer in explaining company rules to employees, and "the circumstances do not warrant the inference that Wareham's explanation of the various company rules was calculated to lead the employees to reasonably believe that the Union was responsible for these rules."

The General Counsel contends that the judge's reasoning that Wareham was merely acting as Respondent Employer's conduit is without merit. The General Counsel points out that the "work rules" Wareham explained included the terms and conditions embodied in the labor contract. We agree. The union steward was responsible for enforcing the collective-bargaining agreement on the job, and for seeing that those employed on the site had the proper referral slip. Furthermore, Wareham's statement to Cangi was made when Cangi complained to Wareham as steward about his treatment on the job. Thus, Wareham was Respondent Union's representative at the site. See Iron Workers Local 600 (Bay City Erection), 134 NLRB 301, 306–307 (1961), modified on other grounds 144 NLRB 1049 (1963). We find that Wareham's statements tended to restrain or coerce employees in their Section 7 rights, and therefore violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.

In light of our finding of additional violations, we shall issue amended Conclusions of Law, an amended remedy, and a new Order and notices to employees and members.

AMENDED CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Substitute the following for Conclusion of Law 3.

"3. Respondent Employer violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by refusing to assign unscheduled overtime work to nonmembers of Respondent Union (travelers) employed on the Shell Oil Project in Carson, California, from 1 March through 31 May 1982, and by laying off the 129 travelers listed in Appendices A, B, and C of the judge's decision because they were not members of Respondent Union."

2. Substitute the following for Conclusion of Law 5.

"5. Respondent Union violated Section 8(b)(2) and (1)(A) of the Act by causing or attempting to cause Respondent Employer to violate Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by refusing to assign unscheduled overtime work to nonmembers of Respondent Union (travelers) employed on the Shell Oil Project in Carson, California, from 1 March through 31 May 1982, and by laying off the 129 travelers listed in Appendices A, B, and C of the judge's decision because they were not members of Respondent Union."

3. Add the following as Conclusion of Law 6.

"6. Respondent Union violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act by threatening an employee

[12] In Simmons Co., above, respondent union violated Sec. 8(b)(2) and (1)(A) by causing the employer to discharge an employee. In that case, the union business agent refused to renew the employee's work permit. The union steward told the employee that he could not let him work, and the company's foreman said, "That's right, you need a work permit." The foreman took the employee to the superintendent who terminated the employee. The foreman testified it was "understood" that a work permit was required for employment and stated that "things don't have to be spoken in words." The judge found no agreement or understanding requiring a work permit as a condition of employment. The Board reversed, finding that such an understanding existed, and that the employee had been terminated pursuant to the understanding.

with loss of employment if he contested Respondent Employer's unlawful policy of laying off travelers because of their nonmembership in Respondent Union, by telling employees checking in at the jobsite that they would not be assigned unscheduled overtime because Respondent Union's members would do such work, and by telling an employee that he had been assigned overtime because the foreman mistakenly thought he was a member of Respondent Union."

4. Reletter Conclusions of Law 6 and 7 as 7 and 8, respectively.

AMENDED REMEDY

Having found that Respondent Employer and Respondent Union have engaged in certain unfair labor practices, we shall order them to cease and desist and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Having found that Respondent Employer violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by refusing to assign unscheduled overtime work to the travelers employed on the Shell Oil Project in Carson, California, from 1 March through 31 May 1982 because of their nonmembership in Respondent Union and by laying off 129 travelers listed in Appendices A, B, and C of the judge's decision between 7 April and 19 May 1982 for the same reason, and having found that Respondent Union violated Section 8(b)(2) and (1)(A) of the Act by causing or attempting to cause Respondent Employer to engage in such conduct, we shall order Respondent Employer and Respondent Union, jointly and severally, to make whole the travelers for any loss of earnings or other benefits they may have suffered as a result of the discrimination against them, as prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), plus interest as computed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977). See generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962). The Respondents' backpay liability will toll no later than the date Respondent Employer's work on the Shell Oil Project ended.

We shall also order Respondent Employer to inform each of the discriminatees, in writing, that he or she will be considered eligible for future employment on a nondiscriminatory basis at any of its projects if he or she chooses to apply for employment at any of them. We shall order Respondent Union to inform each of the discriminatees, in writing, that it has no objection to his or her future employment at any of Respondent Employer's projects.

We shall further order Respondent Employer and Respondent Union to mail copies of the notices in Appendices A and B, respectively, to each employee Respondent Employer employed as a pipefitter on the Shell Oil Project from 1 March through 31 May 1982.

We shall also order Respondent Union to permit applicants for employment who register for work at its exclusive hiring hall to examine, on request, its dispatch books.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that

A. The Respondent Employer, M. W. Kellogg Constructors, Inc., Houston, Texas, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Laying off or refusing to assign unscheduled overtime work or in any other manner discriminating against any employee because of his or her nonmembership in United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices of the Plumbing and Pipe Fitting Industry of the United States and Canada, Local 250, AFL–CIO or any other union.

(b) Telling employees that they are being discriminated against in regard to unscheduled overtime assignments or layoff selection because of their nonmembership in Respondent Union, or any other union.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Make whole, jointly and severally with Respondent Union, the travelers employed on the Shell Oil Project in Carson, California, from 1 March through 31 May 1982 for any loss of unscheduled overtime pay, and the 129 travelers named in Appendices A, B, and C of the judge's decision for any loss of earnings or other benefits suffered as a result of the discrimination against them, in the manner set forth in the remedy section of the decision.

(b) Inform the individuals named in Appendices A, B, and C of the judge's decision, in writing, that they will be eligible for future employment at any of its projects on a nondiscriminatory basis if they choose to apply for employment at any of them.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Mail a copy of the attached notice marked "Appendix A"[13] to each individual it employed as a pipefitter on the Shell Oil Project between 1 March and 31 May 1982. Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 21, after being signed by Respondent Employer's authorized representative, shall be mailed by Respondent Employer immediately upon receipt.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps Respondent Employer has taken to comply.

B. The Respondent Union, United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices of the Plumbing and Pipe Fitting Industry of the United States and Canada, Local 250, AFL–CIO, Gardena, California, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Causing or attempting to cause Respondent Employer to lay off, or refuse to assign unscheduled overtime work to, any employee because of his or her nonmembership in Respondent Union.

(b) Telling employees that they are being discriminated against in regard to unscheduled overtime assignments because of their nonmembership in Respondent Union.

(c) Threatening employees with loss of employment if they contest Respondent Employer's practice of discriminating against employees because of their nonmembership in Respondent Union.

(d) Refusing to permit applicants for employment who register for work at its exclusive hiring hall to examine, on request, its dispatch books.

(e) In any like or related manner restraining or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Make whole, jointly and severally with Respondent Employer, the travelers employed on the Shell Oil Project from 1 March through 31 May 1982 for any loss of unscheduled overtime pay, and the 129 travelers named in Appendices A, B, and C of the judge's decision for any loss of earnings or other benefits suffered as a result of the discrimination against them, in the manner set forth in the remedy section of the decision.

(b) Inform the individuals named in Appendices A, B, and C of the judge's decision, in writing, that it has no objection to their future employment at any of Respondent Employer's projects.

(c) Permit applicants for employment who register for work at its exclusive hiring hall to examine, on request, its dispatch books.

(d) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all dispatch and other hiring hall records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(e) Post at its business offices and hiring hall, and mail to each individual employed as a pipefitter on the Shell Oil Project between 1 March and 31 May 1982, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix B."[14] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 21, after being signed by Respondent Union's authorized representative, shall be posted by Respondent Union immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to members are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(f) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps Respondent Union has taken to comply.

APPENDIX A

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT lay you off, refuse to assign you unscheduled overtime work, or in any other manner discriminate against any of you because of your nonmembership in United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices of the Plumbing and Pipe Fitting Industry of the United States and Canada, Local 250, AFL–CIO or any other union.

WE WILL NOT tell any of you that you are being discriminated against in regard to unscheduled overtime assignments or layoff selection because of your nonmembership in the Union.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL make whole, jointly and severally with the Union, the travelers employed on the Shell Oil

Project in Carson, California, from 1 March through 31 May 1982 for any loss of overtime pay, and the 129 travelers named in Appendices A, B, and C of the judge's decision for any loss of earnings or other benefits resulting from the discrimination against them, less any net interim earnings, plus interest.

WE WILL inform the individuals named in Appendices A, B, and C of the judge's decision, in writing, that they will be eligible for future employment at any of our projects on a nondiscriminatory basis if they choose to apply for employment at any of them.

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES AND MEMBERS
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT cause or attempt to cause M. W. Kellogg Constructors, Inc. to lay you off or refuse to assign unscheduled overtime work to any of you because of your nonmembership in us.

WE WILL NOT tell you that you are being discriminated against in regard to unscheduled overtime assignments because of your nonmembership in us.

WE WILL NOT threaten you with loss of employment if you contest M. W. Kellogg Constructors' practice of discriminating against employees because of their nonmembership in us.

WE WILL NOT refuse to permit applicants for employment who register for work at our exclusive hiring hall to examine, on request, our dispatch books.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner restrain or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL make whole, jointly and severally with M. W. Kellogg Constructors, Inc., the travelers employed on the Shell Oil Project from 1 March through 31 May 1982 for any loss of unscheduled overtime pay, and the 129 travelers named in Appendices A, B, and C of the judge's decision for any loss of earnings or other benefits resulting from the discrimination against them, less any net interim earnings, plus interest.

WE WILL inform the individuals named in Appendices A, B, and C of the judge's decision, in writing, that we have no objection to their future employment at any of M. W. Kellogg Constructors' projects.

WE WILL permit applicants for employment who register for work at our exclusive hiring hall to examine, on request, our dispatch books.

UNITED ASSOCIATION OF JOURNEYMEN AND APPRENTICES OF THE PLUMBING AND PIPE FITTING INDUSTRY OF THE UNITED STATES AND CANADA, LOCAL 250, AFL–CIO

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JERROLD H. SHAPIRO, Administrative Law Judge. The hearing in these cases which was held on several days between August 1 and 11, 1983, is based on unfair labor practice charges filed by an individual, Gilbert L. Smith, against M. W. Kellogg Constructors, Inc. (Respondent Employer) and United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices of the Plumbing and Pipe Fitting Industry of the United States and Canada, Local 250, AFL–CIO (Respondent Union) and collectively referred to as the Respondents. The initial charges were filed on June 10, 1982, and were amended March 21, 1983. Thereafter the Regional Director of the National Labor Relations Board for Region 21 consolidated these cases and on March 30, 1983, on behalf of the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board (the Board) issued a consolidated complaint based on the aforesaid charges alleging that the Respondent Employer was engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act) and that the Respondent Union was engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act.

The consolidated complaint alleges that Respondent Employer violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act and that Respondent Union violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act by entering into, maintaining, and giving effect to "an arrangement, understanding and practice" pursuant to which the members of Respondent Union employed by Respondent Employer were assigned overtime and not selected for layoff in preference to employees, who are not members of Respondent Union, known as travelers. The complaint further alleges that Respondent Employer further violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by assigning overtime work to members of Respondent Union in preference to the nonmember travelers thereby causing 157 named travelers to receive less overtime work during the period from March 1 through May 30, 1982, than they otherwise would have received and by selecting for layoff 130 named travelers on the dates alleged from April 7 through May 19, 1982, because they were not members of Respondent Union. Additionally the complaint alleges that Respondent Union violated Section 8(b)(2) and (1)(A) of the Act by causing Respondent Employer to engage in the aforesaid illegal conduct and violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act by refusing the request of job applicants to examine Respondent Union's referral and out-of-work list. Also the complaint alleges that Respondent Employer violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act and Respondent Union violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act by virtue of several statements made to employees by Respondent Employer's foremen and Respondent Union's steward about the aforesaid alleged illegal discrimination. Respondents filed answers denying the commission of the alleged unfair labor practices.

On the entire record,[1] from my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and having considered the posthearing briefs, I make the following

I. JURISDICTION

Respondents admit that Respondent Employer meets one of the Board's applicable discretionary jurisdictional standards and is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.[2]

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Respondents' Alleged Discrimination Against the Travelers in Favor of the Members of Respondent Union Employed on the Shell Oil Project

1. The evidence

a. Respondent Employer's business and its operations on the Shell Oil Project

Respondent Employer is a general contractor in the building and construction industry whose headquarters is in Houston, Texas. Its primary business is construction for industrial customers in the petrochemical industry in the several States of the United States and in other countries.

During 1981 and 1982 Respondent Employer, pursuant to a contract with the Shell Oil Company, was engaged in the modernization and expansion of facilities at Shell Oil Company's oil refinery in Carson, California (the Shell Oil Project). The facilities involved were the orthoflow unit, also known as the catalytic cracker, which makes gasoline from crude oil. Respondent Employer's work at the Shell Oil project was performed while the refinery was operating and consisted of two phases. The first phase, on which work began about June 1981, was the construction phase, during which Respondent Employer built new facilities, including the remodeling and expansion of the catalytic cracker. When this phase of the project ended, approximately late in May 1982, the second phase, referred to as the shutdown, began and was completed about July 27, 1982, at which time Respondent Employer's work on the project ended. During the shutdown phase Respondent Employer integrated the newly constructed unit into the existing facility.

Respondent Employer's work on the project was managed by a resident construction manager, a construction superintendent, and several craft superintendents, all of whom were not represented by any labor organization. Ned Bertrand was Respondent Employer's construction superintendent. The record does not reveal the name of Respondent Employer's piping superintendent who was the craft superintendent responsible for the work of the craft involved in this case. The employees involved in this case, Respondent Employer's pipefitters, worked in crews of from 6 to 12 persons. Each crew was supervised by a foreman. Several such foremen were supervised by a general foreman who was in turn supervised by a head general foreman. All of these foremen, who admittedly were statutory supervisors, were members of Respondent Union and were referred to the Shell Oil project through Respondent Union's hiring hall. Their terms and conditions of employment were established by Respondents' collective-bargaining agreement covering the project.

b. Respondent Union

Respondent Union's parent, the United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices of the Plumbing and Pipe Fitting Industry of the United States and Canada, AFL–CIO (the United Association) regulates the geographic and craft jurisdiction of its local unions.[3] The United Association charters pipefitter locals, plumber locals, sprinkler-fitter locals, metal trades locals, and combination locals that dispatch more than one of those crafts. Respondent Union is chartered by the United Association to perform all of the industrial pipefitting work in Los Angeles and Orange Counties which are in southern California. It is not a combination local, rather it is a straight line pipefitter local which has approximately 4200 active members, virtually all of whom are journeymen pipefitters. Respondent Union's principal official is its business manager Richard Slawson. Its representative on the Shell Oil project during the time material was Richard Wareham, its job steward.

Although there are indications in the United Association's constitution that a member of a local union affiliated with the United Association must reside in that local union's geographical territory, no such requirement is contained in Respondent Union's constitution and bylaws and, as a matter of fact, members of Respondent Union are not required to reside and do not in fact reside within its geographic jurisdiction.[4] The record reveals

[1] The General Counsel's motion to correct transcript is granted.

[2] Respondents admit that Respondent Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Sec. 2(5) of the Act.

[3] Respondent Employer in its posthearing brief "requests judicial notice of the fact that the purpose of such regulation by the United Association is to preserve its labor monopoly by eliminating competition between locals and apportioning jurisdiction in a logical, equitable and efficient manner." This request is denied because I am not persuaded that the facts which I have been asked to judicial notice are either "generally known" or "capable of accurate and ready determination by resort to sources whose accuracy cannot reasonably be questioned." See Fed.R.Evid. 201(b).

[4] Respondent Union is apparently not the only pipefitter local affiliated with the United Association which does not require its members to reside within the limits of its geographical jurisdiction. See Daugherty Co., 147 NLRB 1295, 1298–99 (1964).

that membership in Respondent Union is not keyed to residence within a circumscribed geographic area. No evidence was introduced as to the proportion of Respondent Union's members working on the Shell Oil project who resided within the geographical jurisdiction of Respondent Union.

c. Travelers

There are members of local unions affiliated with the United Association who leave the areas where they reside and travel to other areas in search of work. They are referred to as travelers. Some travel only on a temporary basis but others travel continuously. The United Association's constitution requires that a traveler get a travel card from his local union and deposit it with the local union within whose jurisdiction he is seeking work. The traveler continues to pay montnly dues to his local union and is responsible for maintaining membership in good standing in his local union, but pays a sum of $6 a month to the local union in whose jurisdiction he is seeking work. The $6 goes toward the local union's expense of operating its hiring hall and of representing the traveler for purposes of collective bargaining.

d. Respondent's collective-bargaining relationship and employment of the pipefitters on the Shell Oil project

The primary craftsmen used in Respondent Employer's business are pipefitters including pipefitter welders, herein referred to collectively as pipefitters. The United Association is a labor organization with primary jurisdiction over this craft. Thus Respondent Employer has historically been a party to the National Construction Agreement for the United States of America (the National Construction Agreement), which is a collective-bargaining agreement negotiated by and between the United Association and the Natrional Constructors Association on behalf of the Association's employer-members who do business throughout the United States, one of whom is Respondent Employer. This agreement provides that to the extent not inconsistent with it certain practices and terms of the local agreements shall bind the employers who are signatory to the National Construction Agreement. The particular local agreement which was in effect at the Shell Oil project is the 1980–1983 Independent Industrial and General Pipefitting Agreement (the Local Agreement) between the contractors who perform industrial and general pipefitting work in southern California and those local unions, including Respondent Union, located in southern California and affiliated with the United Association, who have jurisdiction over the work covered by the agreement

Respondent Union's trade jurisdiction encompassed the industrial pipefitting work performed by Respondent Employer's employees on the Shell Oil project. Accordingly the project was staffed through Respondent Union's hiring hall pursuant to the hiring provisions, article V, of the Local Agreement. In pertinent part article V obligated Respondent Employer to employ only qualified journeymen "steamfitters, pipefitters and/or welders" (collectively referred to as journeymen pipefitters) who have had 4 years of actual, practical working experience in the pipefitting trade in the building and construction industry. It further obligated Respondent Employer to hire these workers through Respondent Union's hiring facility. Article V also provides that Respondent Union, on the request of Respondent Employer, shall refer qualified pipefitter applicants from its hiring hall to Respondent Employer in the following order of preference: (1) those with 3000 hours of employment in Respondent Union's geographical jurisdiction within the past 3 years for contractors who were party to or covered by the Local Agreement; (2) those with 3000 hours of employment within the past 3 years in the geographical area covered by the Local Agreement with any of the contractors who were party to that agreement; (3) those with 3000 hours of employment in the State of California within the past 3 years as employees of employers party to a collective-bargaining agreement signed with a local union affiliated with the United Association in the State of California; and (4) those with less than 3000 hours of employment within the past 3 years regardless of their place of employment so long as the applicant qualified as a journeyman pipefitter. As a practical matter the effect of the hiring hall provisions is that those applicants who qualified for the first category, book 1, were usually members of Respondent Union and those applicants who qualified for the remaining three categories, books 2, 3, and 4, were usually either travelers or nonmembers of a United Association local.

During the period in which the major part of the construction phase of the Shell Oil project was in process, there was a shortage of journeymen pipefitters registered at Responent Union's hiring hall who were able to register on book 1. As a result, during this phase of the project, Respondent Union referred to Respondent Employer a substantial number of journeymen pipefitters registered on books 2 through 4 who were travelers. In addition there was also a shortage of traveler journeymen pipefitters registered on the out-of-work list so Respondent Union, in order to meet Respondent Employer's requests for pipefitters, allowed a substantial number of journeymen plumbers to register on the out-of-work lists and referred them to the project as journeymen pipefitters. All of the aforesaid travelers had deposited their travel cards with Respondent Union. A substantial number of them left their residences and traveled to Respondent Union's geographical area only after having been told by their own business agents that Respondent Union had notified said business agents that there was work available for them in Respondent Union's hiring hall.

e. The assignment of unscheduled overtime

There are two types of overtime in the construction industry: unscheduled and scheduled overtime. Unscheduled overtime occurs when employees continue to work after their regularly scheduled five 8-hour days, Monday through Friday. Even if this overtime is scheduled a few days in advance it is still considered unscheduled overtime. Scheduled overtime occurs when employees on a regular basis are scheduled to work more than the usual five 8-hour days, i.e., 6 days a week, 10 hours per day.

On the Shell Oil project there was no scheduled overtime during the construction phase, June 1981 through May 1982, and until March 1982 there was virtually no unscheduled overtime. During March, April, and May 1982 as the construction phase came to a conclusion there was a substantial increase in the amount of unscheduled overtime worked by the pipefitters. The National Construction Agreement and the Local Agreement are silent about the assignment of unscheduled overtime.

During the months of March through May 1982 the numbers of hours of unscheduled overtime assigned by Respondent Employer to members of Respondent Union and the nonmember travelers were as follows:[5]

Payroll Week	Hrs. of Overtime, Members	Hrs. of Overtime, Travelers
11	170	12.5
12	409	8.5
13	434.5	17
14	334	1.5
15	162	3
16	119.5	1
17	364.25	11.5
18	391.75	24
19	188.5	1.5

During the months of March through May 1982 the number of travelers and members of Respondent Union employed by Respondent Employer on the Shell Oil project was as follows:[6]

	Members	Travelers
3/8/82	236	131
3/15/82	243	141
3/22/82	240	150
3/25/82	243	140
4/5/82	236	140
4/12/82	226	100
4/19/82	216	97
4/26/82	208	92
5/3/82	203	58
5/10/82	208	32
5/17/82	212	14
5/31/82	277	1

[5] These figures do not include the number of hours of unscheduled overtime worked by the foremen, all of whom were members of Respondent Union.

[6] These figures include those members of Respondent Union employed as foremen.

f. Respondent's statements to travelers about overtime work

Respondent Union's steward on the Shell Oil project from January 1982 until the end of the project was Richard Wareham and prior to that the Union's steward on the project was Ronald Gilbert. When new hires were dispatched to the project from Respondent Union's hiring hall, the first thing they did on arriving at the jobsite was to give their referral slips to the union steward at which time the steward, before taking workers to the warehouse for their hardhats and to the general foreman for their job assignments, told them about the various company rules and regulations which governed the job. The record establishes that in 1981 Union Steward Gilbert and in 1982 Union Steward Wareham, in explaining the various company work rules to the new hires, told them that the travelers on the job would not be assigned any of the unscheduled overtime work. Also on at least one occasion Wareham told them that the orders that the travelers would not work any overtime had come from "up front" and on another occasion stated to a group of new hires that where there was overtime work the travelers would be replaced by "local 250 men."[7]

In April 1982 Rigging Crew Foreman Wayne Shouse on a Thursday asked the employees on his crew, at least two of whom were travelers, if they wanted to work the coming Saturday. Everyone indicated that they wanted to work. The next day, Shouse told the crew that the travelers on the crew could not work the Saturday overtime. When one of the travelers asked for an explanation for this action, Shouse stated that travelers would not be assigned overtime.[8]

In April 1982 Foreman Wayne Springer, whose crew consisted of virtually all travelers, on more than one occasion told members of his crew that since the crew was comprised of travelers he could not assign the crew any overtime and that because he did not think this was fair he had refused to work the overtime supervising another crew and did not intend to work any overtime. Wayne Springer's father, Bill Springer, who was also a foreman, likewise stated that he felt the same way and did not intend to work the overtime because if the men he supervised could not work it then he would not work it. Also Foreman Wayne Springer on one of these occasions explained to traveler Gerald Mayes that the instruction that the travelers would not work the overtime had come from Local 250.[9]

[8] The above description of Foreman Shouse's conduct is based on the testimony of travelers Paul Mathieson and George Bics who impressed me as being sincere and reliable witnesses. Shouse failed to deny engaging in the conduct Mathieson and Bics attributed to him.

In April 1982 Foreman Jack Moore told his crew, which included several travelers, that they could expect to work some overtime. The next day Moore retracted this statement; he told the crew that "there was not going to be any travelers going to work the overtime, just local hands." Also during the same period of time Foreman Moore asked one of the welders on his crew, who was a member of Respondent Union, to work some overtime, but failed to ask the welder's working partner who was a traveler. The welder's working partner, traveler Hector Martel, asked why Moore did not ask him to work overtime. Moore replied by stating that no travelers would work overtime.

On several occasions Foreman Joe Poletti asked the welder who worked with traveler Martel to work overtime but failed to likewise ask Martel to work the overtime. The welder was a member of Respondent Union, whereas Martel as a traveler was not a member of Respondent Union. When Martel asked, "[How] about me," Poletti told him, "[N]o, you're a travel card" and when Martel asked, "[H]ow come we don't work," Poletti stated, "orders from up high."

Traveler William Grady credibly testified that on occasion his crew worked overtime, but that Grady and the other travelers on the crew were not assigned to work the overtime and that once his foreman Al Thuotte apologized to Grady and Grady's welder, who was also a traveler, for not assigning them any of the overtime work and explained to them that "it was the policy of local 250 that he just could not give [them] any overtime."[10]

Traveler Virgil James was never asked to work overtime even though those members of his crew who were members of Respondent Union were assigned to work overtime. On several occasions James' foreman Joe Breiter and Breiter's general foreman Bill Stuart told James that he was not being asked to work overtime because he was a traveler.[11]

In March 1982 traveler Gerald Mayes discovered that other members of his crew were being assigned to work overtime but that he was not, so he asked General Foreman T. J. Cratsenburg the reason for this. Cratsenburg replied by stating, "[T]he travelers cannot work overtime, just the local people." Also in April 1982 Cratsenburg, in response to an inquiry from traveler Gilbert Smith as to whether Smith would be assigned to work overtime that week, told Smith, "[N]o, just local hands will work the overtime."[12]

Early in April 1982 traveler Michael Cangi, who was working on an instrumentation crew supervised by Foreman Marty Jewitt, was asked by Jewitt to work on Saturday, which was unscheduled overtime. Cangi observed that Jewitt did not ask Cangi's working partner, a member of Respondent Union, to work this overtime. Cangi told Jewitt that he felt uncomfortable working the overtime because Jewitt had not asked Cangi's working partner who was a member of Respondent Union to work with him. Jewitt replied by stating that it did not matter whether Cangi was a travel card or local, that Cangi was qualified and that Jewitt wanted him to work that Saturday. Cangi complied and worked this overtime. Thereafter Jewitt asked Cangi to work on another Saturday, but when Cangi observed that his working partner had again not been asked to work this overtime, Cangi went and spoke to Respondent Union's job steward, Richard Wareham. Cangi explained to Wareham that he had been asked to work that Saturday but felt uneasy about it because other workers on his crew who are members of Respondent Union had not been asked to work the overtime. Wareham told him that "the only reason" Cangi was working the Saturday overtime was because General Foreman Jess Hughes thought that Cangi was a member of Respondent Union. Cangi stated that he felt uneasy about working the coming Saturday because he did not want to ruin a good friendship among the crew and create hard feelings. Wareham responded by stating, "[L]et your conscience be your guide." Cangi called in sick and did not work the Saturday overtime. The following Monday General Foreman Hughes asked him why he had not come to work Saturday. Cangi informed him that he had felt uneasy because he was a traveler and that his working partner, who was a member of Respondent Union, was not asked to work. Cangi also told Hughes that "it's a standard procedure—I've worked in the Union 23 years and local members usually get preference [for] overtime." Hughes replied by stating that he knew that Cangi was qualified because he had worked with him on other jobs and that when Cangi

[9] The above description of Foreman Wayne Springer's conduct is based on the undenied testimony of travelers Gerald Mayes, Cloyd Colby, and Gilbert Smith. Each one of these witnesses impressed me as a sincere and reliable witness.

[10] Although Foreman Thuotte did not specifically deny having the above-described conversation, he testified that Grady once informed him that he did not desire to work overtime. Initially Thuotte testified that Grady had told him "that he's had his time and give it to the other guys." Later Thuotte gave a different account of Grady's refusal to work overtime, now testifying that when Grady was told by Thuotte that there would be some overtime in a day or two that Grady responded by stating, "[Y]ou can give that to the younger guys. I don't need to go up those stairs." I have credited Grady's above-described testimony because his testimonial demeanor was good, whereas Thuotte's was poor.

[11] Based on the testimony of James who when he testified seemed to be a sincere and reliable witness. Breiter did not refute James' testimony and Stuart was unable to categorically deny James' testimony. Stuart testified he was unable to specifically recall whether he talked with James about overtime. Demeanorwise, James impressed me as a more credible witness than Stuart.

[12] The findings in this paragraph are based on the testimony of Gerald Mayes and Gilbert Smith who demeanorwise impressed me as credible witnesses. Cratsenburg admitted that in selecting workers for unscheduled overtime it was the practice of the foremen under his supervision to select members of Local 250 rather than travelers and that Cratsenburg only assigned overtime to travelers in "an emergency." (Tr. 1003, 1043.) Cratsenburg did not deny engaging in the above-described conduct attributed to him by Mayes and Smith. However, with respect to Mayes, he testified that the reason he never asked Mayes to work overtime was that he knew that Mayes did not like to work in high places and with respect to Smith testified that Smith got all of the overtime that was available for his crew. To the extent that this constitutes a denial that he made the above-described statements to Mayes and Smith, I have credited Mayes' and Smith's testimony because their testimonial demeanor was excellent whereas Cratsenburg gave me the impression that he was solely interested in furthering the Respondents' position and not in the truth.

was asked to work overtime Hughes expected him to obey.[13]

g. The layoffs

The first phase of the Shell Oil project, the construction phase, ended late in May 1982 at which time the second and final phase commenced. This was the shutdown phase during which the newly constructed facilities were integrated into the existing facilities. The shutdown lasted until approximately the middle or end of July 1982 and all of the pipefitters employed on the project during this phase worked substantial amounts of regularly scheduled overtime. As I have noted supra, there was no regularly scheduled overtime work during the construction phase.

When the construction phase entered its final stages in April and May 1982 Respondent Employer for a legitimate business reason reduced significantly the number of pipefitters it employed on the project. These layoffs commenced during the week ending Friday, April 9, 1982, and ended during the week ending Friday, May 21, 1982.[14] Shortly thereafter Respondent Employer increased its work force of pipefitters significantly in order to meet its manpower requirements for the shutdown phase of the project. The numbers involved in these layoffs and rehires are as follows.

On April 5, 1982, the total number of pipefitters, including foremen employed by Respondent Employer on the project, totaled 378 of whom 140 were travelers and 238 were members of Respondent Union. (Jt. Exh. 1, App. J.) During the period starting from the week ending April 9 through the week ending May 21, 1982, a total of 180 pipefitters were laid off; 132 travelers and 48 members of Respondent Union. (Jt. Exh. 1, App. E.)[15] When viewed in terms of percentages approximately 37 percent of the pipefitters employed immediately before the layoffs commenced were travelers, yet 73 percent of the pipefitters selected for layoff were travelers. The result was that on May 24, 1982, at the completion of this series of layoffs there was a total of 202 pipefitters including foremen employed on the project, only 1 of whom was a traveler. (Jt. Exh. 1, App. J.)

Sometime during the week ending May 31, 1982, Respondent Employer commenced to hire additional pipefitters to work the shutdown and from this time until the end of the shutdown hired approximately 200 pipefitters to work on the project, none of whom were travelers. All of the aforesaid new hires were dispatched by Respondent Union to the project from the group 1 dispatch book pursuant to the terms of the Local Agreement. Of the 200 new hires 93 had been employed by Respondent Employer at some time earlier on the project and of these 10 had been discharged for cause and 12 had been laid off during the previous layoffs in April-May 1982.

As I have found, supra, only one traveler pipefitter remained employed on the project after the April-May 1982 layoffs. This traveler was Paul Foster. The only explanation advanced by Respondent Employer for not laying off Foster with all of the other travelers was the testimony of General Foreman T. J. Cratsenburg which was given during the General Counsel's cross-examination. Cratsenburg testified that the reason Foster was not laid off with the other travelers was that Foster had group 1 status because he had worked 3000 hours of employment in the geographical area of Respondent Union as a journeyman pipefitter under the Local Agreement. Cratsenburg further testified that it was Cratsenburg's understanding that Foster had book 1 status from the time he was initially referred to the project as he had been dispatched to the project by Respondent Union from book 1. I reject Cratsenburg's testimony for the following reason.

There is no evidence that at the time of the April-May 1982 layoffs Foster qualified for book 1, let alone evidence that Foster had documented the number of hours he had worked within Respondent Union's jurisdiction and gone to the Union with this documentation and asked to be placed on book 1. Quite the opposite, the record shows that Foster was dispatched to the project from book 2, not book 1, and that it was not until July 6, 1984, after his layoff from the project that Foster for the first time registered at Respondent Union's hiring facility on book 1 and that this book was not Respondent Union's usual book 1 on which persons classified as pipefitters registered, but the Union registered him on the Plumbers book also known as the Subjourneymen's book.

Traveler Fernando Moore who was classified by the United Association as a journeyman pipefitter was laid off with the other travelers in May 1982 even though he qualified for pipefitters book 1 status at the time of his layoff. Also travelers Hector Martel and Gerald Mayes and Gilbert Smith, who like Foster were classified by the United Association as journeymen plumbers, were laid off with the other travelers in May 1982 even though they, like Foster, qualified for plumbers book 1 status at the time of the layoff.

Cratsenburg's testimonial demeanor was poor. In general he left me with the impression that he was not a sincere and reliable witness. He seemed to be an insincere witness who was intent on slanting his testimony so that it would be helpful to the Respondents' case. This conclusion which is based on my observation of Cratsenburg's demeanor is bolstered by a significant inconsistency between Cratsenburg's testimony given during the hearing and the testimony contained in his prehearing af-

[13] The findings in this paragraph are based on the undenied and uncontradicted testimony of Cangi, who impressed me as a trustworthy and reliable witness.

[14] During the April-May 1982 layoffs Respondent Employer hired 34 pipefitters, all of whom were members of Respondent Union, 13 of whom were classified as pipefitters, 17 as instrument fitters, and 4 as welders. During this same period Respondent Employer laid off travelers whose trade classifications were pipefitters, instrument pipefitters, and welders. A total of 15 of the 34 new hires had previously worked on the Shell Oil project and had left under the following circumstances: 11 quit; 2 were discharged for absenteeism; and 1 was discharged for smoking in a nonsmoking area.

[15] The 132 laid-off travelers had the following United Association trade classifications: 55 plumbers; 37 welders; and 40 pipefitters, which included 2 sprinkler/fitters and 5 instrument fitters. (Jt. Exh. 1, App. E.) The 48 laid-off members of Respondent Union had the following United Association trade classifications: 29 pipefitters, including 2 instrument fitters, 6 metal trades fitters, and 1 apprentice; and 19 welders of whom 6 were metal trades welders and 1 was an instrument welder.

fidavit submitted to the National Labor Relations Board. In his prehearing affidavit Craftsenburg swore that in selecting pipefitters for layoff the foremen under his supervision gave no consideration to whether they were members of Respondent Union or whether they were plumbers or pipefitters by trade or what dispatch book they had been referred from to the project, but that the foreman selected pipefitters for layoff on the basis of their ability. In short Cratsenburg informed the Board that Respondent Employer in selecting pipefitters for layoff did not in any way prefer travelers for layoff over members of Respondent Union, but treated them equally so long as their ability was equal. However, during the hearing Respondent Employer conceded that Respondent Employer's foremen in selecting pipefitters for layoff followed an alleged longstanding industry practice pursuant to which they retained members of Respondent Union over travelers regardless of ability. Contrary to his affidavit, Cratsenburg during the hearing in this proceeding testified that the practice in the pipefitting industry is for foremen to lay off travelers before members of the local union in the geographical jurisdiction in which the project is located and that on the Shell Oil project this practice was followed. Cratsenburg further testified that if the foremen under his supervision had not followed this practice of laying off travelers before the members of Respondent Union that Cratsenburg "would have went and talked to [the foremen] and I would have asked them what the hell they were doing."

It is for all of the foregoing reasons, plus the fact that there was no corroboration of Craftsenburg's testimony that Foster was not laid off because he had qualified for book 1,[16] that I have rejected his testimony that this was the reason Foster was not laid off with the other travelers. Also, for the same reasons, I reject his further testimony, given in response to a leading question, that if a traveler on the Shell Oil project worked the requisite number of hours so as to qualify for book 1 status such a traveler was treated like a member of Respondent Union for layoff and overtime purposes.

Not only do I reject Cratsenburg's testimony concerning the reason for Respondent Employer's failure to lay off Foster, but I am persuaded that the circumstantial evidence warrants the inference that the real reason for Respondent Employer's failure to lay off Foster with the other travelers was that it mistakenly thought that he was a member of Respondent Union rather than a traveler. This conclusion is based on the following considerations.

When Foster was dispatched to the Shell Oil project on October 6, 1981, the referral slip issued to him by Respondent Union's dispatcher, which referral slip is used by Respondent Employer for recordkeeping purposes (Tr. 840), inadvertently failed to note that Foster was a traveler. Normally when a traveler pipefitter was dispatched to the project the dispatcher noted this fact on the face of the referral slip with the number of the United Association Local to which the traveler belonged.

Traveler Mayes testified that when General Foreman Cratsenburg in April 1982 told Mayes that Mayes could not work overtime because only local people could work it that Foster who was Mayes' welder was present, and that in the same breath Cratsenburg asked Foster to work the overtime. Likewise the foreman over Mayes' crew in denying Mayes' request to work unscheduled overtime stated to Mayes, in Foster's presence, that travelers could not work overtime, yet in the same breath selected Foster to work the overtime. Under the circumstances I think that it is a fair inference that because of Foster's referral slip Cratsenburg and Foster's foreman were under the mistaken impression that Foster was not a traveler but a member of Respondent Union.

Respondent Employer's head foreman for the project, William Goldie, testified that when the shutdown phase of the project started there was not a single traveler employed in Respondent Employer's work force, thus indicating that Respondent Employer believed that Foster, who was still in its employ, was not a traveler.

It is for all of the foregoing reasons that I am of the opinion that the reason Foster was not laid off with the other travelers prior to the start of the shutdown was due to Respondent Employer's mistaken belief that he was a member of Respondent Union.

h. Respondents' statements to the travelers concerning the layoffs

About May 1, 1982, Respondent Union's job steward Richard Wareham was asked by a group of travelers whether they would be able to work any overtime. The credible and undenied testimony of traveler Gilbert Smith is that Wareham responded by stating that "the travelers probably will not even be working the shutdown."

On May 14, 1982, the day that travelers Gilbert Smith and Paul Mathieson were laid off, they went to Union Steward Wareham following their layoff in order to get their referral slips which they needed to reregister at Respondent Union's hiring hall. During the ensuing conversation Smith complained to Wareham about the layoff of the travelers and the fact that new workers who were members of Respondent Union were being hired at the same time as the travelers were being laid off. Wareham replied by stating "that's the way it is" and advised Smith and Mathieson that "no travelers will be on the job, only local hands will work." Smith stated that he did not think that this was fair and intended to fight it. Wareham replied by stating that if Smith did fight it that Smith would never work in the area again.[17]

[16] Foster's foreman, the person who decided that Foster would not be laid off, was not called by Respondent Employer to explain why Foster was not laid off with all of the other travelers.

[17] The description of Wareham's May 14, 1982 conversation with Smith is based on a composite of Smith's and Mathieson's testimony. Their testimony was not inconsistent and each of them testified in a sincere and trustworthy manner. Wareham did not give his version of his conversation with Smith, but specifically denied making the above-described remarks attributed to him. I have rejected his denial because his testimonial demeanor was poor, whereas the testimonial demeanor of Smith and Mathieson, particularly Smith's, was good.

During the construction phase of the project General Foreman Bill Stuart asked traveler Michael Cangi on more than one occasion whether Cangi was eligible to transfer his membership into Respondent Union and told Cangi that if he did this that Cangi would be able to work the scheduled overtime connected with the shutdown phase of the project with the rest of the "local people."[18]

A few days before his Friday, April 30, 1982 layoff traveler Virgil James was notified by his foreman Joe Fahey that there would be a layoff that Friday which would affect Fahey's crew, but that "the people being laid off were not up to him [that] it was coming from above." Thereafter, on the morning of the layoff Fahey told James that General Foreman Bill Stuart "had given him a list of people to be laid off and that [James' name] was on it." Fahey stated, "[T]here was nothing he could do about who was chosen to be laid off, that that came down from Bill Stuart." Shortly after this General Foreman Stuart spoke to James and the others who were being laif off that day and explained to them that he had been ordered to reduce the workers employed on his crews and "was told by his superiors to get rid of the travelers."[19]

Early in April 1982 General Foreman T. J. Cratsenburg, in response to traveler Paul Mathieson's inquiry about whether Respondent Employer intended to lay off the travelers, told Mathieson and traveler George Bics that he was going to try to keep travelers Mathieson, Bics, Smith, Allen, and Mayes because they had been doing a good job. Thereafter during the April-May 1982 layoffs when Mathieson expressed concern about being laid off, Cratsenburg stated that Mathieson and the aforesaid four named travelers did not have to worry about being laid off. Also, Cratsenburg during the April-May 1982 layoffs told traveler Gilbert Smith that Cratsenburg was going to try to save the jobs of Smith as well as travelers Mayes, Mathieson, Allen, and Bics and employ them to do the rigging work during the shutdown phase of the project. And in early April 1982 Cratsenburg told traveler Cloyd Colby, in response to Colby's inquiry about being laid off, that Cratsenburg was going to try to save Colby from being laid off because Colby had done a good job for Cratsenburg and at one time they had been members of the same local union.[20]

On May 14, 1982, shortly after travelers Mathieson, Bics, and Smith were notified that they were being laid off that day, General Foreman Cratsenburg spoke to them and apologized for not being able to keep them on the project for the shutdown phase. He told them that there was nothing he could do about this, that there would not be any travelers working the shutdown phase of the project, and that this instruction had been issued by someone above him, either from "the top," or "higher up," or "from the man."[21]

Early in April 1982 Foreman Marty Barnes told traveler John Davis that the travelers on the project would not be working the overtime on the shutdown because "this was the way it was."[22]

On May 13, 1982, Foreman Wayne Shouse told travelers Mathieson, Bics, and Smith, who worked on his crew, that they would be laid off the next day. He explained to them that they were being laid off because there would be no travelers working during the shutdown phase of the project.[23]

On May 13, 1982, Foreman Bill Springer told traveler Gerald Mayes, who was laid off May 14, 1982, that while once before Springer had been able to remove Mayes' name from the layoff list, this time "word had come down from 250 that all travelers will go" and that Springer had unsuccessfully talked to the head foreman but that his hands were tied.[24]

Early in April 1982 Foreman Wayne Springer asked traveler Cloyd Colby what shift he wanted to work during the shutdown phase of the project, and noted Colby's preference in his notebook. Thereafter on May 6, 1982, the day before Colby's layoff, Colby was told by Springer that he was sorry to have to tell him that he was being terminated the next day and explained to Colby that all of the travelers were going to be terminated either that week or the following week.[25]

In May 1982, shortly before traveler William Grady's May 7, 1982 layoff, his foreman A. L. Thuotte spoke to Grady and two other travelers about the layoff. Thuotte told them he was not supposed to tell them that they were going to be laid off, but that all of the travelers would be laid off before "the big overtime starts" (a reference to the shutdown phase of the project during which regular overtime was scheduled), and that the overtime "will all go to 250 men."[26]

[18] The description of Stuart's remarks to Cangi is based on Cangi's testimony. Stuart testified that he could not imagine himself making these remarks but was not able to specifically deny making them. I have credited Cangi's testimony because Cangi's testimonial demeanor was that of a sincere and reliable witness.

[19] The description of Fahey's and Stuart's remarks set forth above is based on James' testimony. Fahey was not called to deny the remarks attributed to him. Stuart failed to give his version of the remarks he made to James and the other laid-off workers, but testified that he did not "recall" telling James that he had been instructed by his superiors to lay off travelers first. I have credited James' testimony and rejected Stuart's because James' demeanor was that of a sincere and reliable witness, whereas Stuart's demeanor was poor.

[20] The description of the conversations set forth in this paragraph is based on the testimony of Mathieson, Smith, and Colby, each of whom impressed me as a sincere and reliable witness. Their testimony was not denied by Cratsenburg who admitted that on more than one occasion he told travelers Mathieson, Bics, Smith, and Allen that they had been doing a good job and that he was going to try to keep them through the shutdown phase of the project.

[21] The description of Cratsenburg's above remarks is based on a composite of Mathieson's, Bics', and Smith's testimony only to the extent that their testimony is not inconsistent. They impressed me as trustworthy witnesses when they gave the above-described testimony. I have not credited Mathieson's testimony that Cratsenburg, in response to Mathieson's inquiry, identified Respondent Union's business manager Slawson as the person who ordered the layoff of the travelers. His testimony in this respect was contradicted by Bics and Smith, who testified that Cratsenburg did not mention Slawson's name.

[22] Based on the undenied testimony of Davis who impressed me as a credible witness.

[23] Based on the undenied testimony of Mathieson and Bics who impressed me as sincere witnesses.

[24] Based on the undenied testimony of Mayes who impressed me as a sincere witness.

[25] Based on the undenied testimony of Colby who impressed me as a credible witness.

[26] Based on Grady's testimony. Thuotte testified that he did not tell any of his crew that they were being laid off because they were travelers

i. The competency of the travelers employed on the Shell Oil project who were laid off and denied overtime work

The United Association has historically divided its members into different trades. The relevant trade classifications involved in this case are the pipefitter and plumber classifications. The pipefitter classification includes those pipefitters who specialize as welders or instrument fitters. The work of the pipefitters usually involves industrial pipefitting, namely, working on the piping and receptacles connected with high-pressure piping systems, including the instruments and controls connected with such systems, in the heavy manufacturing, petrochemical, and utility power industries. The work of the plumbers is usually confined to low-pressure piping systems, including the instruments and controls connected with such systems, associated with residential and commercial construction.

Respondent Union is a straight line pipefitters local; virtually all of its members are classified as pipefitters. Respondent Union's contractual relationship with Respondent Employer obligated it to dispatch qualified journeymen pipefitters to Respondent Employer's Shell Oil project. However, due to an insufficient number of applicants registered on book 1 at its hiring hall facility Respondent Union, in order to meet the employment requirements of Respondent Employer, was forced to rely on the applicants registered in its other books, who were traveler pipefitters and plumbers.

There is no evidence of the number of travelers and members of Respondent Union employed on the Shell Oil project prior to March 1982. But the record reveals that during March 1982 and through April 5, 1982, between 36 and 38 percent of the pipefitters employed on the Shell Oil job were travelers, either pipefitters or plumbers by trade. Thereafter in April 1982, approximately 31 percent of the pipefitters on the project were travelers, either pipefitters or plumbers by trade. This percentage dropped to 22 percent on May 3, 1982; 13 percent on May 10, 1982; 6 percent on May 17, 1982; and thereafter less than 1 percent. As I have found supra, Respondent Employer retained one traveler on the job after May 17, 1982, when it mistakenly believed that he was a member of Respondent Union.

The record, prior to April 1982, does not reveal the proportion of the travelers employed on the project who were classified by trade as plumbers and steamfitters. The sole evidence on this subject is that of the 132 travelers laid off during the months of April-May 1982, 57 percent or 75 were pipefitters by trade and 43 percent or 57 were plumbers by trade.[27] Absent any evidence to the contrary I shall presume that during the relevant period during which Respondent Employer was assigning unscheduled overtime, March through May 1982, this was the breakdown between traveler pipefitters and plumbers employed on the project.

I shall now set forth and evaluate evidence pertaining to the competency of the travelers employed on the project.

(1) The pipefitters

It is undisputed that all members of the United Association classified as pipefitters by trade have comparable minimum qualifications to perform work normally assigned to persons with this trade classification. The only evidence that specific traveler pipefitters by trade employed on the Shell Oil project were not performing their work competently or were otherwise less than satisfactory workers is the fact that during April 1982 three were discharged; two for lack of production and one for absenteeism. However, during this same period 25 fitters who were members of Respondent Union were discharged; 3 for lack of production. Other than this there is no specific evidence that Respondent Employer regarded any of the travelers on the project, who were pipefitters by trade, as less than satisfactory workers.[28] And the testimony of the three travelers who testified in this proceeding, who were pipefitters by trade, establishes that each of them was eminently qualified to perform the whole gamut of duties expected of them on the project. One was a member of a United Association straight line pipefitters local and the other two were members of combination locals. Likewise, the record reveals that several of the travelers who were pipefitters by trade had been working as pipefitters immediately prior to their employment on the project as pipefitters for the Bechtel Construction Company at the San Onofre, California Nuclear Power Plant under the terms of the National Contractors Agreement.[29] Under the circumstances, absent a prima facie showing that the traveler pipefitters by trade employed on the Shell Oil project were less qualified as a group than Respondent Union's members to do the project's pipefitting work, I will not presume that they were less qualified than Respondent Union members to work the shutdown phase or the unscheduled overtime during the construction phase. Quite the opposite, since all members of the United Association classified as pipefitters by trade have comparable miniand further testified that when he notified Grady of his layoff that he told him that the reason for the layoff was "probably because he was book 2, estimated as book 2, and then we were going to book one." I have rejected Thuotte's testimony and credited Grady's because the testimonial demeanor of Thuotte was poor, whereas Grady's was good.

[27] The 57 plumbers include 2 who were sprinkler fitters by trade which classification appears to be more closely related to the plumber classification in terms of normal industrial pipefitting work experience.

[28] I have considered the testimony of General Foreman Cratsenburg that he never observed a single traveler pipefitter on the job whom he felt was any good. Cratsenburg's testimony was completely without specificity. He failed to point to a single incident where he observed a traveler pipefitter by trade doing less than satisfactory work, nor did he name even one traveler pipefitter, who was a pipefitter by trade, whom he considered to be less than a satisfactory worker. Also, as I have noted supra, Cratsenburg gave me the impression from his testimonial demeanor that he was not a sincere or reliable witness.

mum qualifications to perform work normally assigned to persons with this trade classification, I have presumed, absent a showing to the contrary, that the traveler pipefitters by trade employed on the Shell Oil project as a group were just as qualified as Respondent Union's members to do the pipefitting work assigned on the project, including the unscheduled overtime work and the work during the shutdown phase of the project.[30]

The record reveals that during the April-May 1982 period relevant to this case 75 travelers employed on the project, who were pipefitters by trade, were laid off by Respondent Employer. The complaint specifically names each of these travelers and the respective dates that they were laid off and alleges that each of the layoffs was illegally motivated. The names of the 75 travelers who were pipefitters by trade and their respective dates of layoff are set forth in Appendix A of the decision.

(2) The plumbers

The record reveals that, while the basic skills and tools of a plumber are the same as those of a pipefitter, they are different trades with different qualifications and usually plumbers do not do industrial pipefitting or that if they do it is not generally with the same degree of regularity as a pipefitter by trade.[31] But it does not follow that all of the plumbers employed as pipefitters on the project were less competent than Respondent Union's members to work the unscheduled overtime during the construction phase or the extensive scheduled overtime work during the shutdown phase of the project. The evidence with respect to this question and my evaluation of it follows.

The record shows that plumbers Cangi, Mathieson, Rabey, Segura, Lindquist, Colby, and Martel employed on the project had experience working as industrial pipefitters at the time they began work on the project. Michael Cangi had been doing industrial pipefitting work for approximately 19 years and had worked on numerous industrial jobs where he performed all facets of the pipefitter's trade and had worked in the jurisdiction of Respondent Union as a pipefitter on five or six refinery jobs prior to the Shell Oil project. Paul Mathieson had worked as a pipefitter for approximately 4 or 5 years prior to the Shell Oil project and immediately prior to the project had been employed as a pipefitter for over 14 months on two industrial jobs within Respondent Union's jurisdiction and his work on the second of these jobs was apparently so impressive that the general foreman made him a foreman. Paul Segura and Joseph Rabey immediately prior to working on the Shell Oil project had been employed as pipefitters for the Bechtel Construction Company at the San Onofre, California Nuclear Power Plant, under the terms of the National Construction Agreement, for substantial periods of time; Segura for approximately 15 months and Rabey for approximately 11 months.[32] Segura's work as a pipefitter was apparently so satisfactory that he was made a foreman on the job. Other traveler plumbers who were experienced pipefitters were Larry Linquist, Cloyd Colby, and Hector Martel. Immediately prior to his work on the project Lindquist had worked for approximately 8 months as a pipefitter on refinery jobs within Respondent Union's jurisdiction. Cloyd Colby, who has been a member of the United Association for 20 years, and is a member of a combination plumber-pipefitter local, spent approximately 50 percent of his worktime as a United Association member working as a journeyman pipefitter.[33] Hector Martel prior to the Shell Oil project worked as a pipefitter in the jurisdiction of Respondent Union for approximately 9 months on a refinery job similar to the Shell Oil project and by the time of his layoff had worked within a 3-year period over 3000 hours as a pipefitter within Respondent Union's jurisdiction.

The statements made by Respondent Employer's foreman reveal that Respondent Employer thought that traveler plumbers Pashby, Cangi, Mathieson, Bics, Mayes, Smith, and O'Bosky were well qualified to do pipefitting work on the project. Keith Pashby was complimented about his work by his foreman and one of Respondent Employer's engineers. Michael Cangie was complimented about his work and reliability by both his foreman and general foreman. In fact General Foreman William Stuart indicated his satisfaction with Cangi's work by suggesting that Cangi transfer his membership into Respondent Union so that Cangi could work for Stuart during the shutdown.[34] Also a month before Cangi's layoff the foreman of the instrumentation crew, Marty Jewitt, was instrumental in Cangi being transferred to his crew because of Cangi's qualification as an instrumentation fitter, which the record shows was a skill which at that time Respondent Employer badly needed on the project. Cangi, on starting work on Jewitt's crew, observed that he was more qualified to do this work than [30] I recognize that the pipefitters who were Respondent Union members who worked on the Shell Oil project were, as a group, more likely than the traveler pipefitters by trade to have previously worked an oil refinery shutdown inasmuch as 35 or 40 percent of their work is refinery work. The record does not establish, however, that the shutdown or unscheduled overtime work on the project required skills and experience not possessed by the traveler pipefitters by trade or that they were not qualified to competently perform the type of work expected of a journeyman pipefitter during the shutdown or unscheduled overtime.

[31] I note that 3 of the General Counsel's 12 plumber witnesses, who worked as pipefitters on the Shell Oil project, Virgil James, William Grady, and John Davis, had virtually done no work as pipefitters prior to their employment on the project.

[32] Segura and Rabey worked for Bechtel at San Onofre for certain periods of time under the terms of a maintenance contract, but the record, G.C. Exh. 7, indicates which periods of time they worked under that contract and I have not relied on those periods of their employment with Bechtel in arriving at the above-described figures.

[33] As I have found supra, in early April 1982 General Foreman Cratsenburg told Colby that Cratsenburg was going to try to save Colby from being laid off because in addition to having belonged to the same local union as Cratsenburg Colby had done a good job on the project.

[34] The record establishes that at least one of the travelers on the project transferred his membership into Respondent Union during the construction phase of the project and as a result worked the shutdown. Thus, traveler Fernando Moore, who was employed as a welder on the project, testified that during the course of his work on the project he worked with a couple of excellent traveler pipefitters who assisted him with his welding, that one of them was Dave Schere, and further testified that during the course of the construction phase of the project Schere became a member of Respondent Union. Since Schere's name is not among those listed as having been laid off during the layoffs herein, I presume he was not laid off during the construction phase and worked the shutdown.

two of the other pipefitters who were members of Respondent Union, who had never done the work previously. On several occasions General Foreman T. J. Cratsenburg complimented the work of Paul Mathieson, George Bics, Gerald Mays, and Gilbert Smith.[35] Also, Bics' foreman complimented him about his work on several occasions.[36] And as I have found supra, during April-May 1982 Cratsenburg indicated that he regarded Mathieson, Bics, Smith, and Mayes as good employees whom he did not want to lay off.[37] Cratsenburg stated that he was going to try to keep these workers working through the shutdown because they had been doing a good job and because of this they did not have to worry about being laid off. And when Cratsenburg told them about their layoffs, he apologized and explained that it was not his decision but was forced on him from above. Also in Mayes' case it is undisputed that Mayes' foreman Bill Springer stated to him that he did not think laying off the travelers was fair because the travelers "were doing such a good job for him." And apparently because Mayes had been doing such a good job, Springer had previously removed Mayes' name from a layoff list.

Also, with respect to Mathieson's and Bics' competency as pipefitters on the project, traveler Albert Allen, who is a pipefitter by trade who worked on the project as a welder, credibly testified that Mathieson and Bics worked with him as pipefitters when they were not working on the rigging crew and that Mathieson's work as a fitter was "good" and that Bics' work was "very good." Allen further testified that while one of Respondent Union's members who worked with him as a pipefitter was a "very good man" that another one by the name of Williams had no idea of what to do and Allen had to give him repeated instructions. Lastly, with respect to Reginald O'Bosky, it is undisputed that O'Bosky's foreman and general foreman complimented him about his work and that before he was laid off General Foreman Johnston asked O'Bosky and Cangi if they would work the shutdown for him as he was going to work a crew at night during the shutdown, thus indicating that Johnston regarded both O'Bosky and Cangi as competent to work the shutdown. And when Foreman Young informed O'Bosky that he was laid off, Young indicated that he was unhappy with having to lay off O'Bosky because he wanted to keep him on his crew to work the next job. Previously on March 22, 1982, General Foreman Stuart and Foreman Breiter plus two other pipefitters who were members of Respondent Union signed a statement on O'Bosky's behalf that they had worked with him on the project for over 5 months and "find him reliable, qualified as a steamfitter" and "feel he would be a benefit to the trade as a steamfitter."

Respondent called six witnesses to testify about the competency of the plumbers employed on the Shell Oil project: Head General Foreman William Goldie; General Foremen T. J. Cratsenburg and William Stuart; and Foremen Al Thuotte, Wayne Shouse, and Martin Barnes. Their testimony, in pertinent part, is set forth hereinafter.

Head General Foreman Goldie testified that he observed that many of the travelers seemed unfamiliar with the work they were doing. When asked to point to specific examples of what he observed, Goldie was unable to do so. He testified, "I cannot give you too many [examples] right now. I've seen a lot of stuff that tells you the man is not familiar with the work." The closest to any degree of specificity that Goldie came was when he testified, "I've seen people rigging up things which is very unsafe." When he gave this testimony Goldie did not impress me as a sincere witness. His testimonial demeanor was poor. I also note that Goldie gave contradictory testimony to the National Labor Relations Board on a highly significant matter. During the investigatory stages of this proceeding Goldie submitted a sworn affidavit to the Board in which he stated that in selecting pipefitters to work overtime and for layoff on the Shell Oil project that Respondent Employer did not consider the pipefitters' status as travelers or members of Respondent Union, rather the selection was based on merit. During the hearing, however, Goldie flatly contradicted this testimony, now testifying that the status of the pipefitters as travelers and as members of Respondent Union was taken into account in selecting pipefitters for layoff and for overtime. These inconsistencies in Goldie's testimony, plus his poor testimonial demeanor, left me with the impression that Goldie was not a sincere witness, but was tailoring his testimony to fit whatever he thought would help Respondent's case. This plus the ambiguity in Goldie's testimony has led me to reject Goldie's above-described testimony regarding the competency of the travelers employed on the Shell Oil project.

Foreman Thuotte testified that the three plumbers employed in his crew, Datz, Grady, and Locke, were willing workers, but lacked prior pipefitting experience because he was forced to give them the same amount of supervision that he would have given an apprentice pipefitter. Thuotte further testified that there was another traveler on his crew whom he identified as "Vince," who worked as a welder and who was as qualified as the members of Respondent Union that worked on Thuotte's crew.

Foreman Barnes testified that plumber John Davis, who was employed in Barnes' crew and who, as I have found supra, had virtually no prior pipefitter experience, did not have the skills of a journeyman pipefitter and because of this Barnes could not assign him the usual scope of work performed by a journeyman pipefitter. Barnes also testified that the other plumbers employed as fitters on his crew in general had to be closely supervised because of their lack of experience, but that there were some plumbers in his crew who were competent pipefitters. Barnes further testified that most of the plumbers whom he observed on the project were not as competent as the members of Respondent Union employed on the project, but while the plumbers as a group were not as competent as Respondent Union's members there were some plumbers who were just as good and perhaps even more competent than certain members of Respondent Union.

General Foreman Stuart's crews were comprised of mostly travelers, most of whom were plumbers by trade. Stuart testified that while some of these travelers "approached being as good" as the members of Respondent Union the vast majority was not nearly as competent as the members of Respondent Union employed on the project,[38] and because of this he was forced to assign them the type of work that they were used to doing as plumbers, i.e., screwing pipes and doing the rigging work, and since the plumbers did not know much about heavy rigging that he closely supervised their rigging work.

General Foreman Cratsenburg testified concerning the competency of plumbers Judd, Colby, Lindquist, Mayes, Mathieson, Smith, and Bics. Regarding Judd and Colby he testified he received complaints from the welders for whom they were doing fitting work that they did not know how to do their job. Regarding Lindquist he testified that Lindquist's foreman and fellow employees complained to him that Lindquist was standing around a lot instead of working and that Cratsenburg had several talks with Lindquist's foreman to try to get Lindquist to work. Regarding Mayes he testified that Mayes was afraid of working up high and asked Cratsenburg to assign him to a job close to the ground. Regarding Mathieson, Smith, and Bics he testified that they were willing workers and that he received no complaints about their work, but that their foreman had to train them and closely supervise their work on the rigging crew because of their inexperience. Lastly, when asked whether there were any specific problems to which he could refer reflecting the difficulties that he had with the travelers in terms of their competence or ability, that he did not have with the local hands, Cratsenburg was able to point to only one episode. In this regard he testified that while laying out a sewer line Bics, Mathieson, and Smith were in the process of hacksawing into an electrical line and that Cratsenburg stopped them from doing this only after their foreman Wayne Shouse informed Cratsenburg what they were doing.

I reject Cratsenburg's above-described testimony in its entirety for these reasons. Cratsenburg's testimonial demeanor, as I have found supra, was that of an insincere witness who seemed intent on slanting his testimony so that it would be favorable to Respondents in disregard of the truth. The following additional factors further impugn his testimony. It is undisputed that Colby, who Cratsenburg supposedly was informed was not a competent pipefitter, was told by Cratsenburg that he was trying to prevent Colby from being selected for layoff because Colby had done a good job for Cratsenburg. It is undisputed that Lindquist received no complaints or disciplinary warnings from supervision despite Cratsenburg's allegation that he was a constant subject of complaints for not working and that Cratsenburg on several occasions supposedly spoke to Lindquist's foreman in an effort to get him to do some work. Mayes credibly testified that he was not afraid to work up high and that prior to the Shell Oil project he had done this type of work and was comfortable doing it. It is undisputed that during the April-May 1982 layoffs, as I have found supra, Cratsenburg stated that he was going to try to keep Mathieson, Bics, Smith, and Mayes to work the shutdown phase of the project because they had been doing a good job and that when he laid them off he apologized saying that his decision to lay them off had been forced on him from above. This hardly jibes with his above-described comments concerning their work. And finally Mathieson and Bics, who impressed me demeanorwise as sincere witnesses, specifically denied engaging in the conduct concerning the cutting of the electrical line attributed to them by Cratsenburg. Also Wayne Shouse, their foreman, who was a witness for Respondent Employer, failed to corroborate Cratsenburg's account of this incident. It is for all of the foregoing reasons that I have rejected Cratsenburg's testimony in its entirety.

It is undisputed that plumbers Mathieson, Bics, and Smith prior to the Shell Oil project had an insignificant amount of experience doing heavy rigging work of the sort being done on the project. On the project they worked in large part on Foreman Wayne Shouse's rigging crew and they also did other pipefitting work for Shouse and on other crews. Shouse testified that, due to the inexperience of Mathieson, Bics, and Smith, he had to teach them how to do the rigging work, and that initially he supervised them very closely and even toward the end of their tenure gave them close supervision on several heavy lifts which were "very, very complicated." He further testified that not one of these three plumbers knew the system of hand signals used to do the rigging work and that Shouse had to teach them the signals used to do the rigging work and had to correct them over and over until they got the signals right. Mathieson and Bics testified in effect that despite their inexperience that Shouse did not have to teach them how to do their jobs as riggers or teach them the proper hand signals to use. In regard to the hand signals it is undisputed that these signals are printed clearly on the outside of the cranes used in the rigging operation. Mathieson testified that during the period of several months that he worked on the rigging crew on only approximately five occasions did Shouse have to explain to the crew how to do their job, but would usually stand and watch them work. Mathieson and Bics impressed me demeanorwise as credible witnesses, Shouse did not. Accordingly I have rejected his testimony. I also note that it is hardly likely that General Foreman Cratsenburg, Shouse's supervisor, would have indicated that he wanted Mathieson, Bics, and Smith to remain on the project for the shutdown phase of the project if in fact they were as incompetent on the rigging crew as described by Shouse. In addition, it is undisputed that Mathieson, Bics, and Smith were complimented by either Cratsenburg or Foreman Shouse about their work.

[38] I am convinced that when Stuart testified that the work of some of the travelers whose work he was familiar with "approached being as good" as the work of the "local hands" that he was not being truthful and that in fact there were some, albeit very few plumbers, who worked under his supervision whose competency equaled that of the local hands under his supervison. Thus when Stuart gave this testimony I received the impression from his testimonial demeanor that he was not being perfectly candid in his assessment of the travelers' competency. This impression is reinforced by the undisputed testimony of plumber Michael Cangi, set forth supra, that on several occasions Stuart indicated his satisfaction with Cangi's work by suggesting that Cangi transfer his membership into Respondent Union so that Cangi could work for Stuart during the shutdown phase of the project. Also it is undisputed, as described in detail supra, that on March 22, 1982, Stuart signed a statement on behalf of plumber Reginald O'Bosky that he had worked with O'Bosky on the project for over 5 months and "find him reliable and qualified as a steamfitter" and "feel he would be a benefit to the trade as a steamfitter."

Based on the foregoing I am of the opinion that as a class the plumbers by trade employed on the Shell Oil project as pipefitters were not as competent as the pipefitters by trade employed on the project, but that of the 55 plumbers laid off during the time material the record establishes that 12 of them were as competent in their work as pipefitters on the project as the pipefitters by trade. The 12 were: Hector Martel, Michael Cangi, Paul Mathieson, Paul Segura, Joseph Rabey, Gerald Mayes, George Bics, Gilbert Smith, Larry Lindquist, Reginald O'Bosky, Cloyd Colby, and Keith Pashby.[39] The conclusion that the record shows that their work as pipefitters on the project was as competent as the work performed by the class of workers who were pipefitters by trade is based on one or a combination of the factors described above: work experience as a pipefitter; and/or the statements by supervision; and/or the observation of pipefitter by trade Allen about the work of two of them.

In concluding that there is insufficient evidence to establish that as a group the laid-off travelers who were pipefitters by trade were less competent than members of Respondent Union who were not laid off and in also concluding that there was more than a de minimis number of laid-off traveler plumbers who were just as competent as members of Respondent Union who were not laid off, I have taken into consideration the testimony of Respondent Employer's witnesses who testified in effect that the shutdown phase of the project which was staffed completely by members of Respondent Union went much better than the construction phase. To the extent that the layoffs resulted in the removal of the plumbers who are not experienced pipefitters and their replacement by experienced pipefitters I am sure that it resulted in greater productivity during the shutdown than if these plumbers had been retained. However, the degree of this increase in productivity is open to serious question. Other than the conclusionary and self-serving testimony of Respondent Employer's construction superintendent Bertrand, Head General Foreman Goldie, and General Foremen Cratsenburg and Stuart, Respondents offered no concrete evidence that demonstrates the extent of the improvement of the productivity during the shutdown phase in comparison to the construction phase.

Head General Foreman Goldie testified that the shutdown went much better and faster with less problems than the construction phase. Construction Superintendent Bertrand, Respondent Employer's principal management official on the project, simply testified that the shutdown went much better than the construction phase. General Foreman Cratsenburg testified that the workers performed far more work during the shutdown than during the construction phase. General Foreman Stuart testified that the quality of the work force was much better during the shutdown. No concrete evidence was introduced to indicate by how much the productivity improved. All the record reveals is that the shutdown phase was scheduled to last approximately 6 weeks with a certain number of pipefitters and that it in fact finished on time using that amount of pipefitters. There is no evidence that the construction phase did not finish on time with the allotted number of workers or that the unscheduled overtime worked during the construction phase was unusual for a project of this kind. In short, while I am sure that the replacement of the plumbers who were inexperienced pipefitters by the more experienced pipefitters who were members of Respondent Union resulted in an increase in productivity, I am not persuaded that the record establishes that the increase was substantial or significant.

j. The alleged industry practice of granting preferential treatment in overtime and layoff selection to local United Association members over Travelers

(1) The evidence

Respondents contend that there is an industry practice of granting preferential treatment in overtime and layoff selection to local members of the United Association over travelers. I shall discuss and evaluate the evidence pertinent to this contention. However, before doing this I note that I have not considered the testimony on this subject given by either William Goldie or T. J. Cratsenburg, both of whom impressed me as being dishonest and unreliable witnesses to such an extent that it was not possible for me to tell when they were and when they were not distorting their testimony so as to favor Respondents.

Goldie, who was Respondent Employer's head foreman on the Shell Oil project and is a member of Respondent Union, testified that, during the 32 years he has worked in the industry, a preference has been given to local members of the United Association over travelers in the assignment of unscheduled overtime. When questioned by Respondent Employer's counsel about the alleged industry practice, not only was Goldie's testimonial demeanor poor but his manner of testifying reinforced my impression that he was not a reliable witness. His initial testimony on this subject was not responsive to the question and, when the question was repeated, Goldie was still unable to answer it and remained silent for a long period of time. He explained his silence in these terms: "I'm thinking . . . I do not want to say the wrong thing." It was my impression that this was not the observation of a conscientious witness who was hesitating in order to be sure that his testimony was accurate and reliable. Rather Goldie's demeanor was that of a witness intent on making sure that his testimony was favorable to Respondents even if it meant distorting the facts. Also, the reliability of any testimony given by Goldie on the subject of an alleged industry practice of preferring the local members over travelers is highly suspect due to the fact that Goldie gave sharply contradictory testimony to the Board, as I have described supra, on the closely related subject of the way Respondent Employer handled the overtime and layoff selection on the Shell Oil project. It is for all of these reasons that I have concluded that Goldie is an unreliable witness and because of this I have not considered his testimony.

The demeanor of T. J. Cratsenburg, a member of Respondent Union and a general foreman of Respondent Employer on the project, was poor. Also as I have found supra, he gave false testimony on the following significant matters: the failure of Respondent Employer to select traveler Paul Foster for layoff; the competency of certain travelers who worked on crews under his supervision; and his contention that three of these travelers created a possible safety hazard when they supposedly almost hacksawed an electrical line. In addition, the reliability of any testimony presented by Cratsenburg on the subject of an alleged industry practice of preferring local members over travelers is highly suspect due to the fact Cratsenburg gave sharply contradicting testimony to the Board, as I have described supra, on the closely related subject of the way Respondent Employer handled the layoff selection on the Shell Oil project. It is for all of these reasons that I have concluded that Cratsenburg is an unreliable witness and because of this I have not considered his testimony.

Gilbert Smith, a traveler on the Shell Oil project, who was a plumber by trade and who has been a member of the United Association for over 20 years, testified that "it is in the Plumber's Union unwritten law that when a job is finished the travelers will get laid off first." Smith, to illustrate the application of this law, further testified that when members of Respondent Union worked as travelers on a job in the jurisdiction of Smith's local union and a job started to "wind down," the members of Respondent Union were laid off first before the members of Smith's local union. There is no evidence concerning the number of times Smith during his career has worked as a traveler in the pipefitting industry.

Cloyd Colby, a traveler on the Shell Oil project who has been a member of the United Association for approximately 20 years, testified, "[I]t is common practice by the Union not to let travelers work overtime [on refinery jobs]. When plant shutdowns in the refinery business occur, it is common practice by the plumbing and pipefitting union to give the overtime to the local union members and to lay off the travelers first where there is a reduction in force." There is no indication of the number of refinery jobs worked by Colby as a pipefitter, other than the Shell Oil project. Colby testified that his aforesaid testimony was based on what he was told by other members of his local union and by members of Respondent Union and not on his personal experience. Colby also testified that on the nonrefinery industrial pipefitting jobs that he has worked, as the job nears its completion layoffs are based on merit with the better workers being retained regardless of their status as a traveler. There is no evidence as to the extensiveness of Colby's work as a traveler on industrial pipefitting jobs other than an indication that he worked once in Seattle, Washington.

Michael Cangi, a traveler on the Shell Oil project, who is a plumber by trade and a member of the United Association for approximately 23 years, testified that "it's standard procedure" that "local members usually get preference" for overtime work because "that's just the way we work it," but where there is full employment the travelers are assigned overtime and "there is usually no stink raised because everybody's getting a piece of the action." And with respect to layoffs Cangi testified that there is an unwritten code or law among the members of the United Association that when there are local United Association members out of work in the area of a project which is nearing completion that the travelers on the project voluntarily quit so that the local workers will have the work. In this respect he testified:

> [I]t's the same as if you come to a job and they have a picket line there, you don't call the business manager and ask if you can cross it. You know you are not supposed to work behind the picket line. A good union man doesn't. So that's a code; you just don't do it. It's an unwritten law. The same with if a job is winding down, there is no more work in the area, they give you the opportunity, let you know. They let you know that the work is winding down and they would appreciate it if you sought work elsewhere. But you don't have to quit. They give you that choice. That is the way I have worked it for 23 years.

But if there is ample work for both the local members and the travelers, Cangi testified that he remains on the project until its completion even though he is a traveler. The record establishes that Cangi has worked as a traveler on several occasions as a pipefitter in the jurisdiction of the Respondent Union and has also worked as a traveler in the pipefitting industry at various times in Seattle, Washington, Fairbanks, Alaska, New London, Connecticut, San Diego, California, and San Luis Obispo, California.

Martin Barnes Jr., a pipefitter by trade and a member of Respondent Union, was a foreman on the Shell Oil project. He has only worked as a traveler in the pipefitting industry within the State of California and there is no evidence of the number of jobs that he has worked as a traveler. He testified that "if there is going to be layoffs . . . they lay off the travelers before they lay off local people" and that when Barnes worked as a traveler that he was laid off before the local members on the job, even though Barnes was a more competent worker than the local members. In fact, Barnes testified that he will quit a job on which he is working as a traveler in order to prevent a local member from being laid off ahead of him, explaining, "so I can go back to that local and work anytime I want without any hassles." This is true even when Barnes works within the geographical jurisdiction of the United Association local which has the pipefitting jurisdiction covering the geographical area in which Barnes lives.[40]

Richard Slawson, Respondent Union's business manager, who is a journeyman pipefitter by trade, testified that the criteria used generally in the pipefitting industry throughout the United States to allocate unscheduled overtime and to select workers for layoff is as follows:

> Normally if there is a small amount of overtime in a particular area on a job site [and if the] job site consisted of just members from the area, they would probably try to spread it around a little bit so that the members do not become disgruntled. But if there was a mix on the job site of people from outside the area that the foremen were unfamiliar with, travelers in the instance of overtime, it would be that the local people would be given the overtime, and in the instance of layoff, the local people who the foremen are familiar with would remain on the job.

Slawson further testified that his familiarity with these criteria is based on his "experience on job sites" and his conversations as an official of Respondent Union with members of that Union and with officials from other United Association local affiliates. There is no indication in the record as to the number of jobs or their locations on which Slawson worked as a traveler.

Richard Wareham, a journeyman pipefitter, who was Respondent Union's job steward on the Shell Oil project, testified that he has experience working on crews which employed a mix of travelers and local union members, and that his experience has been that the criteria used for selecting persons for layoff on such crews was that the travelers were laid off first and local union members last and that he knew of no case where this procedure was not followed. Regarding the allocation of unscheduled overtime where mixed crews of travelers and local union members were employed, Wareham testified that there is no policy that travelers do not receive the unscheduled overtime, but that in fact they usually do not receive unscheduled overtime because the crew foreman almost always gives preference to the local union members over the travelers in the assignment of such overtime. There is no evidence of the number of jobs or their locations where Wareham has worked as a traveler.

William Stuart, a pipefitter by trade and a member of Respondent Union, was a general foreman for Respondent Employer on the Shell Oil project. He testified that he was familiar with a practice and custom in the pipefitting industry pertaining to layoffs and the allocation of overtime. He described this practice and custom as follows. "Local Hands get preference." Stuart admitted that until 1983 he had never previously worked as a traveler, but that his aforesaid testimony was based on what he had been told by various pipefitters who were members of his family or otherwise related to him.

Wayne Shouse, a journeyman pipefitter and a member of Respondent Union, was a foreman on the Shell Oil project. Shouse has worked as a traveler in these locations: Anchorage, Alaska, San Diego, California, and San Luis Obispo, California. He testified that on those jobs it was the practice to lay off travelers first. More specifically he testified, "[T]hey gradually lay off, lay off, lay off and the travelers are always the first ones they lay off" and that pursuant to this practice Shouse was laid off ahead of local members even though in some instances he had substantially more experience than the local members retained. Shouse also testified that the practice in the pipefitting industry regarding unscheduled overtime was "where there is [unscheduled] overtime . . . normally, the local people will work and travelers will not get that overtime."

Al Thuotte, a journeyman pipefitter and a member of Respondent Union, was a foreman for Respondent Employer on the Shell Oil project. Thuotte has had de minimis experience working as a traveler, but testified that based on what his uncle, a retired United Association member, has told him, it was his understanding that it was common practice for travelers to be laid off before local hands.

Ned Bertrand, Respondent Employer's construction superintendent on the Shell Oil project, testified that the practice and custom in the pipefitting industry "has always been that when it comes down to layoffs, all the travelers will go first and the local people will be last" and further testified that with respect to the assignment of unscheduled overtime "it's been a custom that they use local people to do the work." Regarding Bertrand's qualifications to give his testimony, the record reveals that for virtually his entire life he has worked for one employer, Respondent Employer, in both the United States and other countries. All total he has worked for approximately 20 years for Respondent Employer on projects located in the United States in the States of California, Virginia, Iowa, Texas, Kansas, Ohio, and Louisiana. For the past 20 years his position has been that of at least pipefitting superintendent or higher. However, for the 10-year period preceding the Shell Oil project Bertrand had nothing whatsoever to do with the selection of workers for layoff or the selection of workers to work unscheduled overtime, inasmuch as these matters are left entirety to the discretion of the general foreman and foreman on the job. In fact Bertrand was not even informed during this 10-year period as to the basis for the selection of personnel for layoff or overtime.

(2) Conclusions

I am of the opinion that the testimony of the several witnesses set forth immediately above, whether considered separately or in its totality, is insufficient to establish that there is a longstanding practice in the pipefitting industry of the United States[41] whereby the members of the local unions affiliated with the United Association, in whose geographical jurisdiction a job is being performed, receive preferential treatment over travelers in overtime and layoff selection. I have reached this conclusion because of the following considerations.

[40] Barnes, although a member of Respondent Union, does not live within its geographical jurisdiction.

The testimony of Colby, Thuotte, and Stuart concerning the alleged past practice is based solely on hearsay, what others told them, not on their own work experience in the industry. There is no evidence that either Smith, Wareham, or Shouse has the necessary work experience as a traveler to give competent testimony about any longstanding practice in the industry.[42] Barnes has worked as a traveler only within the State of California and no evidence was presented as to whether he worked as a traveler on more than a de minimis number of occasions. Bertrand worked for only one employer, Respondent Employer, and testified in effect that for the past 10 years he has had no knowledge about how Respondent Employer has been selecting its pipefitters for layoff or for unscheduled overtime. Slawson's testimony was based primarily on hearsay, the statements of officials from other United Association local affiliates and members of Respondent Union who worked as travelers. I have taken into account that Slawson testified that his testimony about the industry practice was based in part on his "experience on job sites." However, this portion of his testimony lacks specificity; no effort was made to put some flesh and blood on this conclusionary and ambiguous statement. Regarding Cangi's testimony, although he has substantial experience working as a traveler in the pipefitting industry and has worked in that capacity in several different States, I am not persuaded that the testimony of one traveler about his experiences as a traveler in the industry is by itself sufficient to meet the burden of proof required of Respondent Employer to establish the existence of a longstanding industry practice. And since there has been no showing that the other witnesses who testified about the alleged practice were competent to testify about this subject, their testimony, when coupled with Cangi's, is insufficient to warrant a finding that Respondent Employer has proven the existence of a longstanding practice in the pipefitting industry of the United States whereby employers grant preferential treatment to local members of the United Association over travelers in the assignment of unscheduled overtime work and layoff selection.

Even assuming that I have erred, and the record does not establish a practice in the pipefitting industry of the United States whereby employers discriminate against travelers in favor of local members with respect to overtime work assignments and layoff selection, the record lacks sufficient evidence to establish either the reason for the practice or under what circumstances the practice is invoked by employers, or whether it is invoked without limitation. Traveler Cangi testified that, in his opinion, the practice applied only where there was a shortage of work for pipefitters in the geographical jurisdiction of the local union where the job was being performed. But none of the other witnesses, whose testimony is set forth above, placed such a limitation on the practice, but simply testified that the practice was that in making overtime assignments and in selecting workers for layoff local members were given preferential treatment over travelers. They gave no explanation for the reason for the alleged practice nor did any other witness specifically testify about what motivated the employers in the industry to institute the alleged practice of discriminating against travelers in favor of local union members. Thus, even if the alleged longstanding industry practice exists, there is a lack of evidence to warrant a conclusion that it is based on a legitimate business consideration rather than simply on considerations of union membership.

Also, assuming that Respondents have proven that there is a longstanding practice in the pipefitting industry of the United States whereby members of the United Association local unions are granted preferential treatment over travelers, with respect to the assignment of unscheduled overtime work and the selection of workers for layoff, I reject Respondents' further contention that this practice created enforceable contractual rights for Respondent Union's members who were employed on the Shell Oil project. As I have indicated supra, the term and conditions of employment of the pipefitters employed on the project were governed by the National Construction Agreement and to the extent that its terms were not inconsistent with the terms of the Local Agreement by that agreement. Both agreements are silent about the assignment of unscheduled overtime and the selection of workers for layoff. I recognize that in this situation, in certain cases, a longstanding practice in an industry whereby local union members are favored over travelers in certain aspects of the employment relationship would create enforceable contractual rights for the local members. However, this is not such a case because the governing collective-bargaining agreement specifically states that the parties have agreed that practices will not create contractual rights. Thus, subsection "E" of article VIII of the National Construction Agreement states, "[P]ractices not a part of terms and conditions of collective bargaining agreements will not be recognized."

The courts have long recognized that collective-bargaining agreements are not ordinary contracts and should not be construed strictly in accordance with ordinary contract law principles. Transportation Union v. Union Pacific Railroad Co., 385 U.S. 157, 160–161 (1966). The courts have also recognized, however, that a collective-bargaining agreement should be construed in accordance with a number of well-defined common sense principles, one of which is that, when an agreement contains provisions which are clear on their face, the provisions should be construed in accordance with "their plain and literal meaning." NLRB v. South Central Bell Telephone Co., 688 F.2d 345, 353 (5th Cir. 1982). Accord: Kaufman & Broad Home Systems v. Firemen, 607 F.2d 1104, 1109 (5th Cir. 1979). Here the governing collective-bargaining agreement unambiguously provides that practices which are not a part of the terms and conditions of the written agreement will not be recognized. I, therefore, am of the opinion that, even if there is a longstanding industrywide practice in the United States favoring local members over travelers in the assignment of unscheduled overtime work and in the selection for layoff, in view of subsection "E" of article VIII of the governing collective-bargaining agreement, the practice did not create any contractual rights for Respondent Union's members employed on the project. In so concluding, I have overruled the General Counsel's objection and have carefully considered the testimony given by Respondent Employer's expert witness, Arbitrator Melvin Lennard. Neither Arbitrator Lennard nor Respondents have advanced any reason why I should ignore subsection "E" of article VIII in determinining whether the disputed past practice has created enforceable contractual rights. See McGraw-Edison Power Systems Division, 53 Lab. Arb. 1024 (BNA LA) (1969) (Lewis, Arb.) (Under a contract stating that "unless specifically so provided in this contract to the contary, past practice shall not be binding on either party," the employer has the right to promulgate a rule banning the use of transistor radios in the plant, even though employees have been allowed to use such radios at work for 20 years).

[42] Smith and Wareham did not testify about their work experience as travelers and the record does not otherwise reveal that they were competent to testify about a longstanding industry practice. Shouse testified that he had worked as a traveler in Anchorage, Alaska, and San Diego and San Luis Obispo, California.

2. Discussion and conclusionary findings[43]

a. Respondent Employer's discrimination against the travelers in favor of Respondent Union's members

Section 8(a)(3) of the Act makes it an unfair labor practice for an employer "by discrimination in regard to . . . tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment to encourage . . . membership in any labor organization." It is settled that "the policy of the Act is to insulate employees' jobs from their organizational rights"—that is, to ensure that employees may "join unions, be good, bad, or indifferent members, or abstain from joining any union without impairing their livelihood." Radio Officers v. NLRB, 347 U.S. 17, 40 (1954). Accordingly, Section 8(a)(3) and (1) prohibits an employer from laying off employees or otherwise adversely affecting their terms or conditions of employment because of their union status.

In those cases, such as this, where the Board's General Counsel issues a complaint alleging that an employer is discriminating against employees because of their union membership, the General Counsel has the burden of proving by a preponderance of the evidence that the employees' protected conduct was a motivating factor in the employer's action which adversely affected the employees' terms and conditions or tenure of employment. If the General Counsel meets this burden, the employer can avoid being held guilty of violating Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by proving by a preponderance of the evidence that there was a legitimate business justification for its adverse action and that the employees would have been the subject of the adverse action irrespective of their protected conduct. See NLRB v. Transportation Management Corp., 462 U.S. 393 (1983), where the Supreme Court approved the Board's Wright Line test. (Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980).)

The complaint alleges that Respondent Employer violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by assigning overtime work to members of Respondent Union in preference to nonmember travelers, thereby causing 157 named travelers to receive less overtime work during the period from March 1 through May 30, 1982; and by selecting for layoff 130 named travelers from April 7 through May 19, 1982, because they were not members of Respondent Union. I am of the opinion that the General Counsel has made a prima facie showing of a violation by providing by a preponderance of the evidence that a motivating factor in Respondent Employer's decision to lay off each of the alleged discriminatees was their nonmembership in Respondent Union and in order to give preference to members of Respondent Union and I am also of the opinion that the General Counsel has likewise proven by a preponderance of the evidence that the identical motivating factor caused Respondent Employer to discriminate against the travelers employed between March 1 and May 30, 1982, in the assignment of overtime. My reasons for arriving at this conclusion are as follows.

(1) In selecting workers for overtime work and layoff from among the work force of travelers and members of Respondent Union, the grossly disproportionate number of travelers selected for layoff and the grossly disproportionate number of Respondent Union's members assigned overtime work are persuasive evidence of discriminatory motivation. NLRB v. Townsend & Bottum, 722 F.2d 297 (6th Cir. 1983); Daugherty Co., 147 NLRB 1295, 1299 (1964). As the court in NLRB v. Chicago Steel Foundry, 142 F.2d 306, 308 (7th Cir. 1944), stated:

> To be sure, percentage evidence, standing alone, will not support or sustain an order based on Section 8(a)(3) of the Act. . . . But the disproportionate treatment of union and nonunion workers may be very persuasive evidence of discrimination . . . and may create an inference of discrimination leaving it to an employer to give an adequate explanation of the discharge or layoff.

Also see Teamsters v. United States, 431 U.S. 324, 339–340 (1977). During the months of March through May 1982 of the approximately 3678 hours of overtime worked by the pipefitters employed on the project, 3566 hours or approximately 97 percent was worked by members of Respondent Union and only 112 hours or approximately 3 percent was worked by travelers. When the total number of travelers and Respondent Union members employed on the project during this period is compared with these percentages, it is plain, even when it is taken into account that the aforesaid figures include the pipefitters who were employed as foremen, that the travelers were assigned only a de minimis amount of the overtime work and that members of Respondent Union were assigned an amount of overtime which was so disproportionate to their numbers that common sense and the laws of mathematical probability indicate that the de minimis amount of overtime assigned to the travelers and the disproportionate amount assigned to Respondent Union members was not the product of chance but of a conscious intent to discriminate. Likewise, an examination of the figures pertinent to the layoffs reveals a similar intent to discriminate against the travelers in favor of Respondent Union's members. Thus, on April 5, 1982, the total number of pipefitters employed on the project, including foremen, totaled 378, of whom 140 or 37 percent were travelers and 238 or 63 percent were members of Respondent Union. During the period from the week ending April 9 through the week ending May 21, 1982, a total of 180 pipefitters were laid off, of whom 132 or 73 percent were travelers and 48 or 27 percent were members of Respondent Union. By May 24, 1982, at the completion of this series of layoffs only one of the pipefitters remaining on the project was a traveler. This was Paul Foster who Respondent Employer, as I have found supra, did not lay off because it mistakenly thought that he was a member of Respondent Union. And during the latter part of May 1982, in anticipation of the shutdown phase of the project and during the shutdown phase itself, Respondent Employer hired approximately 200 pipefitters to work on the project. None of them were travelers; all were members of Respondent Union. The aforesaid statistics demonstrate that the gradual layoffs of the travelers over a period of 6 weeks until they were eliminated from the project was not the product of chance but a conscious determination on the part of Respondent Employer to discriminate against the travelers in favor of Respondent Union members when selecting workers for layoff or, in other words, in selecting those who would work the shutdown phase of the project with the accompanying substantial scheduled overtime.

[43] The original unfair labor practice charges which were filed June 10, 1982, pertain solely to Respondents' alleged discriminatory treatment of 13 named employees. The additional 140-plus alleged discriminatees named in the complaint were added to the charges, by virtue of an amendment, only after the expiration of the limitations period embodied in Sec. 10(b) of the Act. In view of this Respondents contend that Sec. 10(b) of the Act bars litigation with respect to all but the 13 alleged discriminatees named in the original charges. I disagree. Even absent the amended charges Sec. 10(b) did not preclude the Board's General Counsel from expanding the class of alleged discriminatees named in the complaint from the 13 named in the original charges to the over 140 named in the complaint. This is so because the additional allegations are inextricably intertwined with the original allegations and constitute the same class of violations as those set out in the initial charges. NLRB v. Jack La Lanne Management Corp., 529 F.2d 292 (2d Cir. 1976). See also Eastern Maine Medical Center v. NLRB, 658 F.2d 1, 6 (1st Cir. 1981). (The Board is not prohibited "from adding to its complaint related matters not alleged in the charge which it uncovers during the course of investigation.")

(2) The statements of Respondent Employer's foremen, the persons who selected the pipefitters for overtime work and layoff, that the travelers could not be assigned overtime work and would be laid off from work prior to the shutdown phase of the project because they were not members of Respondent Union constitute "an outright confession of unlawful discrimination." NLRB v. Ferguson, 257 F.2d 88, 90 (5th Cir. 1958). As described in detail supra, when travelers inquired why they were not receiving overtime they were told by Foremen Shouse, Springer, Moore, Poletti, and Breiter and General Foreman Cratsenburg that the reason that they were not being assigned overtime work was because the travelers on the project were not being assigned overtime work. And as described in detail supra, Foremen Barnes, Shouse, Springer, and Thuotte and General Foremen Stuart and Cratsenburg explained to the travelers that the reason they were being laid off was that all of the travelers were being terminated prior to the start of the shutdown phase of the project. Indeed, General Foreman Stuart, as described supra, on several occasions advised traveler Cangi that Cangi would be eligible to work the shutdown phase of the project if he became a member of Respondent Union and suggested that Cangi transfer his membership into Respondent Union if he wanted to work the shutdown. I realize that, in making the above-described explanations of why the travelers were not working overtime and were being laid off, the foremen used the word "traveler" rather than the phrase "nonmember of Respondent Union" and that the term was used by the foremen in this sense. Thus, for example, Respondent Employer's construction superintendent Bertrand defined a "traveler" as "a journeyman . . . that does not belong to the local that we are hiring out of" and Foreman Barnes defined "traveler" as "somebody that belongs to a local other than Local 250."

(3) The statements of the foremen, that the reason travelers were not working overtime and were being laid off because of their status as travelers was due to pressure from Respondent Union and the policy of that Union, are further evidence of Respondent Employer's illegal motivation. Thus, as described in detail supra, Foreman Wayne Springer told his crew which was made up of virtually all travelers that the instruction that the travelers would not work the unscheduled overtime had come from Respondent Union. Foreman Al Thuotte, as described in detail supra, informed the travelers on his crew that the reason the travelers were not being assigned any overtime work was that "it was the policy of Local 250." And, as described in detail supra, Foreman Bill Springer told traveler Gerald Mayes that Springer had been unable to remove Mayes' name from the layoff list as Springer had done once before because "word had come down from Local 250 that all travelers will go." Since the foremen were the ones who made the selections for overtime work and layoffs, I am of the opinion that it is reasonable to infer that the aforesaid foremen were authoritatively reporting information received from management and that it was on this information that they acted.

(4) Although the practice and procedure which was supposed to have been followed on the project with respect to the selection of workers for overtime work and layoff was that the crew foremen would make the selections, the record reveals that this procedure was not followed. The evidence of the deviation from the usual practice, which has already been set forth in detail supra, can be briefly stated as follows. After Foreman Wayne Shouse during the week had indicated to the travelers on his crew that they could expect to work overtime that weekend, the next day he was forced to retract this assignment with the explanation that the travelers on the project would not be assigned overtime. Foreman Wayne Springer told the members on his crew that he could not assign them overtime work and indicated that he did not think that this was fair and if left to his own devices he would have assigned them overtime. After Foreman Jack Moore informed his crew, which included several travelers, that they could expect to work some overtime, the next day he was forced to retract his statement and explain to the crew that the travelers would not be allowed to work overtime. Foreman Joe Poletti apologized to the travelers on his crew for not assigning them any overtime work and explained that he had been given orders from higher up not to assign travelers overtime work. When Foreman Joe Fahey advised traveler James of his layoff he explained to James that he was not responsible for James' selection as he had been selected for layoff by General Foreman Stuart. Thereafter, General Foreman Stuart explained to James that in selecting people for layoff he had been told "by his superiors to get rid of the travelers." When travelers Mathieson, Bics, and Smith were laid off, General Foreman Cratsenburg, who had previously indicated that he wanted them to work the shutdown because of their good work, apologized to them for their layoff, and explained that the instructions to lay them off had been issued by someone above Cratsenburg in the managerial hierarchy who instructed Cratsenburg that no travelers would be working during the shutdown. And Foreman Wayne Springer, after indicating that traveler Colby could expect to work the shutdown by asking him which shift he wanted to work during the shutdown, thereafter told him he was being laid off because all of the travelers were going to be terminated prior to the shutdown. The aforesaid unexplained deviations by Respondent Employer from its usual policy of having the crew foremen select the persons for layoff and overtime work is further evidence of Respondent Employer's illegal motivation in selecting the travelers for layoff and denying them an opportunity to work overtime.[44]

(5) The testimony of Respondent Employer's foremen that the Respondent Employer selected workers for overtime and for layoff on the basis of their membership or nonmembership in Respondent Union and gave preferential treatment to the members of Respondent Union over the nonmember travelers constitutes a confession of unlawful discrimination and is evidence of discriminatory motivation. NLRB v. Ferguson, 257 F.2d 88, 90 (5th Cir. 1958). Head General Foreman Goldie testified that in selecting workers for layoff the foremen took into consideration the fact that the worker was a nonmember traveler and gave preference to members of Respondent Union over the travelers and that in selecting workers for overtime work the worker's status as a traveler or a member of Respondent Union was taken into account and the workers chosen to work overtime were members of Respondent Union, not the nonmember travelers. (Tr. 863, 870–871.) General Foreman Cratsenburg testified that the several foremen under his supervision gave preference to members of Respondent Union over nonmember travelers in selecting workers for layoff and that if the foremen had not given such preferential treatment to members of Respondent Union Cratsenburg would have stepped in and spoken to them about the matter. (Tr. 1004, 1026–27.) Cratsenburg also testified that the foremen gave the members of Respondent Union preferential treatment over the nonmember travelers in the assignment of overtime work and that the travelers were assigned overtime work only "in an emergency" and that otherwise only members of Respondent Union were assigned the overtime work (Tr. 997–998, 1043). Foreman Al Thuotte testified that even if the travelers on his crew had been doing an excellent job he would have had to lay them off ahead of the members of Respondent Union because the practice was to give preference to members of Respondent Union over nonmember travelers and that Thuotte in fact selected a traveler for layoff even though said traveler was as qualified as any members of the Respondent Union on his crew that were not picked for layoff. General Foreman Stuart testified that the nonmember travelers were laid off before members of Respondent Union because the custom is that travelers are laid off first. He admitted that on his crew there were some travelers whose work he thought was virtually as good as the work of the members of Respondent Union, but they were laid off nevertheless because, as Stuart testified, if Stuart allowed an exception for even one traveler he would have had to make an exception for all of them and as a result the best that he could do was to keep the more competent travelers employed until the last possible moment before the shutdown phase of the project. Foreman Barnes testified that, in deciding who to lay off on his crew, "I would not lay off any 250 hands. I would lay off travel cards before I would lay off 250 people." (Tr. 884.) He also testified that travelers would be selected for layoff even though they were more competent than members of Respondent Union and that in fact there were travelers on his crew who were competent pipefitters whose work he had no problems with but who were laid off because they were travelers. (Tr. 889–890.)

(6) The disparate treatment of traveler Foster as compared to the other travelers further demonstrates Respondent Employer's discriminatory motivation. Thus, while all of the other travelers were laid off prior to the shutdown, traveler Foster was retained and employed to work the shutdown because Respondent Employer mistakenly thought that he was a member of the Respondent Union. It is established that "the essence of discrimination in a Section 8(a)(3) violation consists of treating light cases differently." Marathon Le Tourneau Co. v. NLRB, 699 F.2d 248, 253 (5th Cir. 1983), quoting General Motors Corp. v. NLRB, 596 F.2d 1295, 1305 (5th Cir. 1979); Babcock & Wilcox Co., 683 F.2d 858, 859–860 (4th Cir. 1982).

The aforesaid considerations, 1 through 6, viewed in their totality, have persuaded me that the General Counsel has proven by a preponderance of the evidence that Respondent Employer engaged in the discrimination alleged in the complaint for a discriminatory motive, namely, that the General Counsel has proven by a preponderance of the evidence that a motivating factor in Respondent Employer's selection of the 130 named travelers for layoff on the dates of their respective layoffs was their nonmembership in Respondent Union and in order to give preference to Respondent Union's members and that the refusal of Respondent Employer to assign overtime work to those travelers employed during the period from March 1 through May 31, 1982, was motivated by identical considerations.

In reaching this conclusion I have considered Respondent Employer's argument that even if it gave preferred treatment to the members of Respondent Union because of their membership such conduct could not have encouraged the travelers to become members of Respondent Union within the prohibition of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act, and that in any event Section 8(f)(4) of the Act sanctioned Respondent Employer's preferential treatment of Respondent Union's members. My reasons for rejecting these contentions are as follows.

Respondent Employer's contention that its discrimination against the travelers in favor of Respondent Union members could not have encouraged the travelers to become members of Respondent Union is apparently based on the premise that the United Association, not its separate local affiliates, is the relevant labor organization for 8(a)(3) purposes because each member of a local union affiliated with the United Association is a member of the United Association and that, by joining the United Association, the member acquiesces in the United Association's rules restricting the transfer of membership between constituent local unions. However, contrary to Respondent Employer's position, the United Association for purposes of the National Labor Relations Act is a separate and distinct labor organization from its local affiliates. For the law is settled that a local union is a separate and distinct entity from the International union with which it is affiliated. Carbon Fuel Co. v. Mine Workers, 444 U.S. 212, 217 (1979); Mine Workers (Blue Diamond Coal), 143 NLRB 795 (1963). And in Radio Officers v. NLRB, 347 U.S. 17 (1954), it was understood that Loner, the charging party in the Gaynor case, could not complain about the union membership rules that denied him the right to join the union at that time. Id. at 51. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court ruled, first, that the employer by granting certain benefits only to the union members in its work force had unlawfully encouraged Loner's interest in becoming a union member, and, second, that it made no difference that the union's rules made that objective for the moment unattainable. As the Court stated, "[T]he Act [does not] require that [a] change in the employees 'quantum of desire' to join a union have immediate manifestations." Id. at 51. Thus, in the instant case, what is alone relevant is the fact that Respondent Employer has been found to have preferred Respondent Union's members over the travelers because of their membership in Respondent Union. It makes no difference what conditions the travelers might have to satisfy to qualify for membership in Respondent Union or that Respondent Union during the time material was not accepting very many if any new members.[45] It is enough that the Company's discrimination had the foreseeable consequence of increasing their desire to obtain it.

Respondent Employer's contention that Section 8(f)(4) of the Act[46] sanctions its preferential treatment of Respondent Union's members over the travelers employed on the Shell Oil project is based on the further contention that the record establishes that there is a longstanding practice in the pipefitting industry of the United States whereby members of local unions affiliated with the United Association are accorded preferential treatment over nonmember travelers in the assignment of overtime and in the selection of workers for layoffs on those projects within the geographical jurisdiction of the local unions. As I have found supra, the record fails to establish such a practice and, even if such a practice has been proven, there is insufficient evidence that the practice was a part and parcel of the National Construction Agreement, the governing collective-bargaining agreement herein, or otherwise created enforceable collective-bargaining rights for the members of Respondent Union employed on the project. Moreover, Respondent Employer's 8(f)(4) defense rests on the further unproven contention that the aforesaid alleged discriminatory past industry practice was not based on considerations of union membership, but was really based on the preference of the employers in the industry for a pool of readily available skilled local craftsmen. As I have found supra, there is insufficient evidence to support this contention or the contention that the alleged industry practice of discriminating against nonmember travelers in favor of members of local unions for purposes of overtime work and layoff selection was based on any of the other objective criteria sanctioned by Section 8(f)(4) of the Act, rather than simply on considerations of union membership. Absent a showing that a practice of discrimination which on its face was based on considerations of union membership was in reality based on one of the objective criterion sanctioned by Section 8(f)(4), an agreement between Respondents embodying such a practice of discrimination would be illegal. Iron Workers Local 444 (Newberg Construction), 174 NLRB 1108 (1969). Likewise such an agreement would not be sanctioned by those cases which recognize that a labor organization may waive the statutorily protected rights of bargaining unit employees. For, although a union may bargain away the economic rights of employees it represents, "it may not surrender rights that impair the employees' choice of their bargaining representative." NLRB v. Magnavox Co., 415 U.S. 322, 325 (1974). Plainly an agreement which discriminates between workers on a [45] In the instant case during the 18-month tenure of Business Manager Slawson (February 1982–August 1983) over 100 travelers had expressed an interest to Slawson about transferring their membership into Respondent Union, but only a few bothered to file membership applications and only 2 were accepted into membership by Respondent Union. The record reveals that one of the two travelers accepted into membership was employed on the Shell Oil project and that his membership was transferred during the construction phase of the project. The reason so few filed applications and so few were accepted into membership was that due to the lack of work within Respondent Union's jurisdiction Respondent Union was not accepting new members during this period.

It shall not be an unfair labor practice . . . for an employer engaged primarily in the building and construction industry to make an agreement covering employees engaged . . . in the building and construction industry with a labor organization of which building and construction employees are members . . . because . . . such agreement specifies minimum training or experience qualifications for employment . . . based upon length of service with such employer, in the industry or in the particular geographical area.

basis of their union membership imposes "constraints on the employees' ability to choose which union will represent them." Metropolitan Edison Co. v. NLRB, 460 U.S. 693 (1983). In any event, since a waiver of employees' protected rights must be expressed in clear and unmistakable terms; the past practice alleged to exist in this case, which is admittedly not even expressly or by implication included in the governing collective-bargaining agreement, is insufficient to establish a waiver of the rights of the nonmember travelers represented by the Union. See Metropolitan Edison Co. v. NLRB, supra. It is for all of the foregoing reasons that I reject Respondent Employer's 8(f)(4) defense.

Having found that the General Counsel has established by a preponderance of the evidence that Respondent Employer's conduct in issue in this case was discriminatorily motivated, namely, that Respondent Employer laid off the travelers and did not assign them overtime work because of their nonmembership in Respondent Union and in order to give preference to the members of Respondent Union, Respondent Employer can avoid being held guilty of violating Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by proving by a preponderance of the evidence that the travelers would have been the subject to the same adverse action for legitimate business reasons irrespective of their nonmembership in Respondent Union. NLRB v. Transportation Management Corp., 462 U.S. 393 (1983); Townsend & Bottum, Inc., 259 NLRB 207 (1981), enfd. 722 F.2d 297 (6th Cir. 1983). In this respect Respondent Employer urges that the members of Respondent Union employed on the project were more experienced and competent pipefitters, as a group, than the travelers and that it was for this reason that the travelers were discriminated against, not because of their nonmembership in Respondent Union.[47] I have carefully considered this contention and for the reasons set forth hereinafter have reached the following conclusions: Respondent Employer has failed to demonstrate by a preponderance of the evidence that 75 of the laid-off travelers, who were pipefitters by trade,[48] would have been selected by their foremen for layoff for legitimate business reasons irrespective of their nonmembership in Respondent Union; nor has Respondent Employer established by a preponderance of the evidence that 12 of the laid-off travelers, who were plumbers by trade but who were either experienced pipefitters or whose work supervision regarded as competent,[49] would have been selected by their foremen for layoff for legitimate business reasons irrespective of their nonmembership in Respondent Union; but with respect to the remaining 42 laid-off travelers alleged as discriminatees,[50] who were plumbers by trade and for whom there is no evidence that supervision was satisfied with their work as pipefitters, I am persuaded that Respondent Employer has proven by a preponderance of the evidence that they would have been selected for layoff on the dates they were laid off irrespective of their nonmembership in Respondent Union, because they were not qualified pipefitters. And regarding the discriminatory denial of overtime work to the travelers, Respondent Employer has failed to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the travelers in its employ during March through May 1982 would have been denied overtime during this period for legitimate business reasons irrespective of their nonmembership in Respondent Union.

Regarding the 75 travelers who, like the members of Respondent Union, were pipefitters by trade, there is insufficient evidence, as I have found supra, that as a group they were any less competent or experienced as pipefitters than the members of Respondent Union. Nor does the record contain sufficient evidence to warrant a finding that the crew foremen who observed their work and who selected them for layoff believed that their work was any less competent than the work of the members of Respondent Union who were retained to work the shutdown. As a matter of fact the foremen who were responsible for the selection of this group of travelers for layoff were not called by Respondent Employer to explain the motivation for their conduct.[51]

[47] Respondent Employer does not contend that it discriminated in favor of the members of Respondent Union because they were local residents, rather than members of Respondent Union. See Bricklayers (Plaza Builders), 134 NLRB 751 (1961); Operating Engineers Local 542 (Ralph Marino), 151 NLRB 497 (1965); Everett Construction Co., 186 NLRB 240 (1970); Electrical Workers IBEW Local 8 (Romanoff Electrical), 221 NLRB 1131 (1975). Respondent Employer's failure to make such a contention is understandable because the record establishes that membership in Respondent Union is not keyed to a circumscribed geographical area. Respondent Union's members are not required to reside within Respondent Union's geographical jurisdiction; some may reside as far away from the local area as the eastern coast of the United States. No evidence was presented about the percentage of the members of Respondent Union who were employed on the Shell Oil project during the time material who resided within the local area. Respondents, in particular Respondent Union, presumably had this information at their disposal, but for some unexplained reason failed to produce it and I will not presume that a substantial majority or even that a majority of the members of Respondent Union employed on the project resided within the geographical jurisdiction of Respondent Union. Such a presumption would be sheer speculation. Indeed, Respondents' unexplained failure to offer evidence on this point warrants an inference that a significant number of Respondent Union's members employed on the project were not local residents. For it is settled that "the omission by a party to produce relevant and important evidence of which he has knowledge, and which is peculiarly within his control, raises the presumption that if produced the evidence would be unfavorable to his cause." Auto Workers v. NLRB, 459 F.2d 1329, 1336 (D.C. Cir 1972), quoting Tendler v. Jaffe, 203 F.2d 14, 19 (1953). Accord: Interstate Circuit v. U.S., 306 U.S. 208, 225–226 (1939).

[48] As indicated supra, the names of the 75 travelers and their dates of layoff are set forth in Appendix A of the decision.

[49] As indicated supra, the names of these 12 travelers and their dates of layoff are set forth in Appendix B of the decision.

[50] The complaint alleges that 130 travelers were illegally laid off during the time material herein. As indicated herein I have accounted for only 129 of these travelers. The reason for this discrepancy is that the complaint inadvertently named S. C. Reamer, who was a member of Respondent Union, as having been laid off illegally.

[51] Foremen Barnes and Thuotte, the only foremen who were asked during this proceeding how they decided on whom to select for layoff from among their crews, did not testify that their selections were motivated by a worker's competency. They testified in effect that their choice was based on considerations of union membership. Barnes testified, "I would not lay off any 250 hands. I would lay off traveler cards before I would lay off 250 people." He further testified that there were travelers on his crew who were competent pipefitters who were selected by him for layoff because they were travelers. (Tr. 884, 889–890.) Thuotte testified that when it got down to which pipefitters to select for layoff he Respondent Employer presented no testimony from the foremen, who would be in the best position to know Respondent Employer's motivation for selecting these travelers for layoff, to support its contention that the foremen selected these 75 travelers for layoff for legitimate business reasons rather than because they were not members of Respondent Union.[52] It is for all of these reasons that I am of the view that Respondent Employer has failed to establish by a preponderance of the evidence that these 75 travelers would have been selected for layoff by their foremen irrespective of their nonmembership in Respondent Union because of their incompetency or lack of experience as pipefitters. Accordingly Respondent Employer has failed to rebut the General Counsel's showing of discriminatory motivation as to the selection of these 75 travelers for layoff. I therefore find that, as alleged in the complaint, by laying off the 75 travelers named in Appendix A on the dates opposite their names therein, Respondent Employer violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

As to the 12 travelers who, as I have found supra, although plumbers by trade, were competent and experienced pipefitters or regarded as such by supervision, there is no evidence that in selecting them for layoff their foremen were motivated by either the fact that they were not pipefitters by trade or that their foremen believed that they were not competent pipefitters. Other than in the cases of George Bics, Paul Mathieson, and Gilbert Smith, discussed infra, the foremen of these 12 travelers were not called as witnesses to explain why they selected any one of them for layoff. In short, Respondent Employer produced no evidence that these 12 travelers would have been selected for layoff by their foremen irrespective of their nonmembership in Respondent Union because they were not competent or experienced pipefitters. It is for these reasons that I am of the view that Respondent Employer has failed to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that these 12 travelers would have been selected for layoff by their foremen on the dates they were laid off irrespective of their nonmembership in Respondent Union. Accordingly, Respondent Employer has failed to rebut the General Counsel's showing of discriminatory motivation as to the selection of these 12 travelers for layoff. I therefore find that, as alleged in the complaint, by laying off the 12 travelers named in Appendix B on the respective dates therein, Respondent Employer violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

As to the remaining 42 travelers laid off during the time material, the record reveals they are all plumbers by trade who, as I have found supra, were presumably less qualified to perform the pipefitting work required of them than those pipefitters employed on the project who were pipefitters by trade. There is no evidence that any of the 42 was an experienced pipefitter or that supervision regarded any of them as just as competent as those pipefitters employed on the project who were pipefitters by trade. There is evidence that these traveler plumbers, who were referred to the project in derogation of Respondent Union's contractual obligation to refer only qualified pipefitters, due to their inexperience as pipefitters required closer supervision than the pipefitters who were pipefitters by trade. These circumstances persuade me that Respondent Employer has proven by a preponderance of the evidence that these 42 travelers would have been selected for layoff by their foremen on the dates they were laid off irrespective of their nonmembership in Respondent Union because they were not qualified pipefitters.[53] Accordingly, Respondent Employer has rebutted the General Counsel's showing of illegal motivation with respect to this group of layoffs. I therefore shall recommend that the complaint be dismissed insofar as it alleges that Respondent Employer violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by laying off the 42 travelers named in Appendix C.

As to Respondent Employer's refusal to assign unscheduled overtime work to the travelers, Respondent Employer presented no evidence that this conduct was motivated by the fact that the travelers who were not assigned overtime, which they ordinarily would have gotten, were either less competent or less experienced than the members of Respondent Union selected by the foremen. In this regard not one of the foremen who selected the workers to do the overtime work involved was called by Respondent Employer to explain why the foremen in the assignment of the overtime work discriminated in favor of the members of Respondent Union over the travelers. Rather, Respondent Employer's foremen admitted that this discrimination was based on a practice of discriminating in favor of local union members over travelers. Not a single foreman testified that this discrimination was based on considerations of competency and work experience, rather than membership considerations.[54] Unlike the circumstantial evidence surrounding the layoff of the above-described 42 traveler plumbers, the circumstantial evidence surrounding the disparate treatment accorded the travelers for purpose of overtime work does not establish by a preponderance of followed the practice of laying off the nonmember travelers before the members of Respondent Union. (Tr. 1091.) I also note that General Foremen Stuart and Cratsenburg failed to justify the foremen's selection of travelers for layoff in terms of any legitimate business considerations. Rather, Stuart testified that the reason travelers were selected for layoff before members of Respondent Union was because "it's always been the custom that the travelers go first." Cratsenburg testified that the reason members of Respondent Union were given preferential treatment over travelers for layoff selection was because the "practice is that the travelers go first."

[52] See, e.g., Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co. v. NLRB, 456 F.2d 465 (5th Cir. 1972), where in a comparable situation the court noted that "the prime mover in Dobbs' discharge was [Foreman] Porter. Any examination of [the Employer's] motive for discharge, therefore, must necessarily concentrate on Porter's reasons for firing Dobbs." Id. at 468.

[53] In so concluding I have taken into account the failure of the foremen of these travelers to testify about what motivated the foremen to select the travelers for layoff. Nonetheless I am persuaded that the above-described circumstantial evidence warrants the inference that these travelers would have been selected by their foremen for layoff during the normal course of business irrespective of their nonmembership in Respondent Union.

[54] The vague testimony of Construction Superintendent Bertrand and Head General Foreman Goldie that some of the overtime was worked on Saturdays for safety reasons and to minimize the risk of injuring people on the project is no substitute for what is lacking in the record, namely, the testimony of the foremen who selected the workers for overtime as to their motivation for making their selections.

the evidence that the foremen would have refused to assign overtime to the travelers employed on the job irrespective of their nonmembership in Respondent Union because they were not qualified pipefitters. Accordingly, I am of the view that Respondent Employer has failed to rebut the General Counsel's showing that during the months of March through May 1982 in refusing to assign travelers overtime work and in giving preferential treatment to Respondent Union's members over the travelers in the assignment of overtime work, Respondent Employer was discriminatorily motivated. I therefore find that as alleged in the complaint Respondent Employer during the months of March through May 1982 violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by assigning overtime work to members of Respondent Union in preference to the travelers, thereby causing travelers who were employed during this period to receive less overtime work than they would have normally received.

As I have mentioned supra, there is evidence when viewed in isolation which indicates that travelers George Bics, Paul Mathieson, and Gil Smith, who were laid off on May 14, 1982, would have been laid off on that date irrespective of their nonmembership in Respondent Union because their crew, the rigging crew, was discontinued. Thus, Rigging Foreman Wayne Shouse testified that in April and May 1982 the rigging crew which he supervised was down to only three pipefitters—Bics, Mathieson, and Smith—and that about May 14, 1982, Shouse's general foreman T. J. Cratsenburg told Shouse that "all the rigging is done in [Cratsenburg's] area, we have to lay off the rigging crew," and that because of this Shouse laid off Bics, Mathieson, and Smith. Shouse, a member of Respondent Union, was not laid off, but remained on the job as a rank-and-file pipefitter and remained on the job in this capacity throughout the shutdown phase of the project. Shouse also testified that during the shutdown there was no rigging crew employed as such, but that each crew did its own rigging work with perhaps some members of a crew doing more of the rigging than others.

Shouse's aforesaid testimony when viewed by itself warrants the conclusion that travelers Bics, Mathieson, and Smith would have been laid off on May 14, 1982, irrespective of their nonmembership in Respondent Union. But there is other evidence in the record which seriously detracts from this conclusion and in my view neutralizes Shouse's testimony and makes it highly questionable as to whether Bics, Mathieson, and Smith if they had not been nonmembers of Respondent Union would have been laid off on May 14, 1982, or like Foreman Shouse, a member of Respondent Union, retained on the job to work the shutdown. Thus, contemporaneous with the layoff, General Foreman Cratsenburg was informing employees that he regarded Bics, Mathieson, and Smith as good workers and because of this wanted them to work the shutdown. In addition, on May 14, 1982, when Cratsenburg apologized to Bics, Mathieson, and Smith for having to lay them off, he did not explain to them that the reason for their layoff was that there was no more work for a rigging crew; rather his explanation was that he had been instructed by his superiors to lay them off because no travelers were going to work the shutdown. Likewise, when Foreman Shouse informed Bics, Mathieson, and Smith of their layoff, he did not explain to them that the reason was that there was no more work for the rigging crew, but like Cratsenburg he told them that they were being laid off because there would be no travelers employed during the shutdown. I also note that all three of these travelers performed work other than rigging work on the project. As a matter of fact, Smith at the time of the layoff had performed more than 3000 hours of pipefitting work within Respondent Union's jurisdiction which was sufficient to make him eligible for book 1 registration at the hiring hall. Also Mathieson had several years of experience working as a pipefitter and Albert Allen, one of the travelers on the job who was a pipefitter by trade, credibly testified that Bics and Mathieson worked with him on the project as fitters and did good work. Thus, when Shouse's testimony is viewed in the context of the aforesaid additional evidence, I am persuaded that, on balance, Respondent Employer has failed to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that on May 14, 1982, Bics, Mathieson, and Smith would have been laid off irrespective of their nonmembership in Respondent Union because of the fact that there was no more work for their rigging crew. Rather, the evidence indicates that there was a strong likelihood that Respondent Employer, but for their nonmembership in Respondent Union, would have continued to employ them on the job like Rigging Foreman Shouse.

In concluding that Respondent Employer with respect to the layoffs of Bics, Mathieson, and Smith, as well as the other instances where I have found, supra, failed to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that travelers would have been laid off or denied overtime for legitimate business reasons irrespective of their nonmembership in Respondent Union, I have been mindful of the statement of the Supreme Court in NLRB v. Transportation Management Corp., 462 U.S 393, 403 (1983), that in cases of this nature in considering a respondent employer's argument that it would have taken the same adverse action irrespective of an employee's protected conduct, the Board should take into account that

> The employer is a wrongdoer; he has acted out of a motive that is declared illegitimate by the statute. It is fair that he bear the risk that the influence of legal and illegal motives cannot be separated, because he knowingly created the risk and because the risk was created not by innocent activity but by his own wrongdoing.

b. Respondent Employer's supervisors' statements about Respondent Employer's discrimination against the travelers

Having found Respondent Employer discriminated against the travelers employed on the project in favor of the members of Respondent Union with respect to the assignment of overtime work and the selection of workers for layoff and that said discrimination was illegally motivated in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act, it follows that the several statements made to the travelers by Respondent Employer's foremen announcing this illegal conduct likewise violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. More specifically, I find that Respondent Employer violated Section 8(a)(1) as follows: As described in detail supra, during April and May 1982 several of the foremen informed travelers that the travelers employed on the project could not be assigned overtime work and would be laid off from work prior to the shutdown phase of the project, because they were travelers, not members of Respondent Union; as described in detail supra, during April or May 1982 General Foreman Stuart told traveler Cangi that if Cangi transferred his membership into Respondent Union Cangi would be able to work the shutdown phase of the project; as described in detail supra, on May 13, 1982, Foreman Bill Springer told traveler Mayes that the reason for his layoff was that Respondent Union had given instructions that all of the travelers were to be laid off; as described in detail supra, during April 1982 Foreman Wayne Springer told traveler Mayes that the reason Mayes and another traveler could not work overtime was due to instructions from Respondent Union; and as described in detail supra, during April or May 1982 Foreman Al Thuotte told traveler William Grady and another traveler that it was the policy of Respondent Union that Respondent Employer could not assign the travelers overtime work. By engaging in the aforesaid conduct I find that Respondent Employer, as alleged in the complaint, violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.[55]

c. The responsibility of Respondent Union for Respondent Employer's discrimination against the travelers

Section 8(b)(2) of the Act declares it to be an unfair labor practice for a labor organization "to cause or attempt to cause an employer to discriminate against an employee in violation of" Section 8(a)(3) of the Act. I have found, supra, that Respondent Employer violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act by not assigning overtime work to travelers and by laying off travelers because they were not members of Respondent Union and in order to give preference to members of Respondent Union. The question presented here is whether the General Counsel has proven by a preponderance of the evidence that Respondent Union caused Respondent Employer to engage in the aforesaid illegal conduct.

The law is settled that "[a] union cannot be found to have caused employer discrimination unless, at the very least, the evidence is sufficient to support a reasonable inference of a union request or a union-employer understanding." Walter J. Barnes Electrical Co., 188 NLRB 183, 186 (1971). I am persuaded that the record herein will not support a finding that the General Counsel has proven by a preponderance of the evidence that Respondent Union engaged in conduct designed to secure the discriminatory treatment of the travelers or that there was an understanding between Respondents which resulted in the discriminatory treatment. The reasons for this conclusion are as follows.

There is no direct evidence that representatives of Respondent Union caused representatives of Respondent Employer to discriminate against the travelers in favor of the members of Respondent Union. As a matter of fact all of Respondents' representatives who were questioned during the hearing about this matter testified to the effect that Respondent Employer's discriminatory conduct in this case was not caused by any representative of Respondent Union. Likewise, there is insufficient circumstantial evidence to warrant a finding that Respondent Union caused Respondent Employer to discriminate against the travelers in favor of Respondent Union's members. I recognize, as described in detail supra, that one foreman told a traveler that the reason for the traveler's layoff was due to the instruction of Respondent Union that all travelers were to be laid off and, as described in detail supra, that two foremen told travelers that the reason travelers could not work overtime was due to instructions from Respondent Union. However, this evidence cannot be relied on to establish that Respondent Union caused Respondent Employer to discriminate against the travelers. Walter J. Barnes Electrical Co., 188 NLRB 183, 186, 187 (1971); Railway Clerks (Safety Cabs), 180 NLRB 126 (1969); Stage Employees Local 776 (Film Editors), 124 NLRB 842, 843 fn. 2 (1959). And the fact that, as I have found infra, on May 14, 1982, Respondent Union's steward Wareham, in violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act, threatened traveler Gilbert Smith with loss of employment if he attempted to contest Respondent Employer's discrimination against the travelers, while it is evidence that Respondent Union was more than happy to reap the benefits for its members of Respondent Employer's policy of illegal discrimination, is insufficient to prove that Respondent Union caused Respondent Employer to institute the discriminatory policy or was otherwise responsible for the policy. Likewise the fact that Respondent Union's steward Wareham, as found infra, told the employees about Respondent Employer's policy of discrimination against the travelers is not proof that Respondent Union caused Respondent Employer to institute and/or maintain this policy.

Nor has the General Counsel established by a preponderance of the evidence that Respondent Employer's discrimination against the travelers was the result of an understanding between Respondents. There is no evidence, direct or circumstantial, of either a written or verbal understanding between Respondents whereby Respondent Employer agreed to discriminate against the travelers in favor of the members of Respondent Union. I have considered that Respondents in their posthearing briefs have urged that the existence of a longstanding practice in the pipefitting industry of employers preferring local union members over travelers has resulted in the practice becoming a part of the National Construction Agreement, the agreement which governs Respondents' bargaining relationship in this case. This contention, however, does not amount to an admission by Respondents that there was an understanding between Respondents that Respondent Employer would grant preferential treatment to Respondent Union's members over the travelers for layoff and overtime work purposes. Respondents' argument in this respect is not based on the terms of either an oral or written understanding entered into between Respondents, but rather on the testimony of Arbitrator Melvin Lennard, who as an expert witness for Respondent Employer testified that if there was a longstanding practice in the pipefitting industry pursuant to which employers in that industry granted preferential rights to the members of local unions over travelers for purposes of layoffs and overtime, that by virtue of this longstanding practice the members of Respondent Union employed on the Shell Oil project would have, in his opinion, a right under the terms of the National Construction Agreement to be afforded preferential treatment over the travelers for purposes of overtime work and layoff selection. Arbitrator Lennard was very careful, however, to note that the right of the members of Respondent Union to such preferential treatment "was not based necessarily on the understanding of the parties but on the practice that you have described [referring to the alleged longstanding past practice whereby local union members were given preferential treatment over travelers by the employers in the pipefitting industry]." (Tr. 1240.) In short, the understanding relied on by Respondents in their posthearing briefs is not the type of understanding which exists by virtue of an overt or affirmative act engaged in by Respondent Union. Accordingly, it does not amount to evidence of union causation within the meaning of Section 8(b)(2) of the Act.

It is for all of the foregoing reasons that I am of the opinion that the General Counsel has not proven by a preponderance of the evidence that Respondent Employer's illegal discriminatory treatment of the travelers in this case was caused by Respondent Union. I therefore shall recommend the dismissal of these allegations of the complaint.

d. The statements of Respondent Union's steward about Respondent Employer's discrimination against the travelers

As described in detail supra, when the pipefitters were referred to the project from Respondent Union's hiring hall the first thing they did on their arrival was to give their referral slips to Richard Wareham, Respondent Union's steward, Respondent Union's representative on the jobsite. Wareham at this time informed the groups of newly arrived pipefitters about the various company rules and regulations which would govern their work on the project, including the fact that travelers would not be assigned any of the unscheduled overtime work as this work would be done by the members of Respondent Union. Also in April or May 1982, as described in detail supra, when traveler Michael Cangi spoke to Wareham about the fact that Cangi's foreman had assigned him to work Saturday overtime, Wareham explained to Cangi that the reason Cangi had been assigned this overtime was that the foreman mistakenly thought Cangi was a member of Respondent Union. Lastly, on May 14, 1982, as described in detail supra, traveler Gilbert Smith, who had been laid off that day, complained to Wareham that members of Respondent Union were being hired at the same time travelers were being laid off. Wareham replied, "[T]hat's the way it is," and in effect told Smith that only members of Respondent Union, no travelers, would work the shutdown phase of the project. Smith responded by stating that he did not think that this discrimination against the travelers was fair and that he intended to fight it. Wareham, in response, warned Smith that if Smith contested the matter Smith would never work in the area again.

The General Counsel contends that the above-described statements of Wareham that Respondent Union's members rather than travelers would be assigned overtime work violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.[56] I disagree for these reasons. As I have found supra, Respondent Union did not cause nor was it otherwise responsible for the Employer's illegal discrimination against the travelers in the assignment of overtime work. Nor do the circumstances under which Wareham made the aforesaid statements lead to the conclusion that Wareham by his conduct placed himself in a situation reasonably calculated to lead the employees to believe that Respondent Union was a party to Respondent Employer's illegal discrimination. Rather, when new workers arrived on the jobsite Wareham was merely acting as a conduit for Respondent Employer in explaining to the employees the several company work rules which would govern their work on the job. Objectively speaking, the circumstances do not warrant the inference that Wareham's explanation of the various company rules was calculated to lead the employees to reasonably believe that the Union was responsible for these rules, rather than that Wareham in his capacity as union steward was simply performing the ministerial act of relaying to the employees the various company work rules which would govern their work on the project. Under the circumstances I am of the opinion that Wareham's above-described statements concerning Respondent Employer's discrimination against the travelers did not violate Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.

I agree with the General Counsel that Respondent Union violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act by virtue of Wareham's above-described May 14, 1982 threat to traveler Gilbert Smith that Smith would never work in the area again if he attempted to fight Respondent Employer's illegal discrimination of laying off the travelers because of their nonmembership in Respondent Union. The threat that Smith would never work in the area again if he attempted to contest Respondent Employer's illegal conduct was reasonably calculated to coerce or intimi-

[56] Sec. 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act forbids a union "to restrain or coerce . . . employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in Section 7 of the Act."

date Smith from contesting the Company's illegal policy by exercising his rights under Section 7 of the Act to file unfair labor practice charges with the Board or to file a grievance with his collective-bargaining representative, Respondent Union, challenging the Company's illegal practice. I therefore find that Respondent Union violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act on May 14, 1982, when Wareham threatened traveler Gilbert Smith with a loss of employment if he attempted to fight Respondent Employer's illegal policy of laying off travelers because of their nonmembership in Respondent Union.[57]

B. Respondent Union's Refusal to Allow Referral Applicants to Examine the Dispatch Book

1. The evidence[58]

Respondent Union, which operates an exclusive hiring hall, dispatches applicants from its hall from 8 a.m until approximately 12 noon.

On approximately May 18, 1982, Gilbert Smith registered for work at Respondent Union's hiring hall. The next morning at approximately 10 a.m. Smith went to the dispatch window and spoke to the dispatch secretary. He asked where his name was located on the dispatch book and if he could examine the dispatch book to see where his name was located.[59] The dispatch secretary answered, "No," and when Smith asked how far his name was from the top of the list of registrants, the dispatch secretary told him, "[W]e don't have time right now" to furnish that information. The same dispatch secretary previously in September 1981 had refused Smith's request to examine the dispatch book.

On approximately May 4, 1982, at approximately 11 a.m., Virgil James, who had recently registered at Respondent Union's hiring hall, went to the dispatch window of the hiring hall and spoke to the dispatch secretary. He asked if he could examine the dispatch book in which he was registered.[60] The dispatch secretary replied, "No," and stated that she was too busy to show him the book, but told him that he was "way down" the list. Thereafter the dispatch secretary showed James the particular page in the dispatch book on which his name appeared, but refused to allow him to examine the book so that he could turn the pages and determine how many applicants were registered ahead of him.

Previously, in the fall of 1981, James, who at the time was registered for work at Respondent Union's hiring hall, asked Respondent Union's business agent Vic Urso, who was in the dispatch office, if he could examine the dispatch book. Urso, without explanation, denied the request, which was made during the period when the dispatch office was open for business. Subsequently, in May 1982, after James' unsuccessful effort to have the dispatch secretary allow him to examine the dispatch book, supra, James asked Urso if he and some other applicants could examine the dispatch books on which they were registered. The request was made at approximately 11 a.m. at the dispatch window where James and several other referral applicants had gathered. James asked Urso whether James and several other applicants who were with him could examine the dispatch book because they wanted to determine "how far down on the list [they] were."[61] Urso told them that they were "way down on the list." Urso also showed one or two of the applicants, including James, the particular pages in the dispatch book where their names were listed, but refused to allow them to examine the dispatch book. James explained to Urso that they would like to examine the dispatch book in order to count the number of applicants who were registered ahead of them. Urso, without explanation, refused this request.

On approximately May 10, 1982, William Grady registered for work at Respondent Union's hiring hall. Subsequently, about May 12, 1982, at approximately 11 a.m., Grady with another applicant asked the dispatch secretary if they could examine the dispatch book on which they were registered. The response of the dispatch secretary, who at the time had the dispatch book in her hands, was to close the book and, without any explanation, tell them they could not examine it.[62]

2. Discussion and conclusionary findings

As described in detail supra, during May 1982 on four separate occasions several applicants for employment who had registered for work at Respondent Union's exclusive hiring hall asked agents of Respondent Union for permission to examine the dispatch books on which they were registered and in each instance their request was denied. In two of the four instances the dispatch secretary in refusing to honor the requests, which were made during the business hours of the dispatch office, explained that she was too busy. In the other two instances the referral applicants' requests to examine the dispatch books, which requests were also made during the business hours of the dispatch office, were denied without any explanation.

The only evidence presented by Respondent Union with respect to this allegation is the testimony of Re-

[57] I have considered that although the complaint alleges Wareham's May 14, 1982 conversation with Smith as violating Sec. 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act, the violation found herein was not specifically alleged. However, "it is well established that a violation not alleged in the complaint may nevertheless be found where, as here, the unlawful activity was related to and intertwined with the allegations in the complaint, and the matter was fully litigated before the Administrative Law Judge." Doral Hotel & Country Club, 240 NLRB 1112 fn. 3 (1979).

[58] The evidence herein is based on the undenied and uncontradicted testimony of Gilbert Smith, Virgil James, and William Grady. Each impressed me as a sincere and reliable witness.

[59] Smith's reason for seeking this information was to determine whether he was far enough down in the order of referral so that it would be safe for him to take a vacation without having to risk his name being called for a job opening.

[60] James' reason for desiring to examine the dispatch book was to determine the number of applicants registered ahead of him so he would have some idea of his chances of being dispatched.

[61] The reason that James and the other referral applicants who were with him wanted to examine the dispatch book was to determine the number of applicants registered ahead of them and to determine whether the applicants who were registered were being dispatched in their order of registration.

[62] Grady and the other applicant wanted to examine the dispatch book in which they were registered in order to determine where they were on the dispatch list.

spondent Union's business manager Richard Slawson that the Respondent Union's policy is not to allow the dispatch books out of the dispatch office because they are important business records which, if lost or destroyed, would be virtually irreplaceable. Slawson further testified that Respondent Union's policy is that when referral applicants ask the dispatch secretary for permission to examine the dispatch books that the dispatch secretary tells them to go to Slawson's office to make their request and that, when they make their request to Slawson, Slawson escorts them into the dispatch office and in Slawson's presence the applicants are permitted to examine the dispatch books.

The Board has held that a union, such as Respondent Union, which operates an exclusive hiring hall, violates its duty of fair representation and Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act when it refuses to permit a referral applicant to view its referral records. Operating Engineers Local 324 (AGC of Michigan), 226 NLRB 587 (1976); Plasterers Local 90 (Southern Illinois Builders Assn.), 236 NLRB 329, 338 (1978). Respondent Union in defending against its refusal to allow the referral applicants in this case to examine its dispatch books urges that the dispatch secretary and union business agent were privileged to refuse the applicants' requests because, in the first place, the requests were made during business hours when the books were in use, thus, the Union's agents acted reasonably in refusing the requests and, in the second place, the applicants in making their requests to examine the dispatch books failed to follow Respondent Union's prescribed procedure which was a reasonable one. These defenses are without merit for the following reasons.

The referral applicants were not obliged to follow Respondent Union's alleged procedure for examining the dispatch books because they were not informed of the existence of this procedure; there is no evidence that at the time they were refused permission to examine the dispatch books or that at any other time the referral applicants were informed that the correct procedure was for them to speak to Business Manager Slawson if they wanted to examine the dispatch books. And with respect to the fact that the requests were made during the business hours of the dispatch office, I note that in two of the four instances where the requests to examine the dispatch books were denied no explanations were offered for the refusals. The applicants were not advised directly or by implication that they could return to the dispatch office after its business hours and at that time they would be permitted to examine the relevant dispatch books. Regarding the other two instances where the dispatch secretary did explain to the applicants that she was too busy to allow them to examine the dispatch books, the dispatch secretary did not indicate that if the applicants returned when she was not busy that she would allow them to examine the books. As a matter of fact, the dispatch secretary was not authorized to permit an applicant to examine the dispatch books because, according to Respondent Union's alleged policy, supra, an applicant before being allowed to examine the dispatch books must first get the permission of Business Manager Slawson who would personally escort the applicant into the business office to examine the books, apparently without limitation as to whether or not the dispatch office was open for business. It is for the foregoing reasons that I find that Respondent Union has not justified its refusal to allow the referral applicants permission to examine its dispatch books.

Based on the foregoing I find that Respondent Union during May 1982 unjustifiably refused to allow referral applicants Smith, James, Grady, and other unidentified applicants to examine Respondent Union's dispatch books in violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A).

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Respondent Employer, M. W. Kellogg Constructors, Inc. is an employer engaged in commerce with the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Respondent Union, United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices of the Plumbing and Pipefitting Industry of the United States and Canada, Local 250, AFL–CIO is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Respondent Employer violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by refusing to assign overtime work to the travelers employed on the Shell Oil project from March 1 through May 31, 1982, and by laying off the 87 travelers whose names appear in Appendices A and B on the dates opposite their names, because said travelers were not members of Respondent Union and in order to give preference to members of Respondent Union.

4. Respondent Employer violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act as follows: By informing employees on the Shell Oil project that travelers could not be assigned overtime work and would be laid off from work prior to the shutdown phase of the project, because they were travelers and not members of Respondent Union; by informing a traveler on the Shell Oil project that if he transferred his membership into Respondent Union he would be eligible to work the shutdown phase of the project; by telling a traveler on the Shell Oil project that the reason for his layoff was that Respondent Union had given instructions that all of the travelers were to be laid off; by telling a traveler on the Shell Oil project that the reason that the traveler and another traveler could not work overtime was due to instructions from Respondent Union; and by telling travelers on the Shell Oil project that it was the policy of Respondent Union that Respondent Employer could not assign the travelers any overtime work.

5. By threatening an employee with loss of employment if he contested Respondent Employer's above-described unlawful policy of laying off travelers because of their nonmembership in Respondent Union, Respondent Union violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.

6. By refusing to permit applicants for employment, who were registered for work at its exclusive hiring hall, to examine its dispatch books, Respondent violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.

7. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent Employer violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by refusing to assign overtime work to the travelers employed on the Shell Oil project during the period encompassing March 1 through May 31, 1982, because of their nonmembership in Respondent Union, I shall recommend that Respondent Employer make whole the travelers employed by it on the Shell Oil project during the aforesaid period of time for any loss of earnings they may have suffered by virtue of Respondent Employer's discrimination,[63] with interest thereon to be computed in the manner prescribed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977). See generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

Having also found that Respondent Employer violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by laying off the 87 travelers employed on the Shell Oil project, whose names appear in Appendices A and B on the dates opposite their names, because of their nonmembership in Respondent Union, I shall recommend that they shall be made whole for any loss of earnings or other benefits they may have suffered as the result of the discrimination against them,[64] as prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest thereon to be computed in the manner prescribed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977). See generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

I have not recommended the usual remedy of reinstatement, inasmuch as the laid-off discriminatees had no expectation of continued employment with the Respondent Employer beyond the date on which work at the Shell Oil project was completed. However, I shall recommend that Respondent Employer inform each one of the discriminatees named in Appendices A and B, in writing, that he or she will be considered eligible for employment in the future at any of its projects, on a nondiscriminatory basis, if he or she should choose to apply for employment at any of them. Steelcon, Inc., 266 NLRB 881 (1983), and Franchi Bros. Construction Corp., 232 NLRB 179 (1979). I shall also recommend that Respondent Employer mail copies of the notice recommended herein to each employee employed by Respondent Employer on the Shell Oil project as a pipefitter during the period of March 1 through May 30, 1982, the time of the unfair labor practices herein.[65]

[63] The record reveals the names of the travelers employed during the period of April 7 through May 31, 1982, who were laid off during that time period (Jt. Exh. 1, app. E), but fails to reveal the names of the travelers, if there were any, who were employed from March 1 to April 7, 1982, but who were terminated prior to April 7, 1982. The identity of this latter group of travelers will be left to the compliance stage of this proceeding. NLRB v. Iron Workers Local 433, 600 F.2d 770, 778 (9th Cir. 1979). Of course the amount of overtime pay, if any, which any one of the discriminatees who were employed during the relevant time period is entitled to receive will be determined in the compliance stage of this proceeding.

[64] Respondent Employer's backpay liability will toll no later than the date that its work on the Shell Oil project ended, which, as I have found supra, occurred sometime in July 1982. Respondent Employer will have an opportunity in the compliance stage of this proceeding to prove that some or all of the discriminatees would have been selected for layoff even prior to the actual end of its operations on the project. But so there will be no misunderstanding of the intent of this remedial order, I also note that Respondent Employer is precluded in the compliance stage of this proceeding from attempting to prove that some or all of the 87 discriminatees would have been laid off on the dates opposite their names in Appendices A and B during the normal course of business irrespective of their nonmembership in Respondent Union. The question of whether Respondent Employer would have laid off those employees on those dates for legitimate reasons even absent their nonmembership in Respondent Union was an issue encompassed by the complaint in this proceeding and, as I have found supra, Respondent Employer in this proceeding failed to make such a showing. In short, the principles of res judicata preclude the relitigation of this issue during the compliance stage of this proceeding.

[65] Where, as here, an employer's termination of its operations precludes notification through posting, it is the Board's customary procedure to require that the appropriate notice be mailed to all the employees who were employed at the time the unlawful act occurred in order to eliminate, to the extent possible, the lingering effects on those employees who might have been exposed to that unfair labor practice. DECISION, ORDER, AND DIRECTION OF SECOND ELECTION

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

On 26 August 1983 Administrative Law Judge Hutton S. Brandon issued the attached decision. The Respondent Company filed exceptions, a supporting brief, and an answering brief; the General Counsel filed cross-exceptions, a supporting brief, and an answering brief; and the Charging Party Union filed cross-exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

We would not on the basis of the 8(a)(1) violation found grant a bargaining order. There is no reason to believe nor have such findings been made that a fair rerun election would be precluded by the Respondent's commission of this 8(a)(1) violation.[2] Accordingly, the 10 November election will be set aside and a second election directed in the appropriate unit as set forth in the decision.[3]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Wm. T. Burnett and Co., Inc., Statesville, North Carolina, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Announcing and granting wage increases to its employees in order to dissuade them from supporting United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, AFL-CIO.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Post at its places of business in Statesville, North Carolina, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[4] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 11, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(b) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the election held on 10 November 1982 in Case 11-RC-5110 be set aside and remanded to the Regional Director for Region 11 to conduct a new election.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the complaint be dismissed insofar as it alleges violations not found herein.

[Direction of Second Election omitted from publication.]

[1] We adopt the judge's finding that the Respondent did not violate Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act when, through its president Townsend, it showed employee Holland a portion of Townsend's speech stating, inter alia, that "In the meantime, during this long negotiation period, your wages would be frozen by law . . . ." (Emphasis added.) While we do not quarrel with the judge's recitation of the law regarding wage increases during negotiations, we find that he misquoted Townsend's statement by substituting "could be frozen" for "would be frozen" which appears in the text of the speech. We would, nevertheless, affirm the judge's finding, see R. L. White Co., 262 NLRB 575 (1982).

[2] NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575 (1969). Walgreen Co., 221 NLRB 1096 (1975). We find it unnecessary to rule on the judge's discussion of circumstances warranting a bargaining order.

[3] Having found a bargaining order unwarranted we have no need to make findings on whether the Union represented a majority of the unit employees based on valid authorization cards.

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize

To form, join, or assist any union

To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To act together for other mutual aid or protection

To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT announce or grant a wage increase to our employees in order to dissuade them from supporting United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, AFL-CIO.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WM. T. BURNETT AND CO., INC.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

HUTTON S. BRANDON, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried at Statesville, North Carolina, on June 20–22, 1983. The charge in Case 11–CA–10690 was filed by United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, AFL–CIO (Union), on November 19, 1982,[1] and a complaint and notice of hearing issued on December 30 alleging violations of Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act), by Wm. T. Burnett and Co., Inc. (Respondent or the Company). The complaint was amended on April 14, 1983, to include an allegation that Respondent's unfair labor practices were so serious and substantial in character as to warrant the entry of a remedial order requiring Respondent to recognize and bargain with the Union as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of its employees in the appropriate unit specified in the amended complaint.

The petition in Case 11–RC–5110 was filed by the Union on September 22 and pursuant to a Stipulation For Certification Upon Consent Election approved by the Regional Director for Region 11 on October 12 a secret-ballot election was held on November 10.[2] A majority of valid ballots counted plus challenged ballots were cast against representation by the Union. On November 16 the Union filed timely objections to conduct affecting the results of the election. The Regional Director found three of the Union's numbered objections raised issues which could best be resolved by a hearing and recommended approval of the Union's request to withdraw certain other objections to the election. Noting that the evidence in support of the Union's objections was similar to the evidence submitted by the Union in support of allegations in Case 11–CA–10690, the Regional Director on April 18, 1983, in conjunction with his report on objections issued an order consolidating Case 11–RC–5110 with Case 11–CA–10690 for hearing.[3]

The pleadings in Case 11–CA–10690 raise the issue of whether Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by unlawfully soliciting employees' grievances and implying that they would be remedied in order to discourage employees' union activity, unlawfully threatening employees with loss of jobs and loss of existing benefits if they selected the Union as their collective-bargaining representative, soliciting employees to revoke union authorization cards, announcing and thereafter granting employees a general wage increase in order to dissuade employees from supporting the Union, and interrogating employees regarding their union sympathies. The issues to be considered in connection with resolution of the objections in Case 11–RC–5110 are coextensive with the alleged unfair labor practices. A final issue raised by the pleadings and to be determined herein is whether the Respondent's actions constituted such serious and substantial unfair labor practices as to warrant the entry of a remedial bargaining order based on the Union's majority status reflected by union authorization cards.

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the briefs filed by the General Counsel and Respondent and the oral argument of the Union made at hearing, I make the following

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent is a Maryland corporation engaged in the manufacture and sale of cotton and synthetic batting with facilities located in several States of the United States including the two facilities located at Statesville, North Carolina, which are the only facilities involved in this proceeding. During the 12-month period preceding issuance of the complaint, Respondent received goods and raw materials valued in excess of $50,000 at its Statesville, North Carolina facilities directly from outside the State of North Carolina. During the same period, Respondent also shipped goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from its Statesville, North Carolina facilities to points outside the State of North Carolina. The complaint alleges, Respondent by its answer admits, and I find that Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

The complaint alleges, Respondent admits, and I also find that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

[1] All dates are in 1982 unless otherwise stated.

[2] The unit in which the election was held is as follows: "All production and maintenance employees, truckdrivers, and lead persons employed by the Employer at its (Main) 2550 W. Front Street and (Cushion) Taylorsville Road, Statesville, North Carolina facilities, excluding all office clerical employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act. Respondent admits the foregoing unit is appropriate, and I conclude, as alleged in the complaint, that it is an appropriate unit for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Sec. 9(b) of the Act.

[3] No exceptions to the Regional Director's report on objections were filed by the parties, and the Board, accordingly, adopted the Regional Director's recommendations on May 9, 1983.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Alleged Independent Violations of Section 8(a)(1)

1. The alleged solicitation of grievances with the implication that they would be remedied

The Union began its organizational campaign in September according to Donnie Burris, an International representative who conducted the campaign on the part of the Union. Burris testified that while employed by another union, the United Furniture Workers of America, he had also been involved in another campaign with Respondent a year or so earlier and was acquainted with Respondent's employees. By September 17, the Union had secured employees' signatures on 24 union authorization cards. On September 21, the Union distributed a leaflet to Respondent's employees announcing that on September 20 it had filed a petition for an election with the Board. It was in the context of Respondent's response to the Union's September 21 leaflet that the General Counsel contends Respondent committed its first unfair labor practice.

The complaint alleges that Respondent's president, David D. Townsend, an admitted supervisor, violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by soliciting employees' grievances at an employee meeting on September 21 with the implication that they would be remedied in order to discourage employees from engaging in union activities. In support of this allegation, employee Larry Cass testified that in a speech to first-shift employees on September 22 in which Townsend denied the Union's claim that a petition had been filed,[4] Townsend reminded employees that they had been through a union election before, that it had been voted down, and that he did not see any need for having a union or third party to represent the employees. Further, according to Cass, Townsend told employees that, if they needed to discuss wages or needed to talk to him in any way, that he would be more than happy to talk to them about it. Cass related that he had never previously heard Townsend invite employees to speak to him personally concerning wages.

Similarly, employee Charles Holland testified that he also attended the meeting at which Townsend spoke to employees about the petition being filed by the Union for an election. Townsend had related that the Labor Board had been telephoned, and it was ascertained that the petition had not at that point been received by the Board. According to Holland, Townsend went on to make observations about the business being bad and about the Company not needing a Union inside the plant. Holland further testified that Townsend told employees that if they had any kind of problems, they could come to talk to him, that his door was always open. Like Cass, Holland said he had never heard Townsend invite employees to come and talk to him on an individual basis before. Employee William Holder corroborated Holland's testimony saying that Townsend invited employees to talk to him about their problems. Townsend in testifying for Respondent admitted that he had met with employees on September 22 to tell them that the Union was "knocking on the door." He admittedly told employees that they did not need a third party to speak for them and stated that if employees had any questions, they could ask the questions and he would try to answer. While he could not recall whether he mentioned wages, he specifically denied that he told employees if they needed to discuss wages or needed to talk to him in any way that they could come see him. Moreover, he denied saying that if the employees had problems, the door was always open.

Of the witnesses testifying about the September 22 meeting, I find the testimony of Holland most credible. Both Cass and Townsend exhibited some uncertainty regarding all of what was said. Cass' testimony that Townsend invited employees to talk to him about wages was not supported by Holland. And while wages became a substantial issue in the Union's organizational campaign, the Union's first leaflet distributed on September 21 did not refer specifically to wages. Under these circumstances, I find it unlikely that Townsend would have invited discussions with employees regarding wages. On the other hand, Holland's testimony that Townsend invited employees to talk to him concerning problems was convincing and corroborated by Holder. Moreover, it would not be at all improbable that Townsend invited employees to talk to him in light of Townsend's admission that he told employees that they did not need a third party to represent them. Accordingly, crediting Holland, I find that Townsend did offer to discuss with employees their problems.

The General Counsel contends that Townsend's offer to discuss employee problems on September 22 constituted a solicitation of grievances with the implication that they would be remedied in order to discourage employees from engaging in union activities. In my view, Townsend's offer to talk to employees regarding problems was no more than an exercise of free speech under Section 8(c). Even considering Townsend's offer to talk to employees to be a solicitation of grievances, it is to be noted that there is nothing inherently coercive about such solicitation in itself. A violation occurs when the solicitation is accompanied by the implication that Respondent will take some step to remedy the grievances and thereby dissuade employees from their union support. See Uarco, Inc., 216 NLRB 1 (1974). There is no indication or suggestion that Respondent would act on any grievances or problems raised by any employees. Moreover, there is no evidence that any employees responded and sought to talk to Townsend individually in response to his invitation. The absence of any responses in itself reveals that the employees did not perceive Townsend's remarks as implying that any complaints would be remedied. The record is also devoid of evidence of specific promises of benefits which might tend to support a conclusion that Townsend's remarks here under consideration were intended to carry with them the unlawful implication of remedial action. Mars Sales & Equipment Co., 242 NLRB 1097 (1979), cited by the [4] It appears that the claim in the Union's leaflet that a petition had been filed with the Board was based on its mailing of the petition to the Board. The petition was not received and docketed by the Regional Office until September 22.

General Counsel in support of his argument on the violation I find to be inapposite. There, unlike in the instant case, the employer, already under a duty to bargain with the union, directed employees to come to it first regarding grievances prior to going to the union thereby implying early correction of the grievances making resort to the union unnecessary. Moreover, such direction was made in the context of other proposals to employees by the employer to bypass the union. Accordingly, because I find no implication of corrective action, I find that Townsend's invitation to talk to employees did not violate Section 8(a)(1) of the Act as alleged.

2. Threat of loss of jobs and benefits if employees selected the Union

The complaint alleges that Townsend on October 20 in remarks to employees at an employee meeting and through the showing of a film to employees entitled "Evelyn II" threatened employees with losses of jobs and losses of existing benefits if they selected the Union as their bargaining representative. In support of this allegation Charles Holland testified that he attended two meetings on October 20 at which Townsend spoke, the first at the end of the first shift and the second at the beginning of the second shift. In addition, he viewed the film shown by Respondent during the meetings. Holland testified that the film depicted a supervisor talking to an employee regarding union organization. In the course of the supervisor's remarks, according to Holland, the supervisor stated that, if an employee went on strike, he could be permanently replaced and lose benefits like paid holidays and other benefits. After the film was shown to the employees on the second shift, Townsend in his remarks to the second-shift employees stated that, if the Union came in, they would start from scratch during negotiations and wages would be frozen. Holland testified he raised his hand and asserted that the union representatives had previously told employees that during negotiations they would not lose any benefits. Holland testified Townsend replied that they would start from scratch in negotiations. Thereafter, Holland asked no further questions. Subsequently, Townsend came to Holland in the plant and showed him a paper which, according to Holland, stated that employees would start from scratch during negotiations and wages would be frozen.

Employee Cass testified regarding the showing of the film on the first shift on October 20. He testified that the emphasis of the film was on strikes. He attributed to Townsend no remarks regarding bargaining from scratch, nor did employee William Holder who testified that he also attended the October 20 meeting. Holder did testify, however, that Townsend related that bargaining could go on for years before a contract was signed and wages would be frozen during negotiations. Holder also added that Townsend told employees that they would lose the benefits they already had. Holder claimed that it was he rather than Holland who responded that the union representative had said that they would not lose their benefits, but he could recall no specific response by Townsend to that remark.

Townsend in his testimony conceded that he had two employee meetings on October 20 at which the film was shown. He testified that he made no remarks regarding the film other than to say that the film spoke for itself. He denied saying anything about employees losing their jobs as the result of strikes or losing benefits if they selected the Union. Moreover, he denied any assertion by Holland at the meeting that the employees had been told by the union representative they would not lose benefits. He conceded that he did have a conversation with Holland regarding the process of collective bargaining but stated that that occurred during October 8 at another employee meeting when Holland had stated that the Union had told employees that they would not lose benefits if the Union got into the Company. On this occasion, Townsend said he told Holland that the Company would negotiate with the Union on benefits and denied stating that if the Union got in the employees would lose benefits or that the Company would bargain from scratch in negotiations. According to Townsend, Holland responded by observing that negotiations were like a poker game, and Townsend agreed with Holland's remark. Townsend conceded, however, that he told Holland that during negotiations it was possible that their wages would be frozen. Later, on the same day, Townsend showed Holland a portion of a written speech prepared by Respondent's attorneys in response to a union organization effort a year earlier. The portion of the speech which Townsend showed Holland and which Holland identified at the hearing contained the following statement:

> Keep in mind that every word, every sentence, every working condition, every benefit, every penny of a written contract would have to be negotiated out between Company and Union representatives. Our attorney would be sitting at the bargaining table with us, protecting our legal rights. And negotiations could last for many months. In the meantime, during this long negotiation period, your wages would be frozen by law and we would be prevented by law from dealing directly with you or making any improvements in your working conditions and employee benefits until such time as a contract was actually signed with the Union.

In this instance I believe Townsend's testimony is more accurate than that of Holland, Holder, or Cass. All three employees exhibited some confusion about what Townsend said. Holland's testimony that Townsend said the employees would bargain from scratch is unsupported by any other employee witnesses. Holland was uncertain about the date of the remarks he attributed to Townsend and gave conflicting written statements to the Board regarding the timing of Townsend's alleged remarks. Further, despite Holland's claim that the document shown to him by Townsend contained the statement that bargaining would start from scratch, the only portion of the written speech which Holland identified as having been shown to him by Townsend contained no statement to the effect that bargaining would start from scratch.[8] Holder's version of Townsend's remarks was not supported by any other employee. Accordingly, I credit Townsend's version of his remarks on October 20. Moreover, I accept Townsend's admission regarding his remarks to Holland on October 8 in the employee meeting on that date and the subsequent showing to Holland on that date of the old written speech with the reference to the freeze in wages during negotiations.

Since I credit Townsend's testimony concerning the October 20 meetings, I find he made no unlawful remarks on that date. I further conclude that his statement at the meeting on October 8 and his showing of the written matter to Holland on that date also did not unlawfully threaten employees with a loss of benefits. Townsend's statement that wages could be frozen during negotiations amounts to an accurate observation of the current law that an employer may not increase wages without fully bargaining with the union selected by those employees to represent them in the unit in which the employer seeks to grant the increase. R. L. White Co., 262 NLRB 575 (1982). The written statements shown Holland add only that the freeze could last for "many months," and until an agreement was achieved. This too can be construed only as a truthful observation which cannot be stretched into coercive misrepresentation of the legal consequences of the employees' selection of the Union.

The General Counsel argues, citing Gould, Inc., 260 NLRB 54 (1982), that Respondent had a semiannual wage review in existence as a condition of employment, and, therefore, Respondent's threat to "freeze" constituted a threat to deprive employees of benefits to which they would otherwise be entitled. This argument appears to run contrary to the General Counsel's other arguments, infra, regarding the lack of Respondent's predetermined schedule in granting its employees wage increases. Moreover, it ignores the fact that Respondent had in 1982 opted not to give a semiannual increase thus removing that as a condition of employment. It further overlooks the fact, discussed infra, that Respondent had told its employees in May that it could not grant them a wage increase because of poor business conditions. There is no showing that employees were ever told subsequently that conditions had changed. Further, there is no evidence that employees herein at the time of Townsend's remarks to Holland were anticipating a wage increase. Indeed, the Union made a substantial campaign issue out of the employees' failure to receive a wage increase. Under these circumstances, there was no specific wage increase that the employees could anticipate losing as a result of wages being "frozen." Accordingly, I conclude that Townsend's assertions about wages being frozen during negotiations could not have been reasonably construed as a threat of a deprivation of a specific wage increase to employees if they selected the Union. I, therefore, find no violation of Section 8(a)(1) by Respondent in this regard.

The General Counsel also argued in his brief that statements in the film shown by Townsend to employees on October 20 constituted an independent violation of Section 8(a)(1) because it failed to spell out, in the context of discussions of the rights of strikers, an employer's specific obligations under Laidlaw Corp., 171 NLRB 1366, 1369 (1968), enfd. 414 F.2d 99 (7th Cir. 1969). Such failure, the General Counsel urges, constitutes a threat that if employees select the Union to represent them and go on strike they will lose their jobs "forever."

The disputed portion of the language contained in the film which was received in evidence by stipulation purports to be a conversation between a supervisor and an employee regarding strikes. That language is set forth below:

> Gene [the supervisor]: In effect [the Supreme Court] said, "Okay, the employees have a right to strike, but the company has the right to put a new employee in place of the ones who are out on the road." For every work station left unattended, the company has the right to put a replacement in there, and that replacement is permanent if the company wants it that way.
> Evelyn [the employee]: But what if somebody decides to come back to work?
> Gene: They can come back to their job if it hasn't been permanently filled by someone else, or on another job if they're qualified. But if there aren't any jobs they can handle, they're often out of luck.
> Evelyn: Forever?
> Gene: Who knows. All they can do is be placed on a waiting list in case some job they're qualified for happens to come open.
> Evelyn: I've never known that before.
> Gene: Well, it's something the union doesn't stress too hard to employees. They'll say "Oh yeah, we want a strike, we want this and we want that, and so on and so forth," (shakes head) so, even if you don't count the money you lose by not working . . . you could lose your job here . . . forever.

The General Counsel, citing Harrison Steel Castings Co., 262 NLRB 450 (1982), urges that an employer who seeks to inform employees of the rights of strikers is charged with the obligation to do the job with accuracy and completeness and that where the employer fails to articulate the continuing rights of strikers to reinstatement (even after replacement) in their continuing status as employees, the employer implicitly threatens employees that they risk termination if they participate in an economic strike and are replaced at the conclusion of such strike. The General Counsel asserts here that the vague and ambiguous response of the supervisor in the film's response to the question of an employee regarding whether the jobs are lost forever, in context, is incomplete and fails to explain an employer's full Laidlaw obligations in that it failed to note the employer's specific obligation affirmatively to seek out strikers as positions are vacated.

In arguing that the film reflected an accurate and adequate summary of the law pertaining to the rights of strikers, Respondent relies on the Board's decision in [8] It is clear, however, that the written speech did contain such a statement on a page other than the one shown to Holland.

Eagle Comtronics, Inc., 263 NLRB 515, 516 (1982). There the Board addressed the degree of detail required of an employer who undertakes to inform employees that they are subject to replacement in the event of an economic strike and stated:

> [W]e conclude an employer may address the subject of strikers' replacement without fully detailing the protections enumerated in Laidlaw [Laidlaw Corp., 171 NLRB 1366 (1968)] so long as it does not threaten that, as a result of a strike, employees will be deprived of their rights in a manner inconsistent with those detailed in Laidlaw. To hold otherwise would place an unwarranted burden on an employer to explicate all the possible consequences of being an economic striker. This we shall not do. As long as an employer's statements on job status after a strike are consistent with the law, they cannot be characterized as restraining or coercing employees in the exercise of their rights under the Act.

The Board went on in Eagle Comtronics to find not unlawful an employer's statement to employees that in the case of an economic strike, strikers "could be replaced with applications on file."

In my view, remarks in the film here in issue were no more incomplete or misleading than the employer's remarks in Eagle Comtronics. The film statements here clearly relate that replaced employees can be "placeed on a waiting list in case some job they're qualified for happens to come open." The statements are clearly more accurate and complete as to the strikers' rights than the statements considered in Harrison Steel Castings Co., supra where the employer only advised employees in a leaflet that "employees who go on strike and are replaced have no job to return to when the strike ends." Even considered in context of the supervisor's implication that ultimate recall from the replaced striker list may be uncertain and indefinite, I can find no clear threat in the film that replaced strikers lose all reinstatement rights. Accordingly, I find no violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by virtue of Respondent's showing of the film "Evelyn II."

3. Solicitation of employees to revoke their union authorization cards

It was Holland's testimony that during the remarks to employees on October 20 Townsend told employees to ask their union representative for their cards back, that the employees did not need a union to represent them and that if they did not know how to get their cards back they could ask the union representative or ask the Company. Cass testified that Townsend mentioned the cards at the meeting and said that just because employees had signed union authorization cards did not mean that they had to vote for the Union and that they could see the union representative and get their cards back. Similarly, William Holder testified that at the employee meeting on October 20 which he attended Townsend stated that he wanted employees to go back and pick their union cards up from Donnie Burris. Holder conceded, however, that he could not recall Townsend's words exactly in this regard, but recalled only that Townsend wanted employees to ask for their cards back.

Townsend admitted in his testimony that he had referred to union cards in one of the meetings on October 20. More specifically he testified that employee Lynn Williams asked if she had signed a union card did she have to vote for the Union. Townsend told her that she did not and that she could vote any way she wanted and that she could possibly even ask for her card back if she found that she signed the card in error. He denied that he asked employees at either of the meetings to ask for their cards back, and he further denied suggesting that the Company would help them get their cards back.

Townsend's recall of the details surrounding his reference to employees getting their union authorization cards back appeared to be more complete. In this regard he specifically recalled the question of Lynn Williams which prompted his reference to the cards. Townsend's testimony on this point was more convincing and, I believe, accurate and credible. In reaching this conclusion I note also the absence of evidence of any actual assistance to employees in getting their cards back or for that matter that any employees sought, in fact, the return of their cards. Thus, I conclude the evidence shows no direct solicitation of employees to seek the return of their union cards. I conclude the evidence does show, however, a gratuitous suggestion to employees that they could seek the return of their cards if they so desired.

The General Counsel argues that Townsend's gratuitous suggestion can only be interpreted as an attempt to undermine the Union in violation of Section 8(a)(1). He relies on Gibson Distributors, 238 NLRB 491 (1978), in support of this argument, although he notes that R. L. White Co., 262 NLRB 575 (1982), a later case cited in Respondent's brief, would suggest a contrary result. The General Counsel argues, however, that insofar as an employer's interest in employee revocation of union cards has no business justification, Gibson is a "sounder decision."

In Gibson Distributors, an administrative law judge found that the employer violated Section 8(a)(1) by telling employees that they "should" demand the return of their union authorization cards as soon as possible. The administrative law judge with Board approval found that the employer's remarks amounted to a solicitation to employees to withdraw their cards and such solicitation was an attempt to undermine the Union. On the other hand, in R. L. White the Board reversed an administrative law judge's finding that an employer had violated Section 8(a)(1) by gratuitously advising employees how to go about getting their union cards back from the union even though the advice included the observation that the decision to seek the return of the cards was "solely" that of the employee. The Board explained at 506:

> An employer may lawfully inform employees of their right to revoke their authorization cards, even where employees have not solicited such information, as long as the employer makes no attempt to ascertain whether employees will avail themselves of this right nor offers any assistance, or otherwise creates a situation where employees would tend to feel peril in refraining from such revocation.

R. L. White appears to be the latest Board position on the issue and I deem it controlling here. Moreover, if Gibson Distributors has not been overruled sub silentio by R. L. White, I conclude it may be distinguished on the premise that the language utilized by the employer as reported in Gibson Distributors was more in the nature of a direction to employees to withdraw their cards. It was not simply the gratuitous provision of information to employees regarding how they might seek the return of their card.

Based on the foregoing and the credited evidence, I conclude that Respondent here did nothing more than tell employees of their right to revoke their authorization cards. It did not offer them assistance in this regard, and, as in R. L. White, it did not create a situation where employees would tend to feel peril if they refrained from revoking their cards. I, therefore, find that notwithstanding the absence of any business justification for providing the employees with such information, Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

4. The announcement and grant of a general wage increase to dissuade employees from union support

It is undisputed that in the 9 years prior to 1982, Respondent had granted twice-a-year wage increases to its employees except for the years 1973, 1975, 1977, and 1980. In those years in which only one wage increase was given such increase was given either in May or July. In those years in which two wage increases were given, the first such increase was normally given in the first calendar quarter of the year and the second increase in the last calendar quarter. Prior to 1982, the largest single increase granted to Respondent's Statesville employees had been 30 cents per hour.

Respondent's wage increases at Statesville as referred to above contrasted with the more consistent pattern, timewise, of wage increases granted by Respondent to its employees at its Baltimore facility pursuant to a collective-bargaining agreement with United Furniture Workers.[6] Thus, for the 3 years prior to 1982, Respondent had granted such employees twice yearly increases on March 1 or March 25, and September 25 of each year. The single highest increase had been 50 cents per hour. Effective September 25, 1982, the Baltimore employees were granted a 40-cent increase with a 10-cent increase to take effect the following March.

It is undisputed that at a meeting with employees in May in Statesville Townsend advised employees that the economy was bad, business was bad, and he did not see how the employees could be given a raise.[7] Accordingly, no wage increases were granted at Statesville in the spring or summer, and Respondent's failure to grant a wage increase at Statesville became a substantial issue in the union campaign. Leaflets distributed to employees by the Union on October 5, 18, and 27 played upon the absence of the wage increase at Statesville through cartoons or specific references to wage increases granted to Baltimore employees in late September or early October and suggested the effectiveness of union organization in securing wage increases.

It is also undisputed that Townsend on October 29 announced a wage increase of 45 cents per hour to be effective for Statesville employees on November 1. It is undisputed that the wage increase was the largest single increase ever given to Respondent's employees at Statesville. It took effect within 10 days of the election which was set for November 10, and employees received the first fruits of the raise in the paychecks received the day following the election. This wage increase was alleged in the complaint herein to be violative of Section 8(a)(1) because it was granted to dissuade employees from their union support.

Townsend testified that a wage increase for Respondent's employees had been under consideration beginning in July. In this regard Townsend related that he proposed a wage increase to Richard Tucker, president and chairman of Respondent's board of directors, on July 22 during a visit by Tucker to Statesville. Both Tucker and Townsend testified that the ultimate decision regarding the wage increase was left to Townsend, but they agreed there was no reason not to put a wage increase into effect. Townsend admittedly initially proposed that the wage increase be effectuated in August prior to the contract negotiations in the Baltimore plant. However, Townsend also testified that in early August, Respondent encountered a substantial increase in hospitalization insurance rates and faced the decision of whether to absorb such rates or pass the increases on to the employees. It was decided to absorb such increases but reduced to a degree by a corresponding reduction in benefits. Following decision on the insurance, Townsend again talked to Tucker regarding the wage increase, and it was determined that a wage increase would be put into effect in the fall but no specific date or amount was decided upon. In this regard Townsend testified that he told Tucker on August 18 that he had changed his mind and was going to await the outcome of the Baltimore negotiations before making a decision on wages at Statesville. It is nevertheless clear that Townsend could have given a wage increase prior to such negotiations.

Townsend conceded that around October 7 he was aware of the results of the Baltimore negotiations and the 40-cents-per-hour increase agreed upon there and put into effect as of September 25. However, while he gave some consideration to the wage issue at Statesville, Townsend claimed he became preoccupied with other business and took no immediate action. He testified that it was not until the second or third week of October that he reached a decision to propose to Tucker an increase of 45 cents per hour to be effective November 1. According to Townsend, the November 1 date was chosen because it was the first Monday of the month, and he usually granted increases on the first Monday of the month. Tucker agreed with Townsend's plan. Townsend then on October 29 announced the wage increase and in announcing it told employees that business was still not booming, but things looked better. In announcing the increase, Townsend did not refer to the union campaign.

[6] The total of the semiannual increases granted Statesville employees was usually equivalent to the increases granted to the Baltimore employees. However, prior to the November 1, 1982 wage increase at Statesville no single increase at Statesville had exceeded a single increase granted in Baltimore.

[7] It also appears that no wage increase had been given employees in the Baltimore plant in March 1982.

Briefly stated, the General Counsel's position is that the wage increase announced October 29 was not "preplanned" even though there had been discussions between Townsend and Tucker regarding such an increase. Because it was not preplanned, because the amount of the increase was substantially out of line with prior increases, and because of its timing just before the election the General Counsel contends the increase was directly responsive to the union campaign and thus designed to interfere with the employees' free choice in the election.

Respondent's argument as summed up in its brief is that the decision to grant a wage increase was made prior to any knowledge of union activity among the employees, was consistent with prior increases in terms of timing and amount, and was not made with antiunion motivation.

In NLRB v. Exchange Parts Co., 375 U.S. 405 (1964), the Supreme Court in finding that an employer's grant of benefits to employees during the pendency of a union organizational campaign violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, stated at 409 that, "The danger inherent in well-timed increases in benefits is the suggestion of a fist inside the velvet glove," and "Employees are not likely to miss the inference that the source of benefits now conferred is also the source from which future benefits must flow and which may dry up if it is not obliged."

Thus, an employer's grant of benefits during the course of union activity has a substantial potential for impacting upon and interfering with such activity. An employer's course in granting benefits in such situations must be charted to avoid the perception that the grant of benefits is responsive to union activity. As stated by the administrative law judge with Board approval in McCormick Longmeadow Stone Co., 158 NLRB 1237 (1966):

> An employer's legal duty in deciding whether to grant benefits while a representation case is pending is to determine that question precisely as he would if a union was not in the picture. If the employer would have granted the benefit because of economic circumstances unrelated to union organization, the grant of those benefits will not violate the Act. On the other hand, if the employer's course is altered by virtue of the union's presence, then the employer has violated the Act, and this is true whether he confers benefits because of the union or withholds them because of the union.

See also KDEN Broadcasting Co., 225 NLRB 25 (1976); Russell Stover Candies, 221 NLRB 441 (1975); Montgomery Ward & Co., 220 NLRB 373 (1975); Gerbes Super Market, 213 NLRB 803 (1974).

Because of the obvious impact on employees of the grant of a benefit during a union election campaign, the granting of such benefits raises a strong presumption of illegality. See, e.g., Exchange Parts Co., supra; J. P. Stevens & Co. v. NLRB, 668 F.2d 767 (4th Cir. 1982); Gordonsville Industries, 252 NLRB 563 (1980); Chester Valley, Inc., 251 NLRB (1980); Wintex Knitting Mills, 216 NLRB 1058 (1975); International Shoe Co., 123 NLRB 682 (1959). More specifically, the presumption is that the employer's motive in granting the benefit is to influence employee choice in union representation. In view of this presumption, the burden is that of the employer to show that the grant of the increase was unresponsive to the organizational activity and the election.

Among the factors reflecting employer motivation in the grant of the wage increases are the timing of the increases,[8] the amount of the increases compared with prior increases,[9] whether or not implementation of the increases is consistent with a determination made prior to the advent of the union campaign,[10] and whether the increases are granted in the context of unfair labor practices.[11]

Considering the instant case in light of the foregoing principles, I am persuaded in agreement with the General Counsel's position that Respondent's wage increase was specifically designed to thwart the Union's campaign and influence the outcome of the election. The most significant factor in reaching the conclusion in this regard is the timing of the announcement of the wage increase only 12 days before the election. It is quite clear from undisputed testimony that Townsend was authorized to give the Statesville employees a raise anytime after his initial discussions with Tucker in July. And even though Townsend testified he was comptemplating giving an increase in August, no increase was granted.[12] Further, subsequent discussions between Tucker and Townsend looked only toward a wage increase in the indefinite "fall" with no monetary amounts decided upon. Based on Tucker's testimony, it was not until October 28 that Townsend told him he had reached a final decision on the date and amount of the increase to be granted.[13] This was more than 3 weeks after Townsend learned of the amount of the increase granted the Baltimore employees, the Baltimore increase being the event he assertedly awaited before deciding upon the Statesville increase. This delay is not credibly explained in Townsend's testimony. Moreover, even assuming Townsend had reached an earlier decision on the wage increase, a predetermination does not necessarily resolve the issue of

[11] Alvin Metals Co., 212 NLRB 707 (1974).

[12] In view of Townsend's testimony that he had decided to do away with the semiannual wage increases at Statesville and his initial determination to give a wage increase in August, Respondent's past practice with respect to the timing of wage increases at Statesville becomes largely immaterial insofar as it relates to the timing of the increases ultimately granted.

[13] This testimony contradicted the vague and contradictory testimony of Townsend that he told Tucker the amount of the increase much earlier. Tucker appeared more specific on the point having recorded the date of his communication on the point with Townsend and is, therefore, credited.

the legality of the increase. An announcement regarding the increase can itself be calculated to interfere with an election. See NLRB v. Styletek, supra. While the record reflects that Respondent had in fact granted wage increases at Statesville during early November in the years 1976, 1978, and 1979, the last fall increase prior to the increase in the instant case was granted in October. Moreover, although Townsend testified that the effective date of the increase herein was decided on consistent with the practice of making the increases effective on the first Monday of the month, the record reveals that such practice was honored as much in the breach as in the observation. Thus, the increases effective on November 8, 1976, November 1, 1978, and November 12, 1979, were not effective on the first Monday of the month. Nor were the increases granted on February 9, 1981, July 11, 1976, or July 14, 1975. The timing then of Respondent's prior increases must be regarded as erratic and not totally consistent.

In view of the foregoing, the timing of the wage increases here is only understandable as a response to the union campaign, particularly in light of the undisputed fact that on October 27, 2 days prior to the wage increase announcement and 1 day before Townsend reached his decision and related it to Tucker, the Union had distributed to the employees a leaflet in which it had made much of Respondent's failure to give an increase at Statesville while granting an increase to Baltimore employees. It is more reasonable to conclude, and I so conclude, that the determination regarding the increase and its effective date was reached on October 28 in direct response to the Union's leaflet the day before. This conclusion is buttressed by the fact that the increase was substantially larger than any single prior increase[14] for Statesville employees and surpassed the 40 cents per hour 1982 increase negotiated for Respondent's Baltimore employees.

Respondent's motivation regarding the Statesville increase is further impugned by Townsend's own admission that at the time of the wage increase while business had improved some employees were still working short weeks. And Townsend, in order to emphasize Respondent's benevolence in the matter, admittedly advised employees when announcing the increase that Respondent could not raise its prices "sufficiently to pay for this kind of increase." The implication of Respondent's benevolence was not likely to be overlooked by the employees because of its timing in relation to the union October 27 leaflet and because Townsend failed to disavow any relationship between the increase and the union campaign.

Finally, it is to be noted that the increased wages did not show up in the employee paychecks until the day after the election. Accordingly, had Respondent's motive not been improper, it could have avoided any announcement of the wage increase without either disturbing the effective date of the increase or otherwise penalizing the employees. Under these circumstances, it is difficult to perceive, and there is no evidence in the record explaining, why the announcement could not reasonably have been delayed. As the General Counsel's brief points out, an employer's failure to show why preelection announcements of benefits could not reasonably have been delayed evidences improper motivation in such announcements. J. P. Stevens & Co., supra, enfg. 244 NLRB 407 (1979); International Shoe Co., supra.

Considering all the foregoing, I conclude that the record evidence establishes a prima facie case which Respondent has failed to rebut that Respondent's decision to grant the increase to Statesville employees and the timing of its announcement of the increase was calculated to interfere with the employees' Section 7 rights and to interfere with the outcome of the election. By this conduct with respect to the wage increase, I find Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act as alleged in the complaint.

5. Interrogation of employees concerning their union sympathies

The General Counsel amended his complaint at the hearing to allege that Respondent through its supervisor, John McCall, interrogated employees concerning their union sympathies. The allegation is based on testimony of employee Allie Bunton who testified that on November 8, John McCall, an admitted supervisor within the meaning of the Act, tossed a button over on the table utilized by Bunton and employee Nancy Mayberry in their work. The button contained the legend, "2 is company, 3 is a crowd," an obvious reference to Respondent's position that employees did not need a Union. Bunton concluded that the button was flipped toward him and he picked it up and wore it for the remainder of the day. According to Bunton, he had in no way solicited the button from McCall.

William Holder gave a somewhat different version of what occurred. He testified that he saw McCall give out buttons to Mayberry and Bunton. According to Holder, McCall simply handed the buttons to the two. While Bunton put his on, Mayberry put hers in her pocketbook. Holland gave a similar version in his testimony but added that employee Robert Caldwell, observing McCall's giving the buttons to Mayberry and Bunton, asked McCall for a button. McCall's response was to shake his head negatively.

McCall testified that on or about November 8 he had one of the buttons in issue which had been given to him by his son, employee Ronnie McCall. McCall said he had no use for the button so he flipped it to one of his employees, specifically Nancy Mayberry. She missed the button, and it fell to the floor, but she picked it up. According to McCall, he gave out no other button to any other employee. McCall testified he did not know where the button originated, and he had never seen any before that evening. He did see Bunton wearing such a button the next day but insisted that he flipped the button only to Mayberry. McCall testified Mayberry had already told him she was against the Union.

The testimony of the four witnesses who testified on this issue cannot be reconciled. The testimony of Bunton and McCall is closest, and they appear to be in agreement at least to the extent that McCall flipped the button toward Bunton's area rather than simply handing Bunton the button as the other witnesses claim. Accordingly, and because Bunton impressed me as a honest individual with a generally good recall of the affair, I credit his version where it differs from that of other witnesses. I conclude that Bunton picked up the button which McCall testified he had flipped to Mayberry.

It is the position of the General Counsel that McCall's unsolicited distribution of the antiunion button constituted unlawful interrogation because it forced Bunton to make a declaration of his union sympathies. Respondent argues, on the other hand, that in the absence of evidence of a general distribution of the buttons by Respondent, McCall's conduct with respect to the buttons cannot be regarded as designed to cause employees to indicate their union sympathies. Respondent contends that under these circumstances the incident with Bunton must be regarded as isolated and noncoercive. I agree.

In Kurz-Kasch, 239 NLRB 1044 (1978), cited in the General Counsel's brief, three supervisors were found to have solicited employees in the midst of a union organizational campaign to wear "NO" buttons. The Board in finding a violation of the Act stated:

> It is well established that an employer's request during an election campaign that an employee wear a "Vote No" button or other pro-employer insignia constitutes a form of interrogation because, by agreeing or refusing to wear the button, the employee is forced into an open declaration either for or against the Union. Thus, the request of [the three supervisors] to individual employees clearly constituted coercive interrogation in violation of Section 8(a)(1).

A similar decision was reached by the Board in Kawneer Co., 164 NLRB 983 (1967). However, the distribution of antiunion material by an employer is not unlawful in itself absent some form of coercion or pressure on an employee to receive the material. McDonald's, 214 NLRB 879 (1974); Farah Mfg. Co., 204 NLRB 173 (1973). Moreover, in Acute Systems, Ltd. the administrative law judge, with Board approval, found no unlawful interrogation even where a supervisor, without a prior request from the employee, pinned a "Vote No" button on the employee and then immediately left the plant. The administrative law judge stated at 882–883:

> Although [the employee] did not so characterize [the supervisor's] action, it appears to have been more a playful gesture than any serious campaigning. It occurred at the end of the day when people were about to leave. Since [the supervisor] apparently did not stay on to see whether [the employee] kept the button on or removed it, it can hardly be inferred that [the supervisor's] pinning the button on [the employee] was designed as a means of determining the employee's views.

I view the circumstances in the instant case based on the credited facts to be as innocuous as those circumstances reflected in Acute Systems. If McCall had been inclined to cause Bunton to declare his union sympathies, it is more likely that he would have offered the button directly to Bunton rather than flipping it on a table where it was accessible to another employee, Mayberry. Bunton could have left the button where it lay without in any way indicating his union inclinations. In addition, in considering the violative nature of McCall's conduct, it must be observed that no other violations of the Act were attributed to McCall in particular and no other violations consisting of unlawful interrogation were attributed to Respondent generally. Accordingly, I find this incident to be like the one considered in Acute Systems, which was termed "essentially isolated and noncoercive." I, therefore, find no violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act based on this incident.

B. The Objections to the Election

The violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act found above with respect to the wage increase is coextensive with the Union's Objection 5 to the election. A violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act a fortiori constitutes objectionable conduct affecting the results of the election. Dal-Tex Optical Co., 137 NLRB 1782 (1962). Accordingly, merit is found to the Union's Objection 5, and it shall be recommended that the election held on November 10 be set aside. The Union's other Objections 3 and 7 and "other acts" are coextensive with the complaint allegations discussed above and found to be lacking in merit. Accordingly, it shall be recommended that these objections be dismissed as also lacking in merit.

C. The Appropriateness of a Bargaining Order to Remedy Respondent's Unfair Labor Practices

1. The validity of the union authorization cards for majority purposes

The complaint as amended alleges that Respondent's unfair labor practices are so serious and substantial in character and effect as to warrant the entry of a remedial bargaining order requiring Respondent as of September 22, the date it allegedly embarked on its alleged unfair labor practices, to recognize and bargain with the Union. In this regard, the General Counsel relies on the principles announced in NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575 (1969), wherein the Court established standards under which bargaining orders may be utilized to remedy unfair labor practices. Such standards are as follows: (1) a bargaining order may be granted where an employer's unfair labor practices are "outrageous" and "pervasive"; (2) a bargaining order may be granted in less extraordinary cases marked by less pervasive unfair labor practices which nonetheless still have a tendency to undermine majority strength; and (3) a bargaining order is not appropriate in cases involving minor or less extensive unfair labor practices "which, because of their minimal impact on the election machinery, will not sustain a bargaining order."

Important to the issue of the appropriateness of a bargaining order in a case such as this is the majority status of the union as reflected by some means other than an election, usually by authorization cards. To establish the Union's majority status here, the General Counsel introduced in evidence the authorization cards executed by 24 of Respondent's employees in a unit which Respondent contends consists of 40 employees.[15]

The Union's International representative Donnie Burris identified the union authorization cards of five employees, Tony Bost, Robert Davidson, Leon Felts, Ben Mills, Herb Pinnix, and George Cauthern. With the exception of the card of Pinnix, which was dated October 19, the other cards solicited by Burris were dated September 16 and 17. According to Burris' testimony he solicited the cards from employees either at the home of the employee or in Burris' motel room. Burris testified that in each case he read the cards to the employees and stated the purpose of the cards was to designate the Union as their representative so that they could obtain a union. The cards solicited by Burris, as were all the cards involved in this case, were regular single purpose union authorization cards reflecting that the signer authorized the Union to act as his collective-bargaining agent in dealing with his employer in regard to wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment. The cards also contained language revoking all previous authorizations.

Respondent contested the validity of the cards solicited by Burris on the basis of the testimony of employees Davidson, Mills, and Bost. Davidson testified that he had signed his union card at a meeting after Burris had told employees at the meeting that the main purpose of the cards was to get an election at the plant. Davidson conceded on cross-examination that Burris had stated he was there to try to help the employees obtain a union and that the way they went about getting a union after they got cards signed was to file a petition with the Board.

Mills testified he could not recall who asked him to sign the card and even expressed some uncertainty as to where he was at the time his card was signed. Nevertheless, he testified that he was told that the cards were just to get enough people so that they could have an election. He admittedly read the card before he signed it, however, and conceded that he was also told that the Union wanted to get in the Company so it could be the employees' bargaining representative.

Bost exhibited confusion about the basis for having signed his card, and while admitting that he read the card before he signed it, he could not recall any specific misrepresentations made to him regarding the purpose of the card. Rather, he testified (contrary to a statement he had given to Respondent on June 9, 1983, to the effect that a union representative had told him that the card was only to get an election or it was to be used to get an election) that nobody actually told him what the union authorization card was for.

Even assuming that Burris referred to the use of the cards in obtaining an election, such reference in and of itself is insufficient to invalidate the cards for majority purposes. As the Supreme Court said in Gissel Packing Co., supra at 606:

> [E]mployees should be bound by the clear language of what they sign unless that language is deliberately and clearly cancelled by a union adherent with words calculated to direct the signer to disregard and forget the language above his signature. There is nothing inconsistent in handing an employee a card that says the signer authorizes the Union to represent him and then telling him that the card will probably be used first to get an election.

Cards may be counted for majority purposes so long as it is established that the card signer was not told that the card was to be used solely for the purpose of obtaining an election. Levi Strauss & Co., 172 NLRB 732 (1968); Cumberland Shoe Corp., 144 NLRB 1268 (1963), enfd. 351 F.2d 917 (6th Cir. 1975). Subjective intent of the card signer does not bear on the validity of the card, and even where an employee signs a card on the belief it will be used to obtain an election, the card will still constitute a valid union designation so long as no misrepresentations were made by the solicitor as to the purpose of the card. Henry I. Siegel, Inc., 165 NLRB 493 (1967).

Burris' testimony impressed me as honest and clearly more credible than Davidson, Mills, and Bost who were obviously confused and unclear regarding statements made attendant to their card signing. I credit Burris and conclude he made no statements in solicitation calculated to mislead or misrepresent the purpose of the cards. Accordingly, I find the cards of Davidson, Mills, and Bost valid designations of the Union for establishing the Union's majority status herein. I likewise find the other cards solicited and identified by Burris to be valid union designations.

Employee Charles Holland identified his own card and the cards of four other employees whom he had solicited, Robert Caldwell, Michael Blevins, Donnie Allison, and Nancy Mayberry. Holland testified that he told such employees that if they still felt strongly about the Union to read the card and sign it and that the card was for union representation.

Holland's testimony regarding the solicitations was disputed only by Michael Blevins who testified for Respondent. Blevins testified that Holland told him in soliciting the card that the card was just saying that Blevins agreed to come to the union meetings and hear what the Union had to tell him. Further, on cross-examination while admitting that he read the card before he signed it, Blevins added that Holland told him that the card meant simply that the individuals in the Union whom the employees would be dealing with would sponsor the employees. Additionally, Blevins related that although Holland explained that by signing the card Blevins would not be obligated to join the Union, Holland added that signing the card meant that the Union could help them with respect to wages and "things in the Company." Moreover, he conceded that Holland may well have told him the card was for the Union to represent the employees. Even accepting Blevins' testimony regarding Holland's representations, I find no material misrepresentations which would affect the validity of Blevins' card in establishing the Union's majority status.

[15] This includes Wanda Hector whom Respondent, contrary to the General Counsel, contends is not a supervisory employee, and Charlotte Sutton whom Respondent contends, again contrary to the position of the General Counsel, is a regular part-time employee. The inclusion of these two employees in the unit will be discussed infra.

Two cards were identified by employee William Holder, one signed by himself, and one signed by his brother David Holder. William Holder related that he read the card he signed and dated September 16 and testified that he observed his brother David Holder sign his card in the parking lot at the Company. He testified he observed David Holder read the card before he signed it. David Holder, called by Respondent, testified that no one specifically asked him to sign the union card but claimed he was told at some time by someone whom he could not recall that the card was to try to get the Union in where they could have a vote. Nevertheless, Holder executed a statement for Respondent dated June 9, 1983, in which he asserted that he went to several meetings where the Union explained the purpose of the cards and the Union agents said "the sole purpose of the cards was to get an election." David Holder also signed a statement for the General Counsel dated June 16, 1983, in which he stated that he had gone to union meetings in an earlier union campaign and "knew the cards were to get a union in at Burnett." David Holder impressed me as a very confused witness with an extremely poor memory which undermines the accuracy of his recall concerning his claim that he signed the card only after the representation by an unidentified solicitor that the "sole purpose" of the card was to get an election. Accordingly, I do not credit David Holder and based on his own admission that he read the card, I can find no reason why he should not be bound by the clear language of what he signed. I find the cards of William and David Holder to be valid designations of the Union for majority purposes.

Employee Geoffrey Moose, called by the General Counsel, identified his authorization card dated September 17 which Moose admittedly read before he signed. However, Moose also executed a statement for Respondent dated June 10, 1983, in which he related that an employee had asked him to sign a card stating "the sole purpose of the card was to get an election." But, in further testimony, he contradicted that statement stating that nobody really told him what the card was for. Nevertheless, he further testified that he was told at a union meeting that there was no obligation in signing the card and that the cards were just for an election. On still further questioning, he explained that such statements were made in an earlier union campaign and not during the campaign in the fall of 1982. In view of Moose's confused and contradictory statements regarding representations made to him concerning the use of the card, I find the circumstances do not clearly and convincingly show that any misrepresentations were made to Moose which would justify the disregard of the clear and unambiguous language on the face of the card signed by Moose. Accordingly, I find the card valid for majority purposes.

Respondent did not specifically attack the validity of the cards executed by Michael Moose, Jerry Brown, Larry Cass, James Speller, or Lynn Williams. Accordingly, the cards executed by these employees are found to be valid for the purpose of establishing the Union's majority status. The Respondent did contest the validity of the cards of John Brown, Martha Teastor, and James Parks. The card of John Brown, who had died prior to the hearing, was identified by his son Jerry Brown, also an employee of Respondent, who further testified regarding the circumstances of the execution of the card. Thus, Jerry Brown testified that he signed the card for his father after reading it to him. According to Jerry Brown, John Brown was illiterate and, although Brown could execute his name, he frequently had his son execute documents for him. Thus, Jerry Brown testified that he frequently endorsed his father's paycheck, and the banks customarily honored the endorsement. Moreover, he had authorization to conduct other banking transactions for his father. Jerry Brown testified that in addition to reading the card to his father, he explained to his father that signing the card would give the Union permission to act as his agent. With respect to an election, Jerry Brown told his father that they had to have over 51 percent of the employees' signatures on cards to have an election and that if the Union won the election the Union would try to negotiate a contract with the Company and the employees would be given an opportunity to then become union members. There was further discussion of the pros and cons of the Union before Jerry Brown was given permission to execute the card for his father. Jerry Brown's testimony impressed me as candid, accurate, and credible. Accordingly, and while recognizing that consideration of the statements and actions attributed to deceased persons must be "subject to the closest scrutiny before deciding what weight to be given it," [Wallick & Schwalm Co., 95 NLRB 1262 (1951), enfd. 198 F.2d 477 (3d Cir. 1952)] I credit the testimony of Jerry Brown and find that he was authorized to execute the authorization card on behalf of John Brown. As the General Counsel's brief points out, the Board has long held that an individual may direct another to sign a union card in his behalf without affecting the validity of the card for majority purposes. See Standard-Coosa-Thatcher, 257 NLRB 304 (1981); Essex Wire Corp., 188 NLRB 397 (1971). I, therefore, find that the card executed for John Brown constitutes a valid designation of the Union in establishing the Union's majority status here.

The card of employee Martha Teastor was identified by Alice Beck, an organizer for the Union. Beck testified that she solicited the card which is dated November 4, 1982, from Teastor stating that the card was to show that Teastor wanted to be represented by the Union. To Teastor's question whether anyone would know whether she had signed a card, Beck replied that they would if the matter ever went to a hearing but not otherwise. Teastor replied that she really did not care, that she wanted to be represented by the Union, and she went ahead and executed the card. Teastor, on the other hand, testified for Respondent that Beck told her that the authorization card was "to get the election in." Beck's testimony was clear and straightforward, and Respondent elected not to cross-examine her. I credit Beck over Teastor. Moreover, I find it highly improbable that Beck would have represented to Teastor that the card was to be used to get an election since the election was already scheduled at the time Teastor executed the card. Accordingly, I find Teastor's card to be a valid designation of the Union for majority purposes.

Respondent also attacks the validity of the cards of employees Joseph Gatton, Jesse Lewis, and James Parks claiming these employees also relied on misrepresentations as to the purpose and effect of their cards. In this regard Respondent points to the testimony of Gatton that he did not read the union card he signed, and he was told that "if we had enough participation filling out the cards that there would be a good possibility there would be an election." Similarly, Lewis also testified that at union meetings he attended there was reference to an election, and it was stated that "If we didn't get enough cards we wouldn't have an election." In concluding that the cards of Gatton and Lewis constituted valid union designations, I note that both Gatton and Lewis acknowledged other purposes of the card than "getting an election." Thus, Gatton, who also testified that no specific representation was made to him regarding the purpose of the card when he signed it, relied on his experience in prior union campaigns and asserted that the other union authorization cards he had previously read indicated the cards gave the union the right to be the employees' bargaining agent. He testified he had assumed the cards he signed herein stated the same thing. Further, considering the whole of Gatton's testimony including his failure to identify anyone as making a reference to an election in connection with the use of the cards in the instant case, I conclude Gatton was testifying about remarks made concerning the use of the cards in prior campaigns. Lewis in his testimony also referred to his experience in prior campaigns and explained that upon hearing what the Union was all about, he "liked" it. Indeed, in the campaign here involved, Lewis specifically asked for a union authorization card and, asked on cross-examination if anything else was said to him about the purpose of the card other than to obtain an election, Lewis responded, "To better ourselves," and "I was all for that."

Respondent attacks the validity of Parks' card on the basis of a prehearing statement of Parks, given to Respondent's attorney in which Parks said an unnamed union agent told him the card "was solely for the purpose of getting an NLRB election." However, in his testimony, Parks testified he was told by an employee that the card was to see about getting a union in. He added on further cross-examination, that he was also told that the card was "just to see if we can get the union in the plant, you know, if we got enough of them, we could get enough to hold an election." He testified he took the card home and talked the Union over with his wife and signed the card only after concluding that it would "be a good thing." He specifically revoked the use of the word "solely" in the statement he executed for Respondent's attorney and attributed the origin of the word to Respondent's attorney. Under these circumstances, I find Parks' card to be a valid union designation for majority purposes.

2. Disputed inclusions in the unit

Respondent asserts that Charlotte Sutton, a part-time sewer in its cushion plant, located more than a mile from its main plant was inadvertently excluded from the voting eligibility list and is appropriately includable in the unit in which the election was held. Sutton's job duties were no different from those of the regular cushion plant employees, but she received none of the fringe benefits of the regular employees. Although Townsend testified that Sutton was a part-time employee, and as such was limited to 32 hours of work per week, Respondent's payroll records for Sutton reflected that on at least two occasions in August, Sutton worked 40 or more hours per week. According to Townsend, Sutton not only filled in for vacationing or absent employees but was generally utilized on an as-needed basis. Sutton's last appearance on Respondent's payroll before the election was on the week ending October 31. She did not appear again on the payroll until the week of November 28 when she worked 24 hours. She did not appear on the payroll thereafter.

The General Counsel contends that Sutton was a seasonal, casual, or intermittent employee who had no community of interest with the unit employees and was, therefore, ineligible for unit inclusion. He urges that Respondent's failure to include her on the eligibility list was no error and that its present efforts to include her are simply afterthought.

Examination of the pay record of Sutton reveals that from May 23 through October 31 she worked in all but approximately 4 workweeks, and for the great majority of those weeks in which she worked, she worked in excess of 30 hours. There is no evidence that she quit or became unavailable after October 31, the last week she worked prior to the election. Since she did work in the week ending November 28, it is reasonable to infer that she remained available for part-time work between October 31 and November 21. I, therefore, conclude she was a regular part-time employee and was, therefore, eligible for inclusion in the unit. See Davison Paxton Co., 185 NLRB 21 (1970).

The General Counsel would exclude from the unit Wanda Rector on the basis of her alleged supervisory status. Respondent denies the existence of any supervisory authority in Rector and argues for her inclusion.

Rector worked in the cushion plant with about five other employees. Prior to her retirement on September 17, Ann Peacock supervised the cushion plant and, according to the testimony of employee Cass, Townsend in announcing Peacock's retirement related that Rector would thereafter be in charge of the cushion plant. Employee Holland testified that Townsend said Rector would be a supervisor. Townsend denied both statements. I credit Townsend's denial here. The fact that Cass and Holland contradict each other leaves the impression they were testifying as to their own individual conclusions regarding Townsend's comments rather than his actual remarks. Moreover, Townsend's undisputed testimony that Rector, who is hourly paid as contrasted to Peacock's salaried position, received no raise or other increase in benefits as a result of Peacock's retirement, mitigates against an announcement that she had been elevated in position.

Respondent describes Rector as a leadperson for the past year and a half who spent over 50 percent of her time doing machine work. The remaining portion of her time was spent filling job orders, preparing shipments, and communicating with the main plant manager. She received her directions and instructions from both the plant manager and Townsend. According to Townsend's testimony, uncontradicted in this regard, Rector had no authority to hire, fire, or discipline employees and had never recommended such action. According to Townsend, Rector would have authority to discipline employees only after obtaining approval of the plant manager.

It is undisputed that Rector possessed a key to the cushion plant and was responsible for its opening and closing. That fact in addition to the fact that Rector remained the only person with any degree of authority in the cushion plant the vast majority of the time strongly suggests that Rector possesses supervisory authority.[16] Ostensible supervisory authority is not determinative and suspicion does not establish supervisory status. Accordingly, and recognizing the need "to be alert not to construe supervisory status too broadly because the employee who is deemed a supervisor is denied employee rights which the Act is intended to protect" (Westinghouse Electric Corp. v. NLRB, 424 F.2d 1151, 1158 (7th Cir. 1970), cert. denied 400 U.S. 831 (1970)), I conclude that a preponderance of evidence fails to show that Rector possessed the authority required under Section 2(11) of the Act to constitute her a supervisor.

3. The Union's majority status

Based on the foregoing, I conclude that as of September 17 the unit consisted of 40 employees, including Sutton and Rector, and of those 40 employees the Union had obtained valid authorization cards from 22 employees. The Union increased its majority status to 23 having obtained a valid authorization from employee Herbert Pinnix on October 19. It enjoyed majority status through October 29 when Respondent engaged in the unfair labor practice found above in the announcement of the wage increase. The Union's majority status was not subsequently affected by the departure of employee Michael Blevins, a card signer, on November 4 because the Union received an additional valid union designation from employee Martha Teastor on that date as found above. I conclude, therefore, that the Union enjoyed a majority status based upon valid authorization cards at all material times herein.

4. Conclusions with respect to a bargaining order

Having found on the basis of the cards that the Union represented a majority of Respondent's employees in an appropriate unit and also having found Respondent engaged in unfair labor practices in announcing and granting a wage increase to thwart the Union, there remains the issue of whether Respondent's conduct falls within one of the Gissel categories set forth above so as to warrant the entry of a remedial bargaining order. Here the Respondent's violations of the Act consisted solely of its having unlawfully announced and granted a general wage increase to its employees. Board and Court precedent appear to have gone both ways on similar cases. Thus, no bargaining order remedy was provided by the Board in Walgreen Co., 221 NLRB 1096 (1975), where the Board concluded that an unlawfully motivated wage increase, even when considered in conjunction with some other minor violations of the Act, had no irremedial effect on the election process. Its reasoning in this regard was briefly stated as follows:

> The wage increase, although found to have been unlawfully motivated, was not specifically tied to the organizing campaign by the Respondent. Similar raises had been granted some 4 months earlier at the Respondent's other stores and the increases did no more than bring the employees up to the prevailing rate. Indeed, the later point was relied on by the Respondent to explain the increases to the employees.

A different result was reached in other cases involving very similar situations. See, e.g., J. J. Newberry Co., 249 NLRB 991 (1980), enf. denied in pertinent part 645 F.2d 148 (2d Cir. 1981); Appletree Chevrolet, 251 NLRB 666 (1980), enf. denied in pertinent part 671 F.2d 838 (4th Cir. 1982); Honolulu Sporting Goods Co., 239 NLRB 1277 (1977); Skaggs Drug Centers, 197 NLRB 1240 (1972), enfd. 84 LRRM 2384 (9th Cir. 1973); Tower Records, 182 NLRB 382 (1970), enfd. 79 LRRM 2736 (9th Cir. 1972); C & G Electric, 180 NLRB 427 (1969); J. C. Penney Co., 160 NLRB 279 (1966), enfd. 384 F.2d 479 (10th Cir. 1967). See also Royal Aluminum Foundry, 208 NLRB 102 (1974); Soil Mechanics Corp., 200 NLRB 544 (1972).

In J. J. Newberry, supra at 993, the Board said "Respondent's grant of a substantial wage increase to all unit employees in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, is sufficient to render it unlikely that a fair election could be held." In Appletree Chevrolet, supra at 668, the Board stated that "the granting of benefits or announcement thereof is conduct which cannot be erased, for the benefits will remain in effect and serve as a constant reminder to employees of the Respondent's use of economic weapons to defeat the Union." And in Soil Mechanics Corp., supra, where a wage increase to only three of six union adherents was found to be sufficient to justify a Gissel bargaining order, the Board concluded at 545 that, "The impact of such increases on employees was as great as, if not greater than, a general wage increase and would have a lingering effect making the possibility of holding a fair and free election unlikely."

The Board's justification for granting a bargaining order in such cases was detailed in the administrative law judge's decision, adopted by the Board, in Tower Enterprises, supra at 387:

> It is a fair assumption that in most instances where employees designate a Union as their representative, a major consideration centers on the hope that such representative may be successful in negotiating wage increases. Certainly this appears to have been an important consideration in the instant case. A unilateral award of a wage increase by an employer > following a Union's demand for recognition results in giving the employees a significant element of what they were seeking through Union representation. It is difficult to conceive of conduct more likely to convince employees that with an important part of what they were seeking in hand union representation might no longer be needed. An employer may have the right to persuade the employees that representation is not in their best interest, but it does not have the right to threaten them or confer benefits on them which are designed to influence the employees against choosing a representative. When, as here, an employer does so, free choice in a subsequent election becomes a matter of speculation so long as the effects of the interference remain unremedied.

Further explication was set forth by the Board in Skaggs Drug Centers, supra at 1241:

> It is apparent that the wage increase was granted to thwart the employees' organizing initiative. It is also apparent that our traditional remedies, which do not include a requirement that the wage increase be rescinded, cannot irradicate the impact of Respondent's action. Such impact would continue to influence employee choice in a rerun election were one to be directed, for, whether or not the wage increase remained in effect, employees are not likely to miss the inference that "the source of benefits now conferred is also the source from which future benefits must flow and which may dry up if it is not obliged." NLRB v. Exchange Parts, 375 U.S. 405. We conclude therefore that by the grant of a substantial wage increase, Respondent has precluded the running of a fair rerun election and that the authorization cards signed by employees are a more reliable measure of their desire for union representation than would be the results of a rerun election. Accordingly, to effectuate those desires, and as a bargaining order is 'the only available effective remedy,' we shall order Respondent to bargain with the Union as the representative of the employees in the appropriate bargaining unit.

It appears that the Walgreen case, if not outside the mainstream of Board law in this area, must be regarded as a rather narrow exception to what appears to be the Board's general position that unlawfully motivated wage increases are sufficient in themselves to justify a bargaining order under Gissel. In any event, I believe the Walgreen case may be distinguished from the instant case, for there the wage increases simply brought employees up to the prevailing rate at the employer's other locations. In the case sub judice Respondent granted Statesville employees a greater single increase than that granted its Maryland employees which were represented by a union. There was no evidence that employees herein were told that the increases were simply to put them on a par with the Baltimore employees. The Statesville increases, having gone beyond what employees might have hoped to secure through selection of the Union serve to remove a substantial motivation for the selection of the Union. Secondly, while Respondent here in announcing the wage increase did not, as in the Walgreen case, specifically tie the wage increase to the Union, it was not necessary, for the wage increase followed by only 2 days the union leaflet which made much of the absence of an increase for Statesville employees. The employees were hardly likely to escape the connection, particularly since the Respondent did not disavow the obvious connection.

I deem the reasoning and conclusions of the Board in determining the appropriateness of a bargaining order in Tower Enterprises and Skaggs and that line of cases[17] fully applicable to the instant case. Accordingly, I conclude that here a fair rerun election cannot be held in the face of Respondent's grant of the general wage increase, an unfair labor practice which cannot be eradicated by traditional remedies. Under these circumstances, I conclude that the authorization cards executed by a majority of Respondent's employees remains the more reliable measure of their desires for representation and a bargaining order "the only available effective remedy." Consistent with the teachings of Trading Port, 219 NLRB 298 (1975), the bargaining order here recommended shall run from October 29, the Union having achieved its majority status prior to that time and the Respondent having embarked on its unfair labor practices on that date.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.
2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.
3. Respondent did not solicit grievances of its employees and imply that they would be remedied, threaten employees with loss of jobs or loss of existing benefits if they selected the Union, solicit employees to revoke union authorization cards, or interrogate employees concerning their union sympathies and, therefore, did not violate Section 8(a)(1) of the Act in these respects.
4. By announcing on October 29, 1982, and thereafter granting on November 1, 1982, to its employees a general wage increase in order to dissuade employees from supporting the Union, Respondent engaged in, and is engaging in, unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.
5. All production and maintenance employees, truckdrivers, and leadpersons employed by the Employer at its (Main) 2550 W. Front Street and (Cushion) Taylorsville Road, Statesville, North Carolina facilities; excluding all office clerical employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act, constitute a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.
6. At all times on and after October 29, 1982, the Union has represented a majority of the employees in the unit described in paragraph 5 above and has been the exclusive bargaining representative of the employees in said unit.

[17] As already indicated herein, the Board's orders in J. J. Newberry and Appletree Chevrolet were not enforced by the respective courts of appeals. However, I must respectfully observe that I am bound by Board precedent which the Board or the Supreme Court has not reversed. See Iowa Beef Packers, 144 NLRB 615 (1963); Novak Logging Co., 119 NLRB 1573 (1958); Insurance Agents' International Union, 119 NLRB 768 (1957).

7. By engaging in the unfair labor practices set forth in paragraph 4 above, Respondent undermined the Union's majority status and precluded the holding of a fair rerun election thereby making a bargaining order an appropriate remedy for such unfair labor practices.

8. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I recommend that it cease and desist therefrom, and that it take certain affirmative action which I find necessary to remedy and remove the effects of the unfair labor practice in which it engaged and to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Having found that by unlawfully granting a general wage increase to its employees in order to thwart their union activity Respondent engaged in conduct which interfered with the election held on November 10, 1982, I recommend that the election in Case 11–RC–5110 be set aside. Having further found that a bargaining order is warranted under the circumstances of this case, I further recommend that the petition in Case 11–RC–5110 be dismissed and that all proceedings held in connection therewith be vacated and set aside.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

On charges filed on 12 April and 22 December 1982[1] by General Teamsters Local Union No. 326 (the Union) and duly served on Standard Wine & Spirits Company et al. (the Respondents) the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, by the Regional Director for Region 4, issued a consolidated complaint and notice of hearing on 29 March 1983 alleging that the Respondents had engaged in and were engaging in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the National Labor Relations Act.

On 8 April 1983 the Respondents filed an answer admitting in part and denying in part the allegations of the complaint, submitting an affirmative defense, and requesting that the complaint be dismissed in its entirety. On 25 April 1983 the Regional Director for Region 4 issued an amendment to the consolidated complaint.

Thereafter on 23 May 1983 the Respondents filed with the Board a Motion for Summary Judgment and a brief in support thereof. The Respondents move the Board for summary judgment because the alleged unfair labor practices set forth in the complaint and notice of hearing, as amended, occurred more than 6 months prior to the filing of the relevant charge with the Board and the service of a copy thereof on the Respondents.

On 20 June 1983 counsel for the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board filed a memorandum in opposition to the Respondent's Motion for Summary Judgment. On 7 July 1983 the Union also filed a memorandum in opposition to the motion.

On 23 June 1983 the Board issued an order transferring the proceeding to the Board and a Notice to Show Cause why the Respondents' Motion for Summary Judgment should not be granted.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

On the entire record, the Board makes the following

Ruling on the Motion for Summary Judgment

On the issue of whether the amended charge is, in effect, a new charge time-barred by Section 10(b) of the Act, the Respondents contend that the initial charge filed 12 April was incapable of being amended on 22 December because all allegations set forth therein had been resolved on or before 5 June by either dismissal or private settlement. One portion of the initial charge alleges that the Union unlawfully refused to comply with its collective-bargaining obligation to pay the Union a 72-cent-per-hour pay increase. This allegation was the subject of a grievance filed by the Union. In a letter of 28 May, the Regional Director informed the parties that he was administratively deferring further proceedings on the issue of the 72-cent-pay increase in accordance with the Board's policy of deferring to the grievance and arbitration procedures of an existing bargaining agreement under Collyer Insulated Wire, 192 NLRB 837 (1971). The Regional Director simultaneously dismissed all other allegations in the 12 April charge as lacking in merit.

The Respondents aver that the parties resolved the issue of the 72-cent-per-hour pay increase when they agreed to a new collective-bargaining agreement on 5 June. Since on that date all other allegations in the original charge had been dismissed, the Respondents contend that there existed no viable allegation thereafter that could have formed the basis for an amendment to that charge. Thus, the Respondents argue, when on 22 December the Union filed a charge alleging, inter alia, that the Respondents unlawfully failed to meet a contractual obligation to pay employees for a Good Friday holiday on 9 April,[2] it was in fact filing a new charge time-barred by Section 10(b) of the Act.

The General Counsel in his statement in opposition to the Respondents' motion does not dispute the accuracy of the Respondents' averment that all allegations in the initial charge had been either resolved during contract negotiations or administratively dismissed as without merit by 5 June. To the contrary, the General Counsel concedes that "all allegations of the amended charge except that involving the $.72 per hour wage increase were dismissed before the amended charge was filed," and that the parties had arranged for informal settlement of the wage increase dispute before 22 December.[3] Counsel for the General Counsel argues solely that, as long as the portion of the charge concerning the wage increase was "still pending" on 22 December, there was a charge on file to which the amendment may relate back.

[1] All dates hereinafter refer to 1982 unless otherwise indicated.

[2] Other allegations in the 22 December charge were dismissed by the Regional Director by letter of 11 March 1983.

Under Federal Rules of Civil Procedure 56(b), the defending party may move for summary judgment, in whole or in part, at any time with or without supporting affidavits. Federal Rules of Civil Procedure 56(e) also provides in pertinent part that:

> When a motion for summary judgment is made and supported as provided in this rule, an adverse party may not rest on the mere allegations or denials of his pleadings, but his response, by affidavits, or as otherwise provided in this rule, must set forth specific facts showing that there is a genuine issue for trial. If he does not so respond, summary judgment, if appropriate, shall be entered against him.

In their Motion for Summary Judgment, the Respondents set forth facts concerning settlement with regard to the 72-cent-per-hour wage increase, the 8-month delay before dismissal of the wage increase portion of the charge, and the dismissal of all other allegations contained in the original charge. These facts form the basis of the Respondents' affirmative defense. The General Counsel, having failed to controvert these facts, has not met the burden imposed on an adverse party by the aforementioned rule.[4] In these circumstances, we are satisfied that there are no material facts in dispute concerning the timeliness under Section 10(b) of the Union's 22 December charge that would require a hearing before an administrative law judge.

Further, we agree with the Respondents that on 22 December when the Union filed its second charge, there was no longer —or should no longer have been—a viable charge capable of being amended. Although the Union did not withdraw the initial charge and reiterated the wage increase allegation in the 22 December charge, the Regional Director ultimately dismissed that allegation on 11 March 1983 on the ground that the Respondents had substantially remedied any unfair labor practice conduct in June 1982 by paying the 72-cent increase to the employees, and the General Counsel has neither alleged nor offered evidence that this delay in disposition was occasioned by the Regional Director's examination of some issue connected with the charge. However, even though the Regional Director had learned of the settlement disposing of the wage increase dispute in early October, he did not dismiss the charge for another 5 months. Certainly, the original charge should have been either dismissed or withdrawn well before the Union sought to amend it. Thus, it should not have existed on 22 December to be used as the linchpin for issuing a complaint that was otherwise barred by Section 10(b).[5]

Our dissenting colleague argues that our conclusion concerning the disposition of the initial charge circumscribes the General Counsel's discretion in determining how to proceed with pending unfair labor pratice charges. It does not. In his 11 March 1983 letter, appended to the Respondents' motion, the Regional Director based his refusal to issue a complaint as to the 72-cent-per-hour wage increase allegation on his determination that "the Employer subsequently paid that increase due under the expired contract, thereby substantially remedying any unfair labor practice conduct." Thus, the General Counsel's decision not to proceed with the charge turned ultimately on one undisputed fact: that the Respondents agreed in June 1982 to pay the 72-cent increase retroactively. Once the Regional Director was notified of this agreement and had the opportunity to verify its existence, all facts relevant to the ultimate disposition of this charge were established, and the General Counsel does not contend that the charge was the subject of further investigative proceedings. Under these circumstances, given the Regional Director's determina-

[3] Our dissenting colleague contends that we have misstated the position of the Generla Counsel in this regard. The dissent considers as a rebuttal to the facts stated in the Respondents' pleadings the General Counsel's statement that the Union "may not have felt" that the pay increase issue was resolved and that the Union may have been at this point still "interested in pursuing the charge." Such interest is demonstrated, the dissent argues, by the Union's reiteration of its allegation concerning the pay increase in the amended charge—a practice that the Regional Offices routinely advise charging parties to perform under Sec. 10064.1 of the NLRB Casehandling Manual (Part One) whenever amending an outstanding charge. To demonstrate the inadequacy of the General Counsel's pleadings as an effective rebuttal, we need only cite to the very passage quoted in the dissent, U.S. Contractors v. NLRB, 697 F.2d 695 (5th Cir. 1983), addressing the function of the Board as a forum for the adjudication of public, as opposed to private, rights. What is germane, in terms of effectuating the Act's policies, is not whether the Union demonstrated a continued interest in pursuing the pending charge but whether the unfair labor practice complained of had been substantially remedied. The General Counsel's dismissal letter of 11 March 1983 demonstrates that the misconduct alleged in the pay increase charge had been so remedied.

[4] See Western Electric Co., 198 NLRB 623 (1972); Williams v. Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co., 303 F.2d 323 (6th Cir. 1962).

[5] Having concluded that the original charge could not properly have been amended at the time the second charge was filed, we find it unnecessary to consider the Respondents' alternative argument that the charges are insufficiently similar to permit the latter to relate back to the former.

tion to dismiss the charge, we perceive no basis for concluding that a requirement that he do so promptly interferes with the General Counsel's discretion under Section 3(d) of the Act.[6]

We therefore conclude that further proceedings with respect to the Respondents' alleged failure to pay employees holiday pay for Good Friday, 9 April 1982, are precluded by the provisions of Section 10(b) of the Act. Therefore, we grant the Respondents' Motion for Summary Judgment.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board grants the Respondents' Motion for Summary Judgment and orders that the complaint is dismissed in its entirety.

MEMBER ZIMMERMAN, dissenting.

Contrary to my colleagues, I would deny the Respondents' Motion for Summary Judgment. Their determination that the General Counsel, in the person of the Regional Director, was bound by what they refer to as the "settlement" of the dispute underlying the initial charge in this case contravenes longstanding principles of law which dictate the opposite result from that which they have reached.

Section 3(d) of the Act vests in the General Counsel exclusive authority to prosecute unfair labor practices. This authority is not subject to review by the Board or by the courts.[1] More specifically, Section 3(d) precludes Board or court review of the General Counsel's decisions about the disposition of unfair labor practice charges.[2] Thus, Section 3(d) of the Act plainly gives the General Counsel broad discretion in determining whether or not to dismiss a charge. Once, as in the instant case, a charge has been timely filed, the General Counsel has virtually unlimited discretion to proceed on such a charge as he sees fit,[3] and in the absence of a showing of abuse of that discretion, the Board will not interfere with the General Counsel's exercise of it. Here, there is no showing of any abuse of discretion on the part of the General Counsel in not dismissing the charge.

The General Counsel was not required or obligated to dismiss the outstanding unfair labor practice charges as to the 72-cent wage increase, when he was notified by the Respondents in October 1982 that they and the Union had agreed to a contract the previous June, under the terms of which the disputed wage increase would be paid retroactively to April. Simply stated, the General Counsel will only be bound to settlement agreements to which he is a party.[4] Thus:

> The Board . . . acts in the public interest by enforcing public, not private rights, and "parties cannot by contractual agreement divest the Board's function to operate in the public interest." . . . While private parties might conclude that it is in their best interest to settle a charge, the Regional Director could conclude that the public interest would be better served by a formal resolution of the dispute and thus [the Regional Director] would be under a public duty not to approve the settlement.[5]

Indeed, here there was no request from the Union to withdraw the charge. Consequently, the agreement reached by the parties as to the payment of the 72-cent wage increase in no way curtailed the General Counsel's discretionary authority over the disposition of the outstanding unfair labor practice charges. Accordingly, I conclude that my colleagues have erred in finding that the General Counsel was required to dismiss the unfair labor practice charges when advised by the Respondents of the terms of their new contract with the Union.

Finally, I note that my colleagues misstate the General Counsel's position in this case when they assert that the General Counsel does not dispute the accuracy of the Respondents' averment that all allegations in the initial charge had been either resolved during contract negotiations or administratively dismissed. To the contrary, the General Counsel contends:

> The fact that the charge [re the 72-cent increase] was ultimately dismissed rather than withdrawn suggests that the Union may not have felt the question of the $.72 increase was resolved and was still interested in pursuing this aspect of its charge at the time it filed its amendment [re holiday pay]. The fact that the amended charge reiterated the [72-cent] wage increase allegation strengthens this conclusion.

Thus, far from not disputing the accuracy of the Respondents' averment, the General Counsel directly attacks it.

[6] We likewise reject the dissent's expansive reading of this ruling as obligating the General Counsel to defer to the terms of a private settlement agreement. The determination that the June 1982 agreement "substantially remedied" the charge over the 72-cent pay increase was made by the Regional Director in the course of his investigation. Had the Regional Director not made such a determination, we would not, of course, require him to do so on the sole basis of a party's contention that a private settlement had taken place.

[5] Ibid.

Also, contrary to my colleagues' expansive reading of the Respondents' motion, there is no "set [ting] forth facts concerning settlement with regard to the $.72 per hour wage increase." In their brief in support of their Motion for Summary Judgment, the Respondents assert that the parties "resolved" the 72-cent-per-hour issue when they agreed to a new collective-bargaining agreement incorporating this increase and the Union withdrew its related grievance. The Respondents attach to their brief a copy of a 4 October 1982 letter from the Respondents' attorney to the Regional Office, stating that:

> In settlement of the current labor agreement, the parties resolved this claim and the union withdrew its grievance for the monies. Accordingly . . . that part of the dispute was settled by the parties. Thus, there is no need for further processing of this matter by your office and the case should be marked closed.

My colleagues assert that once the Regional Director received this letter from the Respondents and had an opportunity to verify its contents, all facts relevant to the ultimate disposition of the charge were established. I do not share my colleagues' post facto assessment on this subject, and I particularly do not substitute it for the discretionary assessment apparently made by the Regional Director, at the time, that the charge in question should not yet be dismissed.

However, on 20 December the Union filed an amended charge, specifically reiterating the alleged unlawful failure to pay the 72-cent-per-hour wage increase, and alleging for the first time that the Respondents unlawfully failed to pay Good Friday holiday pay. It was not until 11 March 1983, based on his investigation of the amended charge, that the Regional Director dismissed the allegation of unlawful failure to pay the 72-cent-per-hour wage increase. In any event, less than 3 months after the Respondents informed the Regional Director that the issue involving the wage increase had been resolved, the Union reiterated its allegation of unlawful activity in this regard. Thus, even viewing these facts in the light most favorable to the Respondents, I cannot agree with my colleagues that the pleadings themselves establish that the General Counsel abused his discretion. Accordingly, I find that this matter is not suitable for summary judgment.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND DENNIS

On 10 December 1982 Administrative Law Judge James F. Morton issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed a brief in support of the judge's decision.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

The judge found that the University violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act by granting merit wage increases to two employees without bargaining with the union certified as the employees' collective-bargaining representative. It is undisputed that the University granted wage increases to employees Jean MacNab and David Fier without bargaining with the Union. The University contends, however, that those increases were authorized by the collective-bargaining agreement. We find merit in that contention.

The 1980–1981 collective-bargaining agreement did not establish a single rate of pay for office clerical employees in job grades 4 though 10 and legal secretaries III through I. Rather, it establishes salary ranges, with minimum and maximum rates for those job grades. The wage increases granted MacNab and Fier came within the salary ranges specified for their jobs in the 1980–1981 collective-bargaining agreement.[1]

The University contends that it was authorized under the agreement not only to hire employees at any wage rate within the contractual salary ranges, but also to grant employees wage increases within those ranges. On its face, the agreement appears to authorize the payment of any wage rate within the contractual minimum and maximum rates for the particular job grade. The General Counsel seeks to explain the contractual salary ranges on the ground that the University was paying employees in the same job grade widely disparate wage rates when the Union was certified in December 1978, so that it would have required a major reorganization of the clerical grade structure to make the wage rates within each job grade uniform. Accepting that as one of the reasons for having salary ranges in the agreement, we nonetheless conclude that the Union made a significant concession when it agreed, without any restriction, that the University might pay employees in the same job grade different rates of pay within the contractual salary ranges.[2]

The General Counsel appears to contend that the contractual salary ranges authorize the University merely to maintain the wage disparities that existed when the Union was certified and give the University no discretion to increase an employee's wages within the salary range specified for the employee's job. But the General Counsel concedes that the management rights clause of the collective-bargaining agreement authorizes the University to promote employees unilaterally. Thus, had the University raised the wages of employees MacNab and Fier by promoting them to higher job grades, without bargaining with the Union, it is conceded that there would have been no violation of the Act. The General Counsel urges that the collective-bargaining agreement makes a distinction between promotions, which the University is admittedly authorized to make without bargaining with the Union, and within-grade wage increases, as to which bargaining is allegedly required before each increase, even though the increase comes within the salary range expressly authorized in the agreement.

Other provisions of the collective-bargaining agreement belie that contention. The 1980–1981 agreement provides that when a Code 106 (office clerical) employee bumps a junior employee in a job more than one grade below the employee's

[1] MacNab's increase (from $261.26 to $275) was within the $221 minimum and $306 maximum listed for her grade 9 job in the 1980–1981 contract. Fier's increase (from $278.36 to $300) was within the $233 minimum and $323 maximum listed in the 1980–1981 contract for his grade 10 job. Although MacNab's increase was granted in late August 1980, 2 months before the expiration of the 1979–1980 contract, and exceeded by $2 the $273 maximum listed for her job in that contract, there appears to have been a mid-term renegotiation and increase of the contractual wage rates in early 1980. In any event, the General Counsel does not allege that MacNab's increase exceeded the contractual maximum for her job and does not attempt to predicate the alleged violation in this case on any alleged deviation from the contractual wage scale. By the time Fier was granted his increase in January 1981 and the dispute over the wage increases arose between the parties, the 1980–1981 contract was in effect and, as noted, MacNab's and Fier's increases were well within the contractual salary ranges listed in that contract.

[2] Salary ranges were established in the initial collective-bargaining agreement (1979–1980) and were retained in subsequent agreements (1980–1981 and 1981–1982), with increased minimum and maximum rates for the various job grades in each subsequent agreement. As discussed, infra, new job grades were established in the 1980–1981 agreement and salary ranges, with minimum and maximum rates, were established for those jobs, as well.

own, the employee shall be paid the rate of the bumped employee or the employee's own rate, whichever is less, or "at the discretion of the Employer, receive a rate not to exceed the maximum for the grade" (art. XI, sec. 5, emphasis added). The agreement also sets limits on the minimum rate that may be paid a Code 104 (laboratory/technical) employee bumping into a lower rated job and then provides, "At the discretion of the Employer, the employee may be paid a higher rate not to exceed the maximum earned by any employee working in that job title" (ibid., emphasis added). Similarly, the agreement provides that, under certain conditions, when employees are required to perform a higher rated unit job on a temporary assignment of 20 work days or more, they "shall be paid no less than the minimum rate for the higher rated job or an additional $5.00 per week, whichever is greater" (art. VII, sec. 3, emphasis added). Unless the words "no less than" are mere surplusage, they recognize the University's authority to pay a higher rate for the job up to the contractual maximum.

Moreover, after the University in late 1980 unilaterally upgraded the secretaries in its legal counsel's office, giving them new job titles and wage increases, the parties agreed in the 1980–1981 agreement not only to establish new job grades for Legal Secretaries III–I, but also to establish new salary ranges, with minimum and maximum rates for each of the new grades.[3] Since those grades had not existed before the Union's certification, the new salary ranges cannot be explained as merely preserving precertification wage disparities for employees in established job grades. In our view, the evident explanation is that just as the agreement admittedly authorizes the University unilaterally to promote employees to higher job grades within the contractual structure, so it authorizes the University to grant within-grade increases within the contractually established salary ranges for each particular job grade. See Markle Mfg. Co., 239 NLRB 1353, 1363 (1979). Accordingly, we conclude that the wage provisions of the collective-bargaining agreemeent, construed as a whole, clearly authorize the University to pay higher wages for each job up to the contractual maximum, without bargaining with the Union during the term of the agreement.

Nor do we find persuasive the General Counsel's reliance on the bargaining history of the parties to support the alleged violation in this case. The General Counsel relies on a rejected wage proposal of the University for the 1980–1981 contract. That proposal provided for a 7-percent increase in the base rate for all employees and a 7-percent increase in the minimum and maximum rates for all groups effective 25 August 1980. In addition, the University's proposal provided:

> The Employer will grant merit increases, based on its sole discretion, to employees covered by this Agreement on October 6, 1980 in an amount, to be agreed on, equal to a percent of the base payroll for covered employees on August 24, 1980.

Because the Union successfully resisted this proposal and the parties instead agreed on a flat 10-percent annual increase for all employees, the General Counsel argues that the parties recognized that the University was not contractually authorized to grant any within-grade wage increases without first bargaining with the Union.[4]

But, as the University points out, prior to the Union's certification, all wage increases were within the University's sole discretion and there were two kinds of merit increase. First, the University granted an annual wage increase, consisting of a percentage increase for the employees of each administrative unit of the University; that increase was to be allocated by the administrative unit among its employees on the basis of merit. Second, the University granted additional individual merit increases to about 20–25 employees during the course of the year.[5] We find persuasive the University's argument that its unsuccessful wage proposals concerned the annual wage increase rather than the individual wage increases granted throughout the year. Although the University sought unsuccessful-

[3] At the same time, it was agreed that if the University instituted a new job grade, outside the contractual structure, "the job rate shall be negotiated with the Association" (art. VII, sec. 2). In the absence of agreement, the dispute was to be resolved under the contractual grievance and arbitration procedure. Ibid.

[4] In negotiations for the 1981–1982 contract, the University again proposed that the annual wage increase should consist of a percentage increase for all employees and an additional percentage increase to be distributed to unit employees in the form of merit increases as the University saw fit. The Union again rejected the proposal to allocate part of the annual increase to merit raises and the parties instead agreed on a 10-percent across-the-board annual wage increase retroactive to 31 August 1981.

[5] The University's director of labor relations testified that the University continued to grant these individual increases after the Union's certification. But the Union's chief steward denied knowledge of any postcertification individual wage increases granted without a contemporaneous promotion, except for the increases at issue here and a $10 increase granted to the Union's president, Jack Kraft. The record shows that Kraft received only a $5 increase when he was promoted to a grade 7 mail sorter in 1978 and that he received an additional $10 increase in 1980, ih circumstances that need not be explored here. Because we find that the collective-bargaining agreement authorized wage increases within the contractual salary ranges, we find it unnecessary to pass on whether the Union could be deemed to have acquiesced in the University's practice of granting individual wage increases absent the agreement. We note, however, that the record does not support the judge's finding that the University's individual wage increases were limited to employees outside the bargaining unit or that they were granted only on infrequent occasions during the course of the year.

ly to retain some of the merit increase characteristics of the annual wage increases, it did not agree to cease the individual wage increases granted during the year in addition to the annual increase. On the contrary, as discussed above, we find that the contractual salary ranges agreed to by the Union authorized the University to continue to grant individual wage increases up to the maximum rates prescribed in the contract. Accordingly, we find unpersuasive the Union's reliance on the history of rejected bargaining proposals to vary the terms of the contract.

In sum, we conclude that the University did not violate Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by granting to employees Jean MacNab and David Fier the wage increases alleged as violations in the complaint because those increases were authorized by the collective-bargaining agreement between the University and the Union.[6] We shall therefore dismiss the complaint in its entirety.

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed.

MEMBER ZIMMERMAN, dissenting.

I find, for the reasons given by the administrative law judge, that the Respondent unlawfully granted merit increases to two employees represented by the Union without collectively bargaining with the Union over such increases.

As the judge observed, the Board, historically, has not lightly inferred a waiver by contract of a labor organization's statutory right to be consulted about changes in wage rates, hours of employment, or other terms and conditions of employment for unit employees. He correctly found that the facts here do not support a finding that the Union waived its bargaining rights concerning the granting of merit increases. Thus, in two successive contracts the union successfully opposed the Respondent's proposal that the Union permit it to grant merit increases at the Respondent's sole discretion. To construe the broad management rights clause of the current contract as a waiver of the right to bargain over merit increases is to improperly ignore a bargaining history which addressed the specific point at issue.

Nor do the salary ranges established by the contract within each job grade prove a waiver of the Union's bargaining rights concerning merit increases. As the judge found, those ranges reflect wage disparities that existed when the Union was certified. The clause permits the Respondent to maintain the disparity; it does not permit the Respondent to increase unilaterally the wages of a given employee within the salary range of his job grade.[1]

I agree with Judge Morton, and find my colleagues' efforts to bolster the Respondent's case in the face of adverse facts unpersuasive.

[6] On the view we take of this case, it is unnecessary to reach the additional arguments raised by the University concerning the scope of the management rights clause, the zipper clause, and the grievance and arbitration clauses of the collective-bargaining agreement. In addition, we note that no issue is present concerning deferral to contractual grievance and arbitration procedures, as no party has urged that the matter at issue here could be resolved under those procedures.

[1] That other contract provisions give the Respondent discretion to select a rate within the salary range for employees who bump to lower grades is not evidence to the contrary. Those provisions involve a change in job grade and not merely an increase within the grade. Moreover, it could well be argued that failure expressly to allow discretion in the clause setting forth salary ranges, while so allowing discretion in clause regarding bumping rights, is evidence that the parties did not intend to grant the Respondent the right to give merit increases unilaterally.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JAMES F. MORTON, Administrative Law Judge. On April 3, 1981, United Staff Association of NYU, Local 3882, New York State UNited Teachers, AFT, AFL–CIO (Union) filed the unfair labor practice charge in this case against New York University (Respondent). On November 24, 1981, the Regional Director of the New York field office of the National Labor Relations Board (Board), on behalf of the General Counsel of the Board, issued a complaint against Respondent which alleged that Respondent had violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act as amended (the Act) by having granted merit wage increases to employees represented by the Union without having obtained the consent of the Union. Respondent, in its answer to the complaint, denied that allegation and has asserted that the Union in fact had consented to the granting of those merit increases.

I heard the case in New York City on September 13, 1982.

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses and on careful consideration of the briefs filed by counsel for the General Counsel and by counsel for Respondent, I make the following

FINDINGS

I. THE STATUS OF RESPONDENT AND THE UNION

Based on the pleadings, I find that Respondent is an employer within the meaning of Section 2(2) of the Act and that it is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act and that the Union is a labor organization as defined in Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

Respondent is a private university in New York City. The Union is the certified exclusive collective-bargaining representative of aproximately 1500 office clerical employees, laboratory/technical employees, and "special" employees employed by Respondent.

In the years before the Union was so certified, Respondent had conducted annual wage reviews of its employees and had been in the practice of granting them a general wage increase once a year. In addition, it gave some of its employees, about the same time of the annual general increase, merit increases, over and above the general wage increase. It appears that Respondent, on infrequent occasions, had also given other merit increases to individuals at other times during the year.

After the Union was certified, the parties discussed the matter of merit increases, as discussed in detail below.

The events giving rise to the instant case took place in 1980 and early 1981. The Union learned of them in early 1981.

B. The Merit Increases in this Case

In early 1981, the Union's representatives had heard from various employees that a unit employee had been given a $22 weekly increase even though his duties had been unchanged. They broached this matter with Respondent's director of personnel and when she confirmed the report, the Union protested that Respondent had given that employee a merit increase without bargaining with it. The Union offered to settle the matter either by Respondent's giving the unit employee a bona fide promotion or by agreeing to a new salary grade for the job then being done by that employee. Respondent's director of personnel then informed the Union that Respondent had, some 5 months previously, given another unit employee a raise (in that case, of $14 a week) and a new job title, even though that employee's job duties were not changed.

Respondent's director of personnel then informed the Union that she had not thought that the Union would object to the wage increases given those two employees but that, as it did object, Respondent would have to rescind those wage increases. The Union's executive board met about a week later to consider what it should do. It decided to insist that Respondent rescind the two merit increases and, on February 24, 1981, the Union wrote Respondent to advise it that Respondent cannot grant a salary increase without a corresponding promotion or without reaching agreement with the Union on a new salary group. On March 18, 1981, Respondent wrote the Union to state that, after reviewing the matter, Respondent was of the view that there was no violation of the contract by its having granted merit increases to the two unit employees involved in this case. At the hearing, the General Counsel advised that the Union is not now seeking to have those merit increases rescinded.

C. Other Wage Increases During the Term of the Contract

In the summer of 1980, Respondent changed the job title of the secretaries in its legal department to legal secretary and gave them salary increases. It did this to remain competitive. The Union objected to the change as it was done without notice to it or its consent. That objection was resolved by the addition then of a new clause to the contract that, if Respondent institutes a job grade not listed in the contract, the job rate shall be negotiated with the Union and, if not agreed to, the job rate shall be resolved by arbitration.

There was one time that Respondent increased a unit employee's salary during the term of a contract and without a contemporaneous change in duties.[1] In particular, the Union's president was promoted in October 1978 to mail sorter, grade 7, but was not given a promised wage increase then. He protested and finally wrote to Respondent's director of labor relations in February 1980. He received the $10 increase on February 11, 1980.

D. Negotiations on the Issue of Merit Increases and Relevant Contract Clauses

Respondent contends that the merit increases it granted to the two employees involved in this case were authorized by the provisions of its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union. The General Counsel asserts that they were not.

As noted earlier, prior to the Union's certification, Respondent conducted annual salary reviews of its employees and had been in the practice of granting some merit increases each year in conjunction with a general wage increase and, on infrequent occasions during the ensuing year, it granted a few other merit increases.

The Union was certified on December 26, 1978. Since November 1979 it has had successive contracts with Respondent. In the summer of 1980 the parties met to discuss the salary scales of the unit employees. Respondent offered at that time to increase the salaries of all unit employees by 7 percent and that the Union permit Respondent to grant additional increases, on October 6, 1980, based on Respondent's sole discretion. According to Respondent's proposal respecting those merit increases, the total amount to be granted as merit increases would be "an amount to be agreed on, equal to a percent of the base payroll." The Union rejected that proposal and Respondent then withdrew its entire offer. Negotiations continued. The parties then agreed to a 10-percent raise "across the board."

As related earlier, the Union learned in January 1981 that Respondent had given two employees merit increases and that led to this very case.

In the negotiations for the 1981–1982 contract, Respondent offered a general wage increase and it further proposed that a sum equal to a 2-percent across-the-board wage increase be distributed by it to unit employees in the form of merit increases as it saw fit. The Union "very firmly" rejected the merit increase proposal. On December 8, 1981, the parties reached agrement on the basis of a 10-percent general wage increase, retroactive to August 31, 1981.

[1] Respondent's director of labor relations testified that each year from 1977 to 1981 (when Respondent discontinued giving merit increases upon the filing of the unfair labor practice charge in this case), Respondent granted about 25 merit increases. It appears that those increases were given to employees who were not included in the Union's bargaining unit and were given without notice to, or the knowledge of, the Union.

Respondent relies on various provisions of the contract to support its contention that the Union had agreed that Respondent could grant the merit increases involved in this case.

The 1980–1981 and the 1981–1982 contracts both contained the following clauses which had been put into those contracts by Respondent's associate general counsel who drafted the final documents. There was no evidence offered to indicate that the parties discussed those clauses during the negotiations. Both of those contracts have been signed by the parties. The clauses read:

ARTICLE XXVIII—MANAGEMENT RIGHTS

> The operation and mangement of the University and the supervision and direction of the employees are and shall continue to be solely and exclusively the functions and prerogatives of the [Respondent]. All of the rights, functions and prerogatives of management which are not expressly and specifically restricted or modified by one or more explicit provisions of this Agreement are reserved and retained exclusively by the [Respondent] and shall not be deemed or construed to have been modified, diminished or impaired by any past practice or course of conduct or otherwise than by express provision of this Agreement. Without in any manner limiting or affecting the generality of the foregoing, the right and power to select and hire all employees, to suspend, discipline, demote or discharge them for cause, to promote them to supervisory or other positions, to assign, transfer, supervise, and direct all working forces, to maintain discipline and efficiency among them to determine the facilities, methods, means, equipment, procedures, and personnel required to conduct activities, to promulgate rules and regulations and to exercise the other customary functions of the [Respondent] for the carrying on of its business and operations, are recognized as vested exclusively in the [Respondent].

ARTICLE XXIX—ENTIRE AGREEMENT

> The [Respondent] and the [Union] agree that all matters desired by either party have been presented, discussed and incorporated herein or rejected. Accordingly, it is agreed that for the life of this Agreement each party voluntarily and unqualifiedly waives the right and each agrees that the other shall not be obligated to bargain collectively with respect to any subject or matter, whether or not referred to in this Agreement. This Agreement constitutes the complete understanding of the parties with respect to all issues between them, supersedes all oral or written agreements heretofore made, and may only be modified by a written agreement signed by the parties.

There is one other section of the contract which is relevant to the issue to be decided in this case. Section 1 of article VII sets out a minimum salary and a maximum salary for each grade. Thus, grade 4 has a $178 minimum and a $224 maximum. The respective ranges were put into the initial contract to take into account that, at the time the Union was certified, all the employees in each grade were not receiving the same wage rate. In fact, there were considerable differences. Respondent's director of labor relations testified that he also viewed the ranges as a basis for Respondent to grant merit increases up to the respective maximums. It appears clear from the overall record that the Union had never expressly assented to that view.

E. Analysis

The General Counsel asserts that Respondent granted two merit increases to unit employees without notice to and bargaining with the Union. Respondent contends that the Union, by having assented to the broad management-rights clause set out in article XXVIII and other clauses discussed above, had agreed that Respondent could grant such increases. The Board has long held that it will not lightly infer a waiver by contract of a labor organization's statutory right to be consulted about changes in wage rates, hours of employment, or other terms or conditions of employment of the unit employees.[2] Where the history and nature of the parties' negotiations demonstrate that a labor organization, in agreeing to the terms of a broad management-rights clause, understood that it granted an employer significantly expanded authority to implement changes in employment terms, the Board will find that, by those negotiations, a labor organization will have understood that acceptance of the management-rights clause "amounted to a broad waiver of its right to be notified of and to bargain about such changes."[3]

The facts in the instant case do not support Respondent's contention that the Union waived its bargaining rights as to the granting of merit increases to unit employees. To hold otherwise would be tantamount to finding that a party, by signing a contract drafted by the other side which contained broad waiver language, had thereby agreed to a proposal it had vigorously and successfully opposed.[4]

Respondent urges that the zipper clause, i.e., article XXIX, precludes the Union from seeking to reopen negotiations on the subject of merit increases. That argument overlooks the fact that the Union was but seeking to give Respondent a way to redress the unilateral change. To construe the zipper clause so as to exonerate Respondent, I would first be required to find that Respondent and the Union had agreed that Respondent could grant merit increases as it saw fit. That is simply not so.

Respondent further points to the fact that the salaries of the unit employees are set in a range from minimum to maximum. It then suggests that it was free to pay the unit employees any salary within their respective ranges and that it could do this by granting merit increases.[5] There is no evidence to support that view. Rather, the evidence indicates that the respective ranges were set up initially to reflect the status of the applicable salary scale as of the time the Union was certified.

Based on the entire record in this case, I find that Respondent unilaterally granted merit increases to two unit employees without having bargained collectively with the Union, and Respondent thereby violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.[6]

[5] Markle Mfg. Co., 239 NLRB 1353, 1363 (1979), relied on by Respondent, is factually distinguishable from the instant case. More to the point is the discussion at fn. 3 in GTE Automatic Electric, 261 NLRB 1491 (1982), and the discussion of Pepsi-Cola, supra.

[6] The General Counsel's brief notes that, if Respondent were to contend that the issue presented in this case can best be resolved via arbitration, Respondent would thereby be conceding that the Union did not clearly and unequivocally waive its right to bargain as to merit increases. Respondent's brief raises no deferral claim. Respondent addresses its argument toward the basic issue in this case—whether the contractual language in overall context establishes that the parties had agreed that Respondent could at its discretion grant merit raises at various times during the contract term. Respondent does assert that the Union is seeking via this case to secure something that it could not obtain in contract negotiations. That argument is fallacious as it assumes as a fact the very issue in controversy, i.e., whether the parties had agreed that the Respondent could grant merit increases unilaterally.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization as defined in Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. The following unit of employees is appropriate for purposes of collective bargaining:

> All full-time and regular part-time office clerical employees in Code 106, and all full-time and regular part-time laboratory/technical employees in Code 104 employed by Respondent, including those employees receiving tuition remission, and all "special" employees who have been employed for at least twelve (12) consecutive weeks and have worked an average of 20 hours or more per week, but excluding all employees in Codes other than 104 and 106, Medical Center employees, full-time students, work-study students, students receiving financial aid through New York University, casual employees, confidential employees, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the National Labor Relations Act.

4. The Union is the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the unit described in paragraph 3.

5. Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by having granted merit wage increases to unit employees without having bargained collectively thereon with the Union

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

On 30 March 1984 Administrative Law Judge Benjamin Schlesinger issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions as modified and to adopt the recommended Order.

Respondent University is a private, nonprofit institution established in 1961 with the approval of the Order of the Dominican Fathers of Puerto Rico, Inc. The University contends that it is a religious institution exempt from the coverage of the National Labor Relations Act under NLRB v. Catholic Bishop of Chicago, 440 U.S. 490 (1979). In rejecting this contention we agree with with the judge's findings that the University is not owned, financed, or controlled by the Dominican Order[2] or by the Roman Catholic Church, and that the University's academic mission is secular.

We find, however, that based on the religious training conducted at the University's Center for Dominican Studies in the Caribbean (CEDOC),[3] the University is not obligated to bargain with the Union concerning any terms and conditions of employment relating to the CEDOC program. CEDOC began operation in 1980. It was originally envisaged as a 4-year, postgraduate program which would provide seminarians the academic training required for ordination to the priesthood in the Roman Catholic Church. Dominican Order priests designed the program, prepared the curriculum and instructed the courses.

The University was unable, however, to obtain accreditation of the original program. As a result, in 1982 the University restructured the program to provide 2 years of study leading to a Master of Divinity in Theology degree. The program is open to both lay persons and seminarians. Furthermore, the University's application for accreditation of the program[4] explicitly states that one of the program's objectives is the teaching of lay persons who wish to acquire a thorough knowledge of the science of theology.

The program's primary objective, however, remains the training of priests for the ministry even though it concededly does not provide the entire prescribed academic training for entry into the priesthood.[5] The program is also intended to instruct those who desire to teach in Roman Catholic educational institutions. The CEDOC curriculum remains primarily religious in content. Approximately two-thirds of the required courses are in the areas of sacred scripture, systematic theology, moral theology, and Ecclesiastical History. Furthermore, all curricula must be taught "within the limits of the Roman Catholic tradition."[6]

In light of the primary purposes of CEDOC and its regulation of program curriculum pursuant to the tenets of the Catholic religion we will not impose an obligation on the University to bargain collectively concerning the instructors' terms and conditions of employment within CEDOC.[7] This exclusion of CEDOC from the University's bargaining obligation does not affect our finding that the University's refusal to bargain with the Union as the certified bargaining representative violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act. The CEDOC program was not referred to in the representation proceeding, and has not involved more than a few university instructors. Furthermore, the Union's general bargaining request did not refer to CEDOC and the University's refusal to bargain was not based on any stated concerns specifically regarding CEDOC. We therefore find that the University was not justified in its refusal to bargain.

[1] In adopting the judge's finding that the Respondent's faculty coordinators are not supervisors within the meaning of the Act, Member Hunter places no reliance on Adelphi University, 195 NLRB 639 (1972).

[2] Because the Order of the Dominican Fathers of Puerto Rico does not control the University, we shall not exclude members of the Order from the bargaining unit on the basis that they have a special relationship with their employer. See D'Youville College, 225 NLRB 792 (1976). Cf. Mercy Hospital, 266 NLRB 944 (1983), enfd. 730 F.2d 1175 (2d Cir. 1984).

[4] The Middle States Association of Colleges and Secondary Schools accredited the program on 27 December 1982 based on the University's application.

[5] Francisco Domingo, director of the University's humanities department, testified that a minimum of 4 years of graduate-level study is required prior to being ordained as a Roman Catholic priest.

[6] In regard to the student makeup of the program, of the 24 students enrolled during the 1982–83 academic year only 5 were laypersons. It should also be noted that the program is financially assisted by the Dominican Order of Puerto Rico which has made $25,000 in scholarships available to students who attend CEDOC.

[7] The record indicates that most university instructors who have assignments relating to CEDOC also have duties unrelated to CEDOC. With respect to these individuals, the University's bargaining obligation shall not include any aspect to their assignments relating to CEDOC.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Universidad Central de Bayamon, Puerto Rico, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

DECISION

PRELIMINARY STATEMENT

BENJAMIN SCHLESINGER, Administrative Law Judge. Respondent Universidad Central de Bayamon (Respondent or University) is and has been at all time material herein a nonprofit corporation, duly organized under and existing by virtue of the laws of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, and has engaged in the operation of a postsecondary educational institution in Bayamon, Puerto Rico. At representation hearings held in November 1979 in Case 24-RC-6383, Respondent contended that it was not subject to the Board's jurisdiction for two reasons: (1) that under the decision of the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit in NLRB v. Yeshiva University, 582 F.2d 686 (1978), its employees, being managerial or supervisory or both, were excluded from the coverage of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act); and (2) that under NLRB v. Catholic Bishop of Chicago, 440 U.S. 490 (1979), it was a religious institution exempt from the Act's coverage. The Regional Director for Region 24 rendered his Decision and Direction of Election on December 21, 1979, rejecting both of Respondent's defenses. Pursuant to Section 102.67 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, Respondent requested review of that decision. On January 29, 1980, the Board denied Respondent's request "as it raises no substantial issues warranting review." The Charging Party Union de Profesores Universitarios (UPU) (Union) was, after an election, duly certified as the collective-bargaining representative on February 7, 1980, for the following unit held appropriate for collective bargaining:

> All full-time teaching personnel employed by Respondent at its Bayamon, Puerto Rico campus, including lecturers, instructors, temporary faculty, auxiliary professors, associate professors, professors and athletic instructors/coaches; but, excluding all other employees, all part-time teaching personnel, maintenance personnel, director, [sic] all administrative, office clerical employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

Thereafter, Respondent failed and refused to bargain with the Union on the principal ground that it had no obligation to do so. Indeed, the Supreme Court decided NLRB v. Yeshiva University, 444 U.S. 672 (1980), only 13 days after the issuance of the Certification of Representative; and Respondent has steadfastly relied on this decision (hereafter Yeshiva University and Catholic Bishop to support its refusal to bargain. That is what gives rise to this unfair labor practice proceeding,[1] which involves not only Respondent's obligations under Section 8(a)(5) of the Act but also its responsibilities to certain of its professors, whom it terminated allegedly because of Respondent's unilaterally imposed terms and conditions of employment or whom it refused to reinstate after the Union had sought to end its unfair labor practice strike against Respondent and offered on behalf of certain professors to return to work.

I. THE BOARD'S JURISDICTION

As stated above, Respondent's defense to the complaint is grounded primarily on the following contentions: (1) Respondent is exempt from the provisions of the Act under Catholic Bishop; (2) the professors are managerial employees within the meaning of Yeshiva University, and (3) certain of the professors, primarily those designated as coordinators of departments, are supervisors. I deal with these contentions seriatum.

A. Jurisdiction over Respondent Under Catholic Bishop

The Regional Director's Decision and Direction of Election in Case 24-RC-6383, at footnote 3, dealt directly with Respondent's claim that, as a religious institution, it was exempt from the jurisdiction of the Act, as follows:

> The Employer (herein at times called the University), a non-profit corporation duly organized and existing by virtue of the laws of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico is engaged in the operation of a postsecondary educational institution in Bayamon, Puerto Rico. During the past calendar year, which period is representative of its annual operations generally, the Employer purchased and caused to be transported and delivered to its educational institution goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 of which goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 were transported and delivered to its educational institution directly from points and places located outside the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico. During the same period, the Employer derived gross revenues from the operation of its educational institution in excess of $1 million exclusive of contributions.
> The Employer, contrary to Petitioner, contends that the United States Supreme Court decision of

[1] The Union filed unfair labor practice charges in Cases 24-CA-4348 and 24-CA-4349 on July 14, 1980; in Case 24-CA-4363 on August 8, 1980; in Case 24-CA-4382 on September 12, 1980; and in Case 24-CA-4508 on May 12, 1981. The proceedings were consolidated and a complaint issued on August 14, 1981. A complaint against the Union in Case 24-CB-1112 was also consolidated in the instant proceeding, but the matter was settled and severed at the hearing, which was held in Hato Rey, Puerto Rico, on March 15-19 and 22-23, 1982, and on March 9 and 10, 1983.

Finally, based on the Regional Director's Decision and Direction of Election, in Case 24-RC-6383, quoted in part infra and which I adopt, I conclude that Respondent is an employer within the meaning of Sec. 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act and that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Sec. 2(5) of the Act.

Catholic Bishop of Chicago, 440 U.S. 490 (1979) precludes the assertion of jurisdiction herein as the Employer is "controlled" by the Order of the Dominican Fathers of Puerto Rico, Inc., and the Catholic Church, and thus, the assertion of jurisdiction would constitute an impermissible entanglement between Government and religion.

When it addressed this same issue in Barber-Scotia College, 245 NLRB 406, the Board limited the scope of Catholic Bishop, supra, to "parochial elementary and secondary schools" and, therein, asserted jurisdiction over a church-related institution of higher learning. Citing Tilton v. Richardson, 403 U.S. 672 (1972), the Board recognized that, "there are generally significant differences between the religious aspects of church-related institutions of higher learning and parochial elementary and secondary schools." Id. at 685. This observation was based on the Court's findings that college students are less impressionable and less susceptible to religious indoctrination, that the internal discipline inherent in college courses minimizes the possibility of sectarian influence, and that a high degree of academic freedom often exists at church-related colleges and universities. Id at 686. The Court further stated that, "Since religious indoctrination is not a substantial purpose or activity of these church-related colleges and universities, there is less likelihood than in primary and secondary schools that religion will permeate the area of secular education." Id. at 687.

The undisputed record evidence reflects that, as in Barber-Scotia College, supra, the Employer herein, "closely resembles the institutions on which the Supreme Court based its general distinction between church-related colleges and parochial schools." As noted above, the Employer is a private, non-profit college located in Bayamon, Puerto Rico, and was established in 1961 by Father Mariano Neauwenhiuzen Casanova with the approval of the Order of the Dominican Fathers of Puerto Rico, Inc. (hereafter the Order). Thereafter, in 1964, the college was incorporated by three members of the Order and transferred to the Order's Seminary in Bayamon, Reparto Flamingo, Puerto Rico. Although financed during this period with funds from the Order, it is undisputed that since 1970, the Employer has operated as a self-sufficient institution, receiving no financial assistance from the Order, and independent of the Catholic Church. Moreover, the Roman Catholic Archdiocese of San Juan in which the college is located: neither exercises administrative nor secular control over the institution; does not own any of the land on which the institution is located or other property used by the institution; nor does it contribute any funds to it. Indeed, the highest ranking official in the Catholic Church in San Juan testified, without contradiction, that as the Employer does not comply with any of the requisites set forth by the Catholic Church, the Employer is not a Catholic university and that it has repeatedly refused to submit to any direction or control by the Catholic Church.

The Employer relies on its Articles of Incorporation and By-Laws to support its contention that it is controlled and operated by the Order. In this regard, Chapter XIII, Article 54 of the By-Laws provide that, "ultimate control of the property resides in the Board of Trustees," and Article 57 provides that, in the event that the university is dissolved, its assets will be distributed by said Board to the Archdiocese of San Juan. In establishing the Board of Trustees, while the By-Laws and the Articles of Incorporation are at variance as to the requirement that a particular number of the trustees be members of the Order, it is undisputed that presently 6 of the 10 trustees are, in fact, members of the Order. Further, the record reflects that the Board of Trustees is empowered, under Chapter V, Article 13 with, inter alia, the authority "to ratify appointments for the rank of Professor, submitted by the University President;" "to approve the Salary Scales for the University employees;" and "to review and approve the annual budget submitted by the University President." However, the University's President testified that in exercising its broad authority over University matters, including the hiring, retention or tenure of academic personnel, the Board of Directors is not obliged, and indeed does not consult with or report to the Order. Finally, the only financial or other assistance rendered by the Order to the University consists of an interest-free mortgage on certain University property.

As set forth in its Articles of Incorporation, the aim of the Employer is entirely secular; namely, to provide "a humanistic education at an academic level," a purpose common to both public or private, nonsectarian institutions of learning. The Employer is open to the general public and records for the fiscal year 1977–78 reveal that it receives direct federal grants and participates in various federal student scholarship and loan programs. Although the University offers an optional, specialized program leading to a Bachelor of Arts or a Master's Degree in religion, the study of the Catholic religion is neither required nor stressed in its curriculum. While students are required to take a standard, three credit hour course in religion, said course is primarily devoted to a comparison of various religions, stressing their common areas of belief. While Mass is said daily in its chapel, student attendance is not mandatory. All decisions concerning the admission of students, as well as the hiring of teaching personnel, are made without the involvement of either the Catholic Church or the Order; rather, decisions relating to student admissions or the hiring of personnel are made solely upon the basis of ability and experience.

In view of the above, as an independent board of trustees, and not the Catholic Church or the Order independently formulate and administer all matters > relating to either the curriculum and labor relations cocerning [sic] the Employer's faculty, I find that the Employer is not a "church-operated school," College of Notre Dame, 245 NLRB 386, but, rather, a college of the kind "concerned with providing a secular education rather than with inculcating particular religious values." Barber-Scotia College, Inc., supra.

Respondent's contentions regarding Catholic Bishop concern allege facts that occurred after the close of the representation hearing. The prime allegations are that: (1) on August 5, 1980, pursuant to a certificate of Catholic religiosity, Respondent was recognized by and affiliated with the Sacred Congregation of Catholic Education in Rome as a Catholic institution and, as such, is subject to the supervision of the Holy See; (2) that Respondent now operates the Center for Theological Studies (CEDOC),[2] which prepares students for the Catholic priesthood and offers a master's degree in theology; and (3) that Respondent owns the elementary school La Milagrosa and the elementary and secondary school Santa Rita (referred to collectively as the Schools), acquired in 1978 and 1979, respectively, as Catholic schools and as Christian teaching laboratories for Respondent's students. In support of all contentions, Respondent alleges an identity of purpose or close interrelationship between the University, the Schools, and CEDOC, on the one hand, and the Catholic Church, on the other hand, because Respondent's president, Father Vincent Van Rooij, is the highest officer of the Dominican Order of Respondent (which allegedly includes CEDOC) and of the Schools.

CEDOC began operating in 1980 but, as late as the last hearing, it really had not taken final shape. Originally, it was intended to be a 4-year program to permit students to be ordained; and the program and its curriculum was devised by priests of the Dominican Order of Puerto Rico. Then, because the program was not acceptable for accreditation by the Middle States Association of Colleges and Secondary Schools (Middle States), a master's degree, 2-year program has been developed; but it had been accredited only on December 27, 1982, and had not commenced as such. In any event, only 3 students participated in CEDOC classes during the 1980–81 school year; 14 in the 1981–1982; and 24 in 1982–83, out of approximately 1700–1800 students enrolled at the University. The program is not listed in the University's 1982–84 catalogue.

It is true, however, that its classes are taught on the university campus, but is is not wholly and structurally integrated with Respondent. Rather, it has its own board of directors consisting of seven members of the Dominican Order. Five are members of Respondent's larger board of trustees. With possibly one exception, it hires and pays for its own professors,[3] although 18 of its professors also teach at the University.[4] Only four of them, however, were teaching at the University at the tie of the representation election. CEDOC has its own director, Father Felix Struik, who was chosen by CEDOC's directors and who interviews candidates for admission. Some of CEDOC's courses parallel those taught in Respondent's undergraduate program designed for seminarians which grants, through Respondent's department of humanities, a bachelor's degree in philosophy.

The Schools have the same board of trustees and president as Respondent and have their own director, who is Respondent's vice president and who is the immediate supervisor of the two principals of the Schools. Contracts of the Schools' teachers are approved by both the principal and the director and grant the teachers the same rights as those enjoyed by the University's professors. The finance department of the University administers the finances of the Schools and the Schools' checks must be signed by the principal and an officer of the University. The director of the physical plant of the University and the director of the Schools oversee the maintenance and upkeep of the Schools' grounds and buildings, and all construction orders must be approved by the Schools' director and the University's board of trustees. The Schools' students are entitled to use the University's library and athletic facilities. Two spiritual counselors at the Schools are part-time professors at the University, three teachers of religion at the Schools are students at the University (but at least two became students after they taught at the Schools), the spiritual counselors supervise the three students, and Respondent's director of humanities supervises both the spiritual counselors and the student-teachers.

However, each School has its own principal and budget. Teachers are hired by the respective principal, with the approval of the director, and are paid by the Schools. Where academic disciplines of Respondent's department of education and social work program require that students engage in practice teaching, some of the students teach at the Schools, as well as at other institutions. The Schools require their teachers to "keep those norms of moral behavior which are dictated by the School and the Catholic Church"; whereas the University imposes no such requirements. Further, although the University's aim, inter alia, is to provide "a humanistic education at an academic level," the School's regulations

[3] Father Teodoro Veerkamp, a trustee of and professor at both institutions, was granted the status of full-time professor at Respondent, even though he taught only 9 credits at the University, rather than 15 credits required by Respondent's faculty contract. I infer that he had the extra time to teach the CEDOC program and thus was not paid directly by CEDOC because he was already being paid full salary for a partial schedule at the University.

[4] This finding stems from a stipulation between the parties and I feel bound by it. I would be remiss, however, if I did not indicate some inkling of disbelief. One of the "professors" stipulated as teaching at both institutions is the president. I was unaware that he taught at the University. Of greater curiosity is an individual, whose work performed at both institutions is listed of R. Exh. 256 as "Maintenance-Carpentry." The work of two others is listed as "Vocational Counselling" and "Principal-Elementary Academy LaMilagrosa." Furthermore, in R. Exhs. 265, 266, which are primarily memoranda from Franciso Domingo, the University's humanities department director, to Father Felix Struik, CEDOC's director, setting forth the tentative teaching schedules of faculty members in the department of humanities so as to avoid a conflict with their responsibilities in the CEDOC program, Domingo sets forth the schedules of only four professors. And in an attached untranslated memoranda from Struik to Domingo setting forth the CEDOC schedule for the spring semester, 1983, only six professors are listed.

state that admission is open to students who must "[c]onfirm and strengthen with their family and matrimonial life the testimony of Christian life that the child needs for the emotional security that guarantees him the interest and spiritual and academic progress in the Catholic School." The operations of the Schools, including publication of a manual for parochial schools relating to curriculum, Catholic doctrine, hiring of faculty and academic calendar, are supervised by the superintendent for Catholic studies of the Archdioscese of San Juan, to whom the Schools' budgets must be submitted. The University's operations are not supervised in this manner.

There is no dispute that Respondent has been recognized as a Catholic university, but this recognition has had no effect on the manner that the University has been administered or on its curriculum offerings. The recognition agreement vests on the Bishop of San Juan only the authority to oversee those aspects of university life and functions dealing with pastoral or religious matters and is specific in adding: "This right to oversee is understood not to extend to matters which usually fall within the university administration competency." Although the agreement grants the Bishop the right to attend meetings of the board of trustees where pastoral matters are going to be discussed, no such meetings have been held and the Bishop has not attended any meetings, nor has he been invited to them or solicited an invitation. Respondent has continued to receive substantial Federal aid to its programs and for the benefit of its students.[5]

I conclude that not one fact has arisen which dictates that the Regional Director's Decision and Direction of Election be overturned. CEDOC and the schools are functionally and administratively independent of Respondent. While it might be argued that the assertion of jurisdiction over CEDOC and the Schools would constitute an impermissible entanglement between government and religion, no such entanglement is present in the relationship of Respondent's professors and the University. The grant of Catholic affiliation with Respondent has changed not one aspect of the administration of Respondent, which continues to provide a secular education to students of all religions.

The Board has continued to hold that the scope of Catholic Bishop is limited to parochial elementary and secondary schools. Barber-Scotia College, 245 NLRB 406 (1979); College of Notre Dame, 245 NLRB 386 (1979); Thiel College, 261 NLRB 580 (1982); Duquesne University of the Holy Ghost, 261 NLRB 587 (1982); Lewis University, 265 NLRB 1239 (1982). Furthermore, although Respondent is now affiliated with the Catholic Church, that affiliation is at best minimal and has no application to the purpose of the University, which is primarily secular. The University remains an open college, with admission restricted only by the requirement that applicants have graduated from high school and have taken college board examinations.

The Catholic Church contributes nothing to the University's budget. There is no requirement that students take religious courses or engage in worship. In addition, neither students nor teachers need be Catholic, nor of the Dominican Order, and the teachers do not have to commit themselves in writing to support the mission of the Church. The day-to-day administration of the University has not been interfered with by the Church's representatives and, except for CEDOC, the Church appears to have no interest in the University. Even regarding CEDOC, it may well be that Respondent's professors, who also teach courses at CEDOC, may be excluded from the bargaining unit, which specifically excludes part-time employees.

Furthermore, to permit the status of CEDOC to control the Board's jurisdiction would constitute Board approval of the principle that the "tail wags the dog." A minor portion of students are enrolled in CEDOC's programs, and the most substantial portion of Respondent's operation is devoted to nonsecular purposes. Finally, Respondent's posture regarding its religious affiliation is hardly consistent with its demonstrated, repeated attempts, often successful, to receive Federal grants for its programs.

Accordingly, I conclude that the Board is not precluded from taking jurisdiction herein. This accords not only with Board law but also with decisions of the United States courts of appeals which have dealt with similar issues. *St. Elizabeth Community Hospital v. II. THE MANAGERIAL STATUS OF THE FACULTY

A. The 1978 Changes

Since the University started operations as a self-sufficient institution in 1970, the university senate, with minority faculty participation, played a substantial role in recommending university policies. However, effective as of July 20, 1978, the administration unilaterally amended the faculty regulations,[7] which substantially altered the functions of the faculty and increased the powers of the president. For example, the power to appoint faculty became vested in the president alone, deleting reference to the requirement that appointments were to be made on the recommendation of the academic dean and the college of deans; no longer would probationary contracts of 1 year be counted to compute requirements for tenure; there was eliminated the requirement that, before an academic load would be assigned to a professor, the faculty member would have to be consulted, and the new regulations permitted the work load to be assigned at the discretion of the department director, with the approval of the academic dean; the structure of faculty evaluations

[5] From August 5, 1980, to the date of the last hearing, the University received $3.75 million in Federal grants, 75 percent of which is student aid and $425,000 in direct institutional assistance and aid to develop curriculum, provide funds for research, et cetera. From October 1, 1977, to September 30, 1978, Respondent received various Federal grants totaling $5,042,298.

[6] To the extent that Respondent has objected to my rulings at the hearing refusing to permit it to introduce evidence which was available at or could have been presented in the representation proceeding and to the extent that, in its briefs, Respondent makes arguments which also could have been presented earlier, I have not considered such evidence or contentions. Noranda Aluminum, 268 NLRB No. 223 (Feb. 29, 1984).

[7] New regulations for the senate were also unilaterally issued on July 12, 1978.

was changed to vest in the president all authority over the approval of faculty evaluations, criteria, and methods, which previously had been established by the academic council and approved by the university senate, or the president; disciplinary action was vested in an ad hoc committee appointed by the president, authority which was earlier that of the committee of faculty standards; and faculty members were required for the first time to sign daily attendance sheets and to pay special attention to reporting hours devoted to "office work to attend to [their] students." In addition, on December 14, 1978, the board of trustees issued a clarification of the faculty regulations that no more than 10 percent of the full-time faculty of a given department may be granted tenure.

B. The State of the Record; Credibility

Any discussion of the facts in this proceeding must include a reply to certain statements and arguments contained in Respondent's brief, either because Respondent misunderstands the nature of the rulings made at hearing or because Respondent is attempting now to make objections which were not properly made at trial or to argue facts which are not sustained by the record. For example, I have not considered herein as proof any of Respondent's proffered exhibits which were not admitted into evidence. Although the receipt of many of Respondent's exhibits in evidence was stipulated by the General Counsel and the Union, the General Counsel withheld her consent from a number of them on the grounds of relevance and authencity. I sustained her objection solely on the latter ground, preserving for argument the relevance of the proposed exhibits. Respondent was offered several opportunities to introduce proof of the authenticity of the documents, but rejected the offers.

Respondent claimed that there were new facts which arose after the representation proceeding and which it wished to introduce herein, but was forbidden from so doing. The record will reflect that Respondent was not denied the right to introduce any new evidence relating to the managerial status of members of the unit. To the extent that Respondent relies on an affidavit which accompanied its Motion for Summary Judgment, made at the beginning of the hearing, an affidavit is not a substitute for oral testimony subject to cross-examination. I have not considered the affidavit and never stated to the parties that it was proof of anything.

Furthermore, among the more than 400 exhibits received in evidence are numerous committee reports and other documents indicating faculty participation actions, and recommendations of numerous and various proposals. However, there was nothing to indicate that actions and the recommendations amounted to anything more than words on pieces of paper. Without proof that the proposals or recommendations were effected or implemented, I have disregarded the same as lacking any basis for a finding of managerial status, or, at least, have discussed why I have not found the faculty functions claimed by Respondent. Finally, insofar as the 1978 faculty regulations contain new rules, regulations, and procedures, I have, in general, not considered Respondent's proof of various facts by exhibits which preceded Respondent's new faculty regulations, which were put into effect solely by Respondent's administration without the advice, contribution, or consent of the faculty. Respondent cannot rely on past practices which have effectively been rescinded by new written regulations and directives and new practices.

In reciting the functions of the faculty, I have given great weight to Respondent's own unilaterally established, written rules which provide the powers and duties possessed by its board of trustees and each of its component administrators compared with the alleged managerial functions now claimed to be those of its faculty members. Even if there were substantial evidence that its faculty engaged in many actions which would constitute them as managerial employees—and the massive number of exhibits simply do not support Respondent's position—where there is contrary documentary proof, the oral testimony of its department directors or academic dean should not be accorded the weight urged by Respondent. For example, to credit Humanities Department Director Domingo, all he was was a conduit for the faculty's wishes and desires, and all decisions were made collegially, despite the fact that it was his duty and no one else's to make the recommendations and decisions which he averred he did not make.

Further, the testimony of Nelida Melendez, director of the education department,[8] was, at best, confused, hesitant, unresponsive, and contradictory; oftimes, she stated one proposition on direct examination, only to recant completely on cross-examination. Some examples are her descriptions of when oversubscribed classes may be divided, how the planning committee was instituted, and the method of placing students for the practice of teaching.

I credit the testimony of neither witness when their testimony attempts to impeach the written bylaws and faculty regulations unilaterally imposed by the university president, where their testimony is unsupported by documentary evidence, and where their testimony is contradicted by witnesses for the General Counsel. Their attempts to inflate the authority of the faculty and minimize their own would, if credited, lead me to the conclusion that department directors did nothing—they do not teach—and that they served no useful purpose, other than to transmit messages. I find that wholly improbable. Rather, I credit the testimony of Sonia Flores, who, when she was the director of the education department, testified that her responsibilities included the selection, supervision, and evaluation of professors, educational orientation of students, preparation of course schedules, and the planning of the future of the department.

C. The Structure of the University

The University is governed by a board of directors, which is also known as the board of trustees. The board, whose "executive official is the University President, who shall manage it with the collaboration of a University Senate and other officials," is composed of 11 mem-

[8] Domingo and Melendez were directors to two of the University's four departments, the others being business administration and natural sciences. The directors of the latter two departments did not testify.

bers, and the certificate of incorporation requires that 3 shall be the original 3 incorporators and at least 5 shall be members of the First Dominican Order residing in Puerto Rico.[9] Three "de jure" members, who serve as trustees as long as they retain their offices of positions, are the Regional Vicar of the Dominican Fathers of Puerto Rico, Inc., the Prior of the Convent of Our Lady of the Rosary in Bayamon, Puerto Rico, and the university president; the eight others are elected by majority vote of the trustees, serve for terms of 3 years, and may not be reelected for more than three consecutive terms. Among the duties of the board of trustees are to "be responsible for the framework, operation and future of the University . . . designate the University President . . . review and approve the annual budget submitted by the University President . . . approve the Salary Scales for the University employees . . . ratify appointments for the rank of Professor, submitted by the University President . . . [and] authorize and give the final approval to all the Regulations that shall be in effect at the University and to approve the Academic Programs."

The duties of the university president, "the University's Chief Executive," are to effectuate the policies adopted by the board of trustees, "exercise leadership in the University's internal development . . . preside over meetings of the University Senate . . . attend and preside over, with voice and vote, meetings of all the University groups or organizations . . . appoint all the University officials and employees . . . dismiss from office . . . officials or other University officers . . . establish, at his option, all the committees which he deems necessary . . . approve or, on the contrary, to invalidate through his veto the decisions of the University Senate . . . adopt all the University's curricula, standards, administrative frameworks, policies and procedures . . . submit the annual budget before the Board of Trustees . . . [and] grant tenure as employees of the institution to those who qualify for it pursuant to institutional standards and regulations."

The university senate is described as "the representative Body of administration, of the professoriat and of the student body." It is, however, controlled by the University's administration; for not only does the university president preside over it as the president of the senate but, according to the original bylaws, more than one-half of its membership, excluding the president, are members of the administration of directors of departments (excluded from the unit) or are appointed by the president. The provost, vice president, academic dean, dean of students, finance director, the four academic department directors, and the educational resources director automatically serve as senate members. In addition, the administrative personnel elects one member and the president appoints an additional member from the administrative personnel. Thus, including the president, there are 13 members closely aligned with the president's views. The remaining 10 members of the senate consist of 4 selected by the faculty of each department, 4 elected by the students of each department, and 1 elected by the entire faculty. Yet another is designated by the president from the faculty.[10]

The senate has only the power to "create Senate Committees . . . to be designated by the University President." Other than that, it may only make recommendations regarding "requirements for admission, advancement and graduation of students . . . the general approach to be adopted in the teaching and research programs pursuant to the University's objectives . . . procedures to develop courses of study . . . [and] the University's curriculum . . . the organizational framework of each Academic Department [and] . . . general policy pertaining to the appointment, promotion, and tenure, rank and leave of the professoriat." The president, as president of the senate, presided at its meetings, gave the opening statements, set forth the agenda, and defined the limits of the senate's jurisdiction. In the April 1980 meeting, he explained that the senate was not an executive or fiscal body, but was legislative, and that the board of trustees had defined the senate's general areas as: (1) criteria and requirements for admission, promotion, and graduation of students and for the programs of study and research according to the objectives of the University; (2) procedures and requirements for the development of courses of study and recommendations concerning the curriculum of the University; (3) recommendations concerning the "organic structure" of each department and academic division; (4) general policy concerning appointments, promotions, tenure, ranks, and leaves for the members of the faculty; (5) recommendations concerning amendments to the University's bylaws and regulations and recommendations concerning rules and procedures in the senate; and (6) creation of permanent or ad hoc committees. The president made clear, however, that decisions are not final but need the endorsement of the president and then "many times" of the board of trustees.[11]

[9] However, the bylaws provide that: "The Board of Trustees shall have an absolute majority or [sic] members belonging to the Dominican Fathers of Puerto Rico, Inc." Six members, not five, would constitute that absolute majority.

[10] The percentage of faculty representatives in the senate subsequently declined. An examination of the senate minutes shows that in March 1976, 7 of 19 members were faculty, 8 were administration staff, and 4 were students. A change in the composition of the senate was presented by the president and was approved. Thereafter, in December 1976, 10 of 29 were members of the faculty; in November 1977, 10 of 29; in April 1980, 8 of 21. Because the attendance quorum is two-thirds of the members and because decisions require, as a minimum, one-half plus one votes and, in some cases, two-thirds of those present, it is impossible for the faculty alone to make a binding decision.

[11] In December 1976, the president reported to the senate, in part, as follows:

> Composition of the Senate: Pursuant to the new rules as to the composition of the University Senate, approved at the meeting of the 4th of March 1976, the Senate represents the different areas and interests of the Institution and of the university community of Universidad Central de Bayamon; not exactly the interest of a single area or group. Therefore, the Senators should think above all of the good of the whole Institution as such, also when they may be defending the interests of a specific area, which they represent.
> Functions and Responsibilities: The University Senate has several functions and responsibilities; the most important are the following three:
> (1) The Legislative Aspect: The University Senate has a legislative aspect, in respect to the university policy and regulations, academic

The president's description, in application, does not appear to be wholly accurate. The president appointed all committees, and some of the witnesses testified that, although they were appointed to committees, the committees did not meet or met once, to hear what they were supposed to do, met again. The limitations on the functions of the senate, leaving aside the veto power of the president and the board of trustees, are also clearly demonstrated. At the same April meeting, an administration representative proposed a definition of the functions of the chancellor. The president stated that the motion was unnecessary because it was incumbent on the board of trustees to do so, and it and the president have already done so, and the chancellor had already instructed his subordinates regarding their functions. Another motion was made to permit the union representative of unionized administration employees to be an ex officio member of the senate. The president considered the motion to be out of order because the senate did not have jurisdiction over labor-management relations.

In May 1980 a motion was presented that members of the senate should be aware of the financial structure of the University and, therefore, should be given financial statements. The president declared the motion to be out of order, stating: "The finances, financial statements and financial transactions are exclusively and directly incumbent upon the Board of Trustees and the financial officials of the University." Another motion was declared out of order—about needs and ideas for improvement of the physical plant for athletic activities. The president held that these were unrelated to the functions and responsibilities of the senate and were under the direct control of the executive officials and the board of trustees.

The University's bylaws prescribe that the administration officials are all appointed by the president. The provost assists the president in university affairs. The vice president is responsible for the University's financial and administrative matters and has jurisdiction over and establishes the duties of all officials and employees hired by the University. However, in February 1980, Respondent changed its administrative structure by the appointment of a chancellor who was placed in charge of the University's day-to-day academic matters previously discharged by the vice president. The academic dean is the chief administrator of academic affairs and is responsible for planning the University's educational activities, for putting the academic standards into practice, for advising the president on academic policy, and for recommending faculty appointments to the president. The academic dean is empowered to authorize or deny the application to hold any activity of an academic or cultural nature. The dean of students, on the other hand, is the chief administrator of student affairs. He is responsible for planning student activities and for putting into effect the standards pertaining to students and is empowered to authorize or deny the application to hold any type of student activity.

On the academic side, the bylaws set forth the duties and powers of the academic department directors, as follows:

> He shall be responsible, under the Academic Dean's authority, for the general functioning of his Department.
> They shall advise the Academic Dean in relation with the teacher's recruitment, appointment, promotion, salary increase, and fulfillment of contractual obligations.
> He shall preside over the meetings of his Department's professoriat. He shall inform all the members of the professoriat about his Department's standards, objectives and procedures.
> He shall have authority to designate committees from his Department's professoriat to study, plan and recommend programs concerning the educational, student or teacher's aspect.
> He shall submit to the Academic Dean the proposal for the teachers' teaching hours.
> He shall prepare an annual report on the functioning, achievements and needs of his Department, and shall submit it to the Academic Dean forwarding a copy to the President.
> He shall recommend to the Academic Dean, after asking for his Faculty's advice, the curriculum of studies and shall indicate courses that are prerequisites for majoring and those that shall constitute the necessary sequence to achieve it.
> After examining their contents, he shall recommend to the Academic Dean the approval of the textbooks and materials.
> He shall see to it that students taking courses offered by his Department have the opportunity to seek advice and receive guidance and he shall provide an adequate program for students whose major is related to his Department.
> He shall send the minutes of the meetings to the President and to the Academic Dean.
> He shall evaluate annually his Department's members and shall submit the pertinent report to the Academic Dean.

The faculty consists of professors, associate professors, assistant professors, and instructors. Appointment of faculty is made by the president after receiving recommendations from the academic dean. The functions of the faculty are described as including "teaching classes, giving and grading examinations, handing in grades on time, orienting the students, participating actively in the programs, general promotional policy, standards for tenure, academic ranks, etc. But always subject to the subsequent approval of the Board of Trustees.

(2) The Counseling Aspect: The University Senate has a counseling aspect, to make recommendations to the executive branch, in respect to candidates to the Presidency of the University, higher Officials, deans, etc.

(3) The Fiscal Aspect: The University Senate also has, to a certain point, a fiscal aspect, to maintain control over the application of the laws approved; for example, ratification of promotions in rank, compliance with requirements for graduation, etc.

Responsibility: It is the responsibility of each senator to seek the good of the entire Institution as such; he should vote according to his own judgment and conscience, and not be led by what others may say or by indications from a group. He should have sufficient independence in his judgment, always taking into account the good of the Institution.

university life, doing research work and seeking his professional development, and any others assigned by the academic dean." Furthermore, the faculty "shall teach its classes adhering to the University standards and guidelines and shall cooperate with their Department Head in all matters pertaining to its functioning. . . . The faculty's rights, powers, and duties shall be established in their contract and in the manuals or regulations that the authorized university entities may publish."

On July 20, 1978, 3 days after the effective date of the revised bylaws, the president issued new faculty regulations, which had been approved by the board of trustees 8 days before, when it had also approved the revised certificate of incorporation and bylaws. Faculty functions are listed, as follows:

> To carry out the student's teaching process.
> To coordinate said process in an interdisciplinary manner.
> To deliberate when summoned to do so by the Academic Dean and to make recommendations on the University's educational policy, its curriculum and teaching methods.
> To annually elect its Representatives before the University Senate and bring its academic positions and proposals to their consideration.
> To exercise initiative in the teaching of their subjects within the institutional standards.
> To know, respect and uphold the University's philosophy, its objectives, purposes and educational policy.
> To fully comply with their contract with the University.
> To know and respect the By-laws, regulations and administrative orders of the University.
> To assume responsibility before their Department's Head, the Academic Dean and the University President for the performance of their work.
> To efficiently participate in the institutional committees to which they are appointed.

In addition, the regulations require that the faculty shall exercise the functions and obligations stipulated in their contract and in the regulations and those assigned to them by their superiors and that the following are considered to be professional functions of each faculty member:

> To assume responsibility for teaching groups of students differing in size.
> To create and prepare the necessary materials for the courses he teaches; also the syllabi of their courses.
> To be accessible to the students during office hours, for guidance and advice.
> To develop study projects and external experiences that will contribute to the teaching process of the students.
> To participate in the meetings of the interdisciplinary coordinator groups that his superiors designate.
> To design and perform his students' evaluation process.
> To keep a record of his students' work that includes the evaluation of their work and other descriptive notations which he deems proper.
> To collaborate in the academic orientation of new Faculty members.
> To advise his students about their work and internal or external academic alternatives and recommend professional help, if necessary.
> To prepare and annually file, if he deems it proper or it is required of him, a self-evaluation report with the Academic Dean and a copy to the President.
> To annually review and evaluate the contents of his courses and to eventually submit recommendations to the Academic Council on possible changes to them.
> To prepare a program for his own professional betterment.
> To devote some time, especially during periods where there are no classes, to scientific research, publications, and other intellectual and cultural activities in accordance with his academic and intellectual standing.

The faculty contracts in use add little to the description of functions set forth above. All are entered into by the university president with the member of the faculty and state that the monthly salary was computed by taking into account the salary scale approved by the board of trustees and the merits of each case. The teacher undertakes to work full time or part time, teach classes, and carry out the extracurricular and administrative schedules which may be assigned to him pursuant to the faculty regulations.

In addition to the foregoing description of the titles and duties of administration staff and faculty, there are a number of other organizations which play some part in the management of the University. Primitivo Martinez, the director of the library and former director of the learning resources center,[12] testified that he was a member of the president's staff, along with the vice president, director of finance, academic dean, dean of students, and provost. They would meet with the president and advise him on such matters as the planning of the University, promotions in rank, discharges, and grant of scholarships. There was also an academic board or council, which consisted of the academic dean, the directors of the four departments and other administrative personnel, but its specific functions were never described.

D. Faculty Functions

The above broad institutional guidelines clearly limit the authority and the limitations of the powers of the professors. I turn now to findings of fact as to what Respondent's faculty does and does not do, the latter being particularly in response to Respondent's claims that the faculty exercises managerial powers.

[12] The learning resources center consists of two main divisions, library services, and educational technology, such as studios and dark rooms.

1. Hiring and firing

Some of the professors who appeared at the hearing testified that they were interviewed, first by the department director, then by the academic dean, and finally by the president or by the vice president. Others testified that they were interviewed by one, if not all, of the same administration personnel, although not in the same order. There was no participation by any faculty in the process of hiring of those faculty members and no evidence to demonstrate that faculty opinion was solicited. Nor does the record reflect any faculty participation in decisions to discharge, promote, or demote faculty members. Indeed, Flores was appointed acting director of the education department by the president, then was appointed director of the department by the president, and then was demoted to professor in May 1978 by the president. The discriminatees herein were terminated or were not reinstated solely by action of the administration.

There have been a few instances where there have been recommendations made by faculty members, and the persons recommended by a faculty member have been hired. No causal connection, however, was shown; and the record also indicates that faculty support was sometimes not persuasive. In any event, there is nothing in any document that demonstrates that faculty approval is required or that faculty recommendations are sought by those who ultimately hire personnel. The president testified that he has the ultimate responsibility for the hiring of all faculty and other employees. The new university regulations, unilaterally issued by the president, leave to him alone the power to hire, as contrasted with the earlier regulations which authorized departmental action. The president appoints all faculty members on recommendation of the academic dean and department directors. Terms of contracts for probationary, provisional, and permanent appointments are specified in the faculty regulations. Similarly, the faculty has no power to hire or recommend for hiring any of the university officers and administrators, a power that the bylaws leave to the president and vice president.[13]

The evidence of faculty participation in the hiring of personnel is minimal. Faculty have, in preparing new programs in social work, set forth job descriptions of the director of social work and the supervisor of student practice of social work. Although there appears to be no faculty action relating to who should be appointed to these positions, the recommended job descriptions limited the applicants to those who were able to fulfill the requirements. However, in the case of the director of social work, that position was filled prior to the faculty's completion of the social work program and the qualifications that were used were those of the council on social work, which is an accrediting institution for social work programs in the United States and is wholly unrelated to the University. In June 1977, Sylvia Mulling, the coordinator of the language laboratory, proposed to the director of the personnel office, the academic dean, and the director of the humanities department, the hiring of a part-time employee as a full-time employee because many students were unable to take full advantage of the laboratory. That employee was hired.

In 1978, the tenure and rank committee, consisting of a majority of administration representatives, agreed on the procedure for the hiring of full-time professors. However, those procedures did not include the participation of any faculty in the process of recommending or hiring of professors. In June 1981, a unit employee interviewed a candidate for the position of social work director, and her favorable recommendation was included in the favorable report of the director of the department of humanities to the academic dean.[14] The coordinator of the English department interviewed a candidate for English teacher in December 1981 and recommended her hire to the director of the humanities department; but there is no evidence that the candidate was hired

Finally, without faculty participation, Chancellor Luis Roberto Pinero unilaterally issued a memorandum on May 20, 1980, to the academic dean requiring that no faculty members would be hired unless they possessed at least a master's degree. On July 11, 1980, Pinero issued another memorandum again unilaterally and without faculty participation, requiring that faculty members, to be eligible for hiring, also possess 12 graduate credits in the courses to be taught.

2. Salaries

In 1976, unit members were polled on whether they preferred to have salaries fixed, with increases given for all in the same amount, or whether they wished to have a system of maximum and minimum salaries, or had no preference. Another poll was taken in 1978, which covered not only salary increases, but opinions on numerous other matters. It can almost be cast as a popularity poll. Nonetheless, the faculty voted 40–6 to abandon the then present system of basing salary increases on faculty evaluations and to substitute a system of fixed increases for all based on criteria such as inflation and academic title, rank, and length of employment of faculty members. The record does not reflect what action, if any, was taken to implement the faculty's wishes, but it appears that at some time the board of trustees prepared salary scales based on the professor's preparation and degrees held. The record does not prove that the trustees' action was the result of the faculty vote. The only other faculty input into salaries occurred in 1976, when a faculty representative moved that the university senate change the method of payment of part-time teachers from one payment at the end of each semester to monthly payments. That change was unanimously approved, with one abstention, and was implemented by the University.

3. Rank and tenure

Respondent contends that rank and tenure decisions are made or effectively recommended by unit employees, [13] There is evidence that faculty participated in recommending the hiring or firing of administrative personnel in 1972 and 1974. Whatever powers they may have had then were abrogated in the new bylaws.

[14] Domingo testified that, in hiring the director, he relied on the interview of the coordinator with the applicant. But he admitted that he also interviewed the applicant twice and that, even if the coordinator had not concurred, he might have appointed her.

but all except one of its supporting documents predate the changes of the faculty regulations. Prior to July 20, 1978, the tenure committee was appointed by the president and usually consisted of four members, two of whom were faculty. Their recommendations and reports almost always were referred to the university senate, which would either approve or disapprove the report. But this method of operation had a checkered history. For example, the senate disapproved tenure for Professor Zulma Delgado de Raffo, despite the recommended approval by the committee. However, the president refused to grant her tenure. The senate overruled the committee on other occasions; and in 1974, the president granted tenure to Mulling, without action by the senate.

In any event, on July 20, 1978, this procedure was changed by the establishment of the new faculty regulations. Under them, the president still designated the members of the committee, and he designated the director of the department in which the professor taught, two other members of the administration, and one faculty member.[18] Their recommendations were given directly to the academic dean, and her recommendation went directly to the president. Not only was the senate bypassed, but at least once was the committee itself; for in the case of the application for tenure of Professor Ernesto Valladares, while the committee was examining the various recommendations, they found out that the president had granted tenure some months before, without having consulted with the committee. In addition, as noted above, the president's staff also considered promotions in rank. The application for tenure of Professor Alejandro Apesteguia was given short shift. When his application came before the staff, all favored the granting of tenure, but the vice president noted that he was not qualified and "he is out." And he was.

Finally, the trustees' requirement that not more than 10 percent of the faculty of a department may obtain tenure effectively meant that the decision to grant tenure on the basis of the professor's qualifications will rarely be necessary. On the basis of the record, it cannot be held that the proof sustains the general proposition that the unit employees control or effectively recommend promotions, rank, or tenure of faculty members.

4. Faculty evaluations

Prior to the 1978 regulations, faculty evaluation, criteria, and methods were to be established by the academic council and approved by the university senate or the president. The 1978 regulations changed that vesting in the president all authority over the approval of faculty evaluation, criteria, and methods. There is in the record an evaluation form to be filled out by professors and which was prepared by a committee of six persons, of whom two were professors, but there is no evidence that the forms served any purpose, either changing the status or ensuring the continued employment of any professor. Rather, Struik and Flores, both former department directors, testified that they were in charge of evaluating professors. Martinez testified that the president's staff would review the evaluations made by the directors. Furthermore, the faculty appears to have opposed the entire system of evaluations and specifically requested in February 1978 that there be no evaluation of faculty by faculty or department colleagues. It is unclear whether this request was honored or, if it was not, what effect is given to the evaluations.

5. Student orientation

Faculty were required to participate in the registration and orientation of students. Students would prepare their proposed class schedules and professors would review them to ensure that the student had taken the prerequisite courses, that they were qualified to undertake their major concentration, and that the selected courses were being given, and whether there were still openings in the classes. If the documents from the registrar's office showed that the class had been filled, the professor would suggest a substitute course to the student. Faculty members have also been required to participate and have participated in a variety of orientation activities to interest prospective students to apply to the University.

On one occasion, professors assigned themselves the orientation of students who had previously been assigned to another professor who had assumed another position. There is also slim evidence that, on occasion, professors assigned to themselves various students for orientation and guidance, but it is not clear whether this was on the direction of the department director.

6. Assignment to courses

Domingo testified that the assignment of professors to teach specific courses is carried out in three ways. First, a preliminary schedule is prepared and professors are asked to indicate what courses they would prefer to teach and what times and days that they are unavailable to teach. Sometimes the preliminary schedule is prepared without any consultation with professors; other times it is necessary for the department director or coordinator to discuss with certain professors their availability because certain ones of them specialize or are proficient in particular courses. Second, the coordinator would prepare the schedule based on his or her familiarity with the professors' schedules of courses elsewhere—many professors were pursuing degree programs for their master's or doctorate degree—and the areas of each professor's specialty. Third, the director would ask each professor what he could teach and the director would prepare the schedule. Academic Dean Delfina Fernandez testified in the representation proceeding to yet a fourth method—the coordinator would ask faculty members what they desired to teach and what would be a convenient schedule. The coordinator would then give a list to the department director, who would assign the academic load and then obtain approval from the academic dean. In any event, Respondent contends that, as a result, the faculty effectively proposes the distribution of teaching loads.

Under the above facts, its contention is not accurate, because the university-prepared contracts with full-time professors, the only ones included in the unit, dictate that professors shall teach 15 credits. No one had any choice to vary that term. It appears that assignment of courses was made pursuant to the individual professor's expertise and availability, and not faculty decision; that assignment was ultimately, in any event, within the prerogative of the department director,[16] subject to the approval of the academic dean.[17]

Furthermore, although Melendez earlier testified that a professor had a right, on his own, to divide a class into sections once more than 50 students enrolled, I find that such decision had to be made by the director, with the consent of the office of the registrar.[18] Even if this were not so, the division of one section into two, because class size exceeded 50 students is, at best, a ministerial one and requires neither managerial discretion nor managerial expertise.[19] Otherwise, faculty members had no authority to limit class size. The English faculty had recommended that certain courses be limited in size, but its suggestions were not followed.[20]

7. Curriculum

Faculty members prepare and revise courses and recommend new courses and revision of curriculum, which have been approved and implemented. Some of these functions go little beyond the faculty member's decision of what will be the content of the course entrusted to the teacher and the preparation of a course syllabus or outline. However, there is also interaction between professors about what they will teach. That is caused by a number of factors: Certain courses have more than one section and the sections are taught by more than one professor. The tests for the basic English, Spanish, and mathematics courses are jointly prepared by the respective faculty of those courses, although it is unclear who prompted this decision. In any event, because of that decision, professors desired to ensure that the same material was being taught, because it would be unfair to the students to be tested on material that was not covered. Furthermore, if an introductory course in a subject does not cover certain fundamentals, students will not be able to understand other principles in a more advanced course. Accordingly, professors have met to ensure that course contents mesh and that the ultimate result of a department's course contents are sufficient to satisfy a thorough education in a major program.

Syllabi of courses have been prepared collegially, by department; course contents have also been prepared and revised collegially; catalogue descriptions have been written; textbooks have been recommended and those recommendations have been generally followed—all this with the active participation of professors, but also in the presence of coordinators and department directors.[21] The record is not precise in indicating the extent of the department director's participation,[22] except that the syllabus is normally given by the professor to the department director, who would then make recommendations about it. In addition, it appears that curriculum changes must be approved by the academic board, on which the department directors serve.

There have been other areas where, Respondent contends, faculty have been instrumental in making major changes in curriculum. The administration in or about 1978 instituted a study concerning the effective method of competing with other institutions of higher learning in Puerto Rico. During the study, it was revealed that Respondent required its students to successfully complete more credits than other universities. The administration determined to reduce the number of credits in all programs and fields of studies; and, based on that policy decision, it was primarily the professors whose expertise was sought in recommending which courses should be dropped or how course studies should be consolidated to effectuate the reduction of credits. Certain proposals, however, were not fully adopted, such as in the social work program and the elimination of a course on the history of Puerto Rico.

Other faculty recommendations have not been approved. For example, in 1979, changes in the contents of various courses in the education department were ignored. In 1977, Sonia Flores, then dean of the education department, established a committee of professors which recommended methods to improve the academic performance of the department's students. The academic board refused to adopt the recommendations. In 1977 and 1978, another committee was convened to make recommendations regarding admission into the department. They selected students by academic score who should be [16] Bowman testified that it was Respondent's practice that the dean of the department would assign classes after conferring with each professor. But he also stated that it was the coordinator who gave professors their programs and, if the professor was dissatisfied, he would apply to the department director to change his assignment. Flores stated that one of her functions as dean of the education department was to assign professors course schedules which she prepared. However, Maria del Carmen Curras, as coordinator of the Spanish department, testified at the representation hearing that she prepared the schedule for each semester, based on a course list given by the director and taking into consideration the professor's preference for scheduling and academic load. She would then recommend a schedule to the department director, who would decide whether or not to adopt it. The director would resolve any conflict, if one arose.

[17] In considering whether to grant tenure to Professor Bowman, Domingo, as part of his lengthy recommendation to refuse tenure, cited Bowman's intemperate refusal to teach the classes to which he had been assigned, Bowman stating that: "This is the worst distribution of courses in the world." Domingo stated that he sent Bowman a memorandum advising that the "academic load that had been assigned to him . . . was his responsibility." Domingo also testified that he and Struik cooperated in the assignment of professors to courses of the humanities department and those of CDEOC. Domingo's report on Bowman and his later testimony are hardly consistent with Respondent's contention that professors chose their own classes and schedules.

[18] Del Carmen testified that directors determined how many sections were required for a course.

[19] No one testified as to how the rule was enacted pertaining to classes of 50 students or more. It is clear, however, that the division of a class added another section which would have to be taught and, if it required a professor to teach more than 15 credits, additional wages would have to be paid by Respondent to that professor.

[20] The only time that a class was limited was the language laboratory, which had only 32 cubicles and thus room for only 32 students. But after some period, even the method of assigning students to the laboratory was changed and apparently no limit was placed on the number of students.

[21] Felix Struik, who was formerly a member of the board of trustees, the academic dean, and the director of the humanities department, testified that professors are not required to use the same textbook, even though it had been recommended by the director; and that professors may teach in different ways. I so find.

admitted. As to those whom they rejected, they recommended assistance that could be offered in order to help them to make successful reapplications. The academic board refused to accept the recommendations; and the rejected applicants were admitted into the department, because the University traditionally maintained an "open admissions" policy which would be violated by the imposition of grade qualifications. Similarly, in the English program, faculty recommendations of grade levels for retention and graduation were not implemented.

The faculty played a major role in the development of several programs. In 1975, the United States Congress enacted the Education of the Handicapped Act, 20 U.S.C. Sec. 1401 et seq., requiring that disabled and handicapped children be afforded their public schooling with all other children. As a consequence, education faculty members recommended changes in curriculum to ensure that students who were to enter the teaching profession be familiar with the problems of the handicapped and disabled and have the necessary skills to deal with them. A thorough proposal was prepared calling for the institution of eight or more new courses. However, only two were approved in the form suggested, and another one was approved but modified. Although many new programs had previously been submitted for approval to the university senate, these were not, Melendez explaining merely that "they were courses needed to be completed for the certification of teachers in the special education area."

As far back as 1974, other kinds of faculty proposals met with varying success. A proposal to differentiate between courses of English as a second language from English as a native language was not accepted,[23] but a proposal to revise the English curriculum to four levels was implemented. Another recommendation was to change assignments of students by the registrar's office to the appropriate courses based on their college board examinations to a requirement that students be given an English placement test. The rationale for the recommendation was that the professors were faced with new students who had vast differences of comprehension and knowledge of English. The placement test was proposed so that they could be assigned four courses that would be geared to their knowledge; but what was adopted by the administration 3 years later was permission to place the students into one of only two beginning courses: either prebasic or basic English. The professors were disheartened, because they felt that the test involved much work with minimal results. The test was given only 1 year, and the faculty lost interest. Finally, the department's suggestion of an alternate registration procedure was not implemented.

About 1979, the English faculty, dissatisfied with the curriculum of the basic English course the previous school year, proposed a diagnostic test which was administered in 1980. They also evaluated textbooks for the course and had authority to retain a consultant. Their recommendations were ultimately not implemented.

There appears throughout to be an attempt by faculty members to limit entry into programs to students who by grade-average demonstrated that they could complete adequately their work. Due to the "open admissions" policy, these grade-average recommendations for commencing or continuing their major fields of study do not appear to have been approved generally. However, when they were, Mulling testified that they were avoided by the simple device of permitting students to repeat courses with an easier marking professor or on an individual study basis and take their better grades.[24] The students were not required to attend class. Otherwise, attendance of students was monitored by the registrar's office. Similarly, the faculty recommended grade averages for graduation, but this recommendation was also disregarded. However, faculty recommendations for prerequisites of courses were generally adopted, as were recommendations of the courses needed to be completed for graduation.

In addition, major actions have been taken by the administration, not the faculty, which went to the very heart of the curriculum of the University. Until 1976, new students were admitted directly into one of the four departments. The academic council, with the approval of the president, changed the procedure; and students entering in the 1977–1978 school year were required to take basic courses and, then, in their second year, would apply to the department of their choice. Up to 1979, the professors utilized the standard curve for grading students (i.e., A=90–100). The administration, notwithstanding faculty opposition, directed that professors thereafter use a normal distribution curve, the effect being that a greater percentage of students successfully completed their courses.

8. Library policies

At least according to practice demonstrated to exist in 1975, it appears that unit members recommend that the library purchase various books. No showing was made of the amount of the yearly expenditures for purchase of books and magazines or of the amount specifically recommended by the faculty or of the amount of the total budget of Respondent. It is thus difficult to assess the impact of the faculty's actions in this regard, assuming, arguendo, that recommendations for the purchases of books constitute an indicia of managerial status.[25]

9. Faculty meetings

Three documents dating from 1973, 1974, and 1975 were introduced by Respondent, which does not unfortunately point out what I am to glean therefrom. Not only are they relatively ancient but also the most that can be said is that Respondent's president controlled and dominated one meeting, instructing the faculty what he wanted done. That faculty members have meetings is almost a truism. That they adopt policies which are binding on Respondent, or effectively recommend the same, is quite another matter. Respondent's submissions on this matter prove nothing.

[23] Mulling worked on this project in close cooperation with Vincent Norelli, the director of Respondent's office of planning and development. He had previously participated in establishing the same program at another university.

[24] Mulling testified that this was not the result of faculty action, a statement which was not rebutted and which I find is truthful. I, therefore, infer that the device was specifically sanctioned by the administration, which appears to be the only other entity which could have effected this technique. Mulling testified that she believed that she spoke with the dean of humanities to protest, but to no avail.

[25] None of the decisions cited by the parties and my research reveal an instance where the Board or a court has relied on the recommendation for the purchase of books to support a finding of managerial status.

10. Faculty development and planning

In August 1981, members of the faculty formed an ad hoc committee on the development of the faculty, met twice, and issued a report. The record fails to reveal that the report was adopted, in whole or in part, by Respondent. Respondent contends that the faculty plans the development of the University, but any argument that faculty participation was meaningful was put to rest by Martinez, who, when discussing the planning committee, testified: "The decision was made by the presidency. I imagine it was the president and the vice president because they were the ones who made the important decisions at all times."

11. Supervisory teachers and students

The curriculum of the department of education required that the students practice their skills at elementary and high schools and, at least sometime after 1976, the faculty indicated its difficulty in placing the students in the different schools in Bayamon and the advantage to the University if it would have a school devoted to its students for practice. Subsequently, as noted above, the University purchased Colegio La Milagrosa and Colegio Santa Rita. However, the record is barren of proof that it was the department's recommendation that prompted the University to purchase the schools or another reason.

In any event, in the placement of the students, it was necessary to obtain assistant teachers to directly oversee the practice teaching of education students. This was accomplished by the department director, who contacted the superintendent of schools and then the principals of the schools where the practice was to be conducted. The principals then asked for volunteers. The assistant teachers received originally $50 per semester, an amount which was later increased to $80 on the recommendation of the education department, which found that it was unable to persuade individuals to become assistant teachers at the lesser amount. The increase was approved by academic dean and paid by the University.[26] There is nothing to demonstrate that the faculty either hired the assistant teachers or granted the increase. The recommendation was the result not of managerial decision, but of necessity.

Finally, some students were employed in the physical education department to do various jobs, such as lending equipment, cleaning the office, and delivering letters and messages, for which they were paid. Various professors certified that the students worked the hours that they wrote on timecards. There is no evidence that the professors hired the students or acted as their supervisors. I infer that these jobs were given by the University to needy students as part of a financial aid package, but cannot infer anything else, particularly whether the faculty possessed managerial or supervisory functions.

12. Student discipline

The record reveals that faculty members are members of a student disciplinary committee, along with representatives of the administration and the student body. Through 1977, three faculty members were elected by the faculty, but the record is not wholly clear what proportion of the total committee they represented or under what authority they came to serve. In 1978, new student regulations were issued unilaterally by the administration. All the committee members were appointed, except for the president, who automatically served. Two professors were appointed by the academic dean, two administration representatives were appointed by the president, and one representative of the administration was appointed by the dean for student affairs. There were also vacancies of two representatives of the student council. Thus, of eight members, only two were members of the faculty. In addition, there is no evidence that the committee ever disciplined anyone or did anything other than meet each year to hear the president explain its duties.

13. Budget

The science faculty was asked for lists of materials and equipment which they needed for teaching their courses, but the record does not demonstrate that they did so. The physical education coordinator requested various equipment, such as balls, bats, and bows and arrows, and Melendez testified that she routinely approved the request. On the other hand, her testimony was unclear as to whether the request was made at the first instance by the faculty, or whether the faculty was guided by the finance department's preliminary budget, which set forth amounts recommended for each department. It was nonetheless clear that, if Melendez determined that a request was unreasonable, she had the authority to disapprove it. Similarly, as stated above, the president openly declared that all fiscal matters were within the complete control of him and the board of trustees.

14. Tuitions

The faculty makes no decisions regarding the fees to be charged to students. Respondent's documentary proof shows only that in 1972, the president forwarded to the university senate a proposed letter that he desired to send to parents of students, explaining the need to increase Respondent's fees for the 1972–1973 academic year. No request for the faculty's approval of the increase was sought, nor does the exhibit reveal that it was given. All that was sought was the senate's views on the contents of the letter and, once again, the record is barren of any response. It cannot be found that unit members have any input in Respondent's decisions to raise its charges to students.

[26] I note, however, the ambiguous testimony of Melendez, who stated that the assistant teachers were not employees of the education department, but of the Puerto Rico Department of Education. I understand her testimony to be that the assistant teacher's primary employment was as a teacher in the public school system and paid a bonus of $50 or $80 as a supplement for assisting Respondent's students in their teaching practice. I reject her testimony that the faculty had the authority to increase the amount of the bonus. The record shows that the University was new, relatively poor, and struggling, constantly seeking new programs to compete with other institutions in Puerto Rico. I find it improbable that the faculty had any right to incur monetary obligations for Respondent without the consent of the administration, particularly in light of the president's position that he and the board of trustees had control of all fiscal matters.

15. Faculty association

It is not clear when the faculty association was formed; the earliest minutes in the record indicate that it was in existence in early 1975. Nor is it clear who formed the association, because in the first paragraph of its regulations there is an indication that someone formed it, but who is unidentified.[27] The objectives of the association are to "[p]rocure the improvement of the associates and defend their professional, teaching and cultural interests [and] [p]romote and cooperate with the identification, definition and realization of the philosophy and educational, cultural and social goals of [the University] and of education in Puerto Rico," the italicized portion (emphasis supplied) partially, albeit ambiguously, supporting Respondent's claim that it was managerial in concept.

Brugueras testified that the faculty association consisted of both teaching and administrative personnel and that it "tried to establish a type of regulations for the faculty as such." She recalled that "a series of norms were recommended from within the faculty along the terms of the contracts, general performance of the faculty as such, and in that committee there were administrators, members of the faculty, and it was then that the faculty manual used in the institution was created." This manual was the faculty regulations which, in the past, had been prepared by the academic dean and was approved by the senate and which the president and board of trustees unilaterally changed in 1978.

An examination of the record leads me to conclude that the association was actually formed in the faculty's self-interest, and that its actions, rather than recommendations to the University, were pleas for relief. Thus, it proposed and was granted (mostly at cost only to the faculty, not Respondent) medical, life insurance, and retirement plans. It was interested in obtaining, and was granted, a faculty parking area. It made proposals for payment of salaries and vacation pay and showed interest in establishing a savings and credit cooperative. It was asked to review the faculty evaluations and expressed rather strong disagreement with the concept and asked the academic board: "If the professors are evaluated by their respective deans, we see no reason why the deans should not be evaluated by their professors."

16. Additional alleged indicia of managerial status

There are a number of other faculty functions which, Respondent alleges, evidence managerial status. I have considered the following and find no basis for and no need to comment further on Respondent's contentions that they constitute managerial functions: that faculty members choose their offices and the colleagues with whom they wish to share the offices; that faculty members' aid was enlisted in preparing and running Christmas parties;[28] that a club organized by a faculty member published a newspaper;[29] that faculty members, together with the administration, published a faculty journal, with articles by faculty members and others;[30] and that faculty members participated in a television series which was paid for by the University and which was directed by Martinez.

17. Discussion

In Yeshiva University, 444 U.S at 686, the Court stated that the "controlling consideration"

> . . . is that the faculty . . . exercise authority which in any other context unquestionably would be managerial. Their authority in academic matters is absolute. They decide what courses will be offered, when they will be scheduled, and to whom they will be taught. They debate and determine teaching methods, grading, policies, and matriculation standards. They effectively decide which students will be admitted, retained, and graduated. On occasion their views have determined the size of the student body, the tuition to be charged, and the location of a school. When one considers the function of a university, it is difficult to imagine decisions more managerial than these. To the extent the industrial analogy applies, the faculty determines within each school the product to be produced, the terms upon which it will be offered, and the customers to be served.[23]

The closest that the facts in this proceeding approach those of Yeshiva University is in the area of course offerings. Unquestionably, the faculty plays a role in what courses will be taught, but their authority is nowhere as absolute as that exercised in Yeshiva University. For instance, it was the administration which instructed profes-

[27] The first paragraph of the regulations reads:

> This being the YEAR OF THE FACULTY, as declared by the President of Bayamon Central University and following the recommendations of the Middle States Associations in relation to more Faculty participation in the development and organization, fundamentally academic, of the University, I consider it appropriate to form a Faculty Association to aid in the improvement of the Institution in general and particularly of the Faculty.

[23] The record shows that faculty members . . . also play a predominant role in faculty hiring, tenure, sabbaticals, termination and promotion. . . . These decisions clearly have both managerial and supervisory characteristics. Since we do not reach the question of supervisory status, we need not rely primarily on these features of faculty authority.

[28] Even with respect to such minor functions as running Christmas parties, the president issued directions as to how the party should be organized.

[29] All clubs were required to have constitutions approved by the dean of students; otherwise, they were not permitted to function. Before the newspaper was distributed on campus, it also had to be approved by the dean of students.

[30] The magazine was directed by six administrators and five professors.

sors to reduce the course requirements for degrees in various programs, and it was primarily the administration that devised the plans and policies for the institution of new programs, the faculty merely filling in the details of the programs, some with recommendations for budgets and hiring of personnel.

An overview of the records reveals that many of the actions taken by faculty members were the result of the administration's response to recommendations or criticisms of Middle States so that Respondent could retain its accreditation. In addition, the development of new programs, in particular, was the result of Respondent's desires (1) to continue to attract new students which, of course, is the basis of its business; and (2) to attract Federal support for its programs. That Respondent's administration sets the ultimate policy does not necessarily negate the possibility that the faculty is managerial and require a holding that they are employees, who are, in this instance, professional. However, in weighing the totality of what Respondent's professors do, it is certainly telling that much of their major contribution derives from the implementation of policy set by the president and board of trustees and from merely following orders. Indeed, in one exhibit, a department director bemoaned the fact that she could not retain any professor to prepare a program, because the professors had sufficient classroom work and she could not force them to do other work.

In pursuing the policies of the administration, much of the work of professors could be characterized as professional, rather than managerial. For example, the social work program was based on the standards set forth by the council on social work. The special education project was implemented by the education department because it was required by the new Federal law. The English courses were devised by the English professors because they were the ones who understood English. This is not intended to belittle what was probably the result of some initiative on the part of the professors, but, hopefully, puts into better perspective what they were doing.

In addition, I do not intend to detract from functions of the senate, which was informed of almost everything that occurred at the University and has discussed, voted on, and approved major new academic programs leading to bachelor's degrees and has contributed, through committees, to policies established by the administration. On the other hand, before a new curriculum was proposed to the senate, the president reviewed it; and one of the exhibits reveals an objection made by a faculty member that only those programs which were initiated by the administration appeared to succeed, whereas faculty-initiated curriculum proposals appeared to universally fail. The president did not deny the allegation, but stated that perhaps the reason was that the proposals were not drafted well. Furthermore, the implementation of the programs was normally entrusted to the director of the affected department, in close collaboration with the academic dean.

In sum, it cannot be fairly concluded that faculty control over curriculum was absolute. At best, it was partial and the result of professional knowledge. Other than curriculum, there is little to support Respondent's contention. Unlike Yeshiva University, professors do not decide when courses will be scheduled. With the policy of open admissions, and despite faculty recommendations that more capable students be enrolled in their respective programs, it was the administration which decided who shall be taught, and not the faculty. There is no evidence that the faculty decided which students will be admitted, retained, or graduated. The faculty's views have not determined the size of the student body, the tuition to be charged, the location of a school, or anything related to the financial affairs of the University, those being the exclusive domain of Respondent's administration. Unlike the secondary features of faculty authority noted in footnote 23 of Yeshiva University, quoted above, the faculty plays no role in hiring, tenure, sabbaticals, termination, and promotion. Finally, even in those areas where the faculty has contributed, recommendations have frequently been disregarded.

The decisions of the Board have rested on a case-by-case analysis of the facts, no two colleges being identical. Bradford College, 261 NLRB 565 (1982), comes closest to the facts in this proceeding. Here, like Bradford, governance of the Respondent was not democratic, but was a government by the president and the board of trustees. All major changes in curriculum had to be approved by them. Faculty salaries are determined by them. Teaching loads and requirements for teaching were decided by them and the chancellor. Tenure and rank were subject to the whim of the president and his staff. The method of grading was altered over the opposition of faculty. Faculty recommendations of curriculum were accepted or rejected, as the president wished. Faculty regulations were not submitted to, or approved by, the faculty. Faculty recommendations of requirements for admission into departments were rejected. Faculty participation in all meaningful actions was a minority participation, with Respondent's administration being firmly in control.

Loretto Heights College, 264 NLRB 1107 (1982), is also instructive. There, the faculty had more powers than are evidenced here. Nonetheless, the Board found that the professors were not managerial. Among the factors leading to that conclusion were that, as here, (1) the participation of faculty in committee work was merely incidental to or in addition to their primary functions of teaching, research, and writing; (2) most of the actions taken in which faculty members participated were recommendations and advices; (3) no faculty member was authorized to take any action on his own initiative, which was final and binding on Respondent; and (4) whereas in Yeshiva University, the administrative staff was small and there was no effective buffer between the faculty and the administration, here there is a chain of authority from department directors, to academic dean, to president, and to board of trustees. Somewhere in this chain are the chancellor and the president's staff. The department directors are administrators, not instructors, and they attend all department meetings and ultimately approve or reject all faculty actions.

By consequence, I conclude that the faculty of Respondent is not managerial.[31]

III. THE SUPERVISORY STATUS OF PROFESSORS

In the representation proceeding, the Regional Director for Region 24 determined that none of the faculty members were supervisors within the meaning of Section 2(1) of the Act. He wrote, at footnote 5:

> The Employer, contrary to Petitioner, alternatively contends that all faculty members of the University are managerial personnel or supervisory and therefore not employees within the meaning of the Act, or, if not found to be managerial employees, that any unit found appropriate herein should exclude, as supervisory, its coordinators.
> In contending that no faculty bargaining unit can be appropriate because all faculty members—by virtue of their group participation in the University's Senate Committee—are managerial and/or supervisory and are, thereby, not employees within the meaning of the Act, the Employer relies upon N.L.R.B. v. Yeshiva University, 582 F.2d 686 (CA 2, 1978), wherein the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit reversed the Board Order therein (holding that faculty members are professional employees within the meaning of the Act), and found that all the full-time faculty of Yeshiva University were outside the Act's jurisdiction because they collectively possess certain attributes of supervisors.
> While noting that the decision in Yeshiva University is currently pending review in the U.S. Supreme Court, the undersigned is bound by Board precedent, absent a contrary determination by the U.S. Supreme Court. Thus, as in Yeshiva University, supra, the undisputed evidence reflects that "faculty participation in collegial decision making is on a collective rather than individual basis, is exercised in the faculty's own interest rather than 'in the interest of the employer,' and that final authority rests with the board of trustees." Id at 1054. Furthermore, unlike Yeshiva University where the faculty committees therein met on a regular and continuing basis, the uncontradicted evidence established that the Academic Senate Committee, the Rank and Tenure Committee and the Planification Committee rarely, if ever, meet as a group, with the last session of the University Senate held in May 1978. In fact, the Employer's witness could neither recall if these latter two committees had met this year nor the extent of faculty participation on said committees. Moreover, the University's President testified, without contradiction, that he had veto power over any programs proposed by the Senate. In view thereof and in accord with the Board's decision in Yeshiva University, supra, I find that faculty members are professional employees under the Act. See, Northeastern University, 218 NLRB 247; University of Miami, 213 NLRB 634.
> Contrary to the Petitioner who would include the coordinators in the petitioned-for unit, the Employer would exclude said group as supervisors within the meaning of the Act. The record reveals that the University employs 9 faculty coordinators, 4 in the Humanities Department, 4 in the Science and 1 in the Education Departments, with each coordinator assigned six professors from the full-time, temporary or part-time faculty, to his or her team. The coordinators, who are selected by the concerned department chairman, hold meetings with their team members to transmit information or instructions from the department chairman, gather the students' course selections and submit them to the chairman, help in the preparation for registration of students and prepare class schedules for the professors on their team. In performing this latter duty, which appears to be their most important function, the coordinators prepare such schedules from both a list of approved courses and the teaching schedule drawn by the department director. More importantly, in the event of a scheduling conflict among professors the coordinator refers the matter to the department director for resolution. The coordinators have regular faculty appointments, carry the same workload as other full-time or temporary faculty members, do not receive any extra pay or stipend because their performance is limited to under twenty hours a semester. Unlike department chairmen, whom the parties appear to agree are supervisory personnel, it is undisputed that the coordinators as such have nothing to do with personnel action affecting the faculty members, do not evaluate the performance of their members or, possess any other indicia of supervisory authority as defined in the Act. In these circumstances, I find the coordinators are not supervisors within the meaning of the Act, and, therefore, shall include them in the unit. Adelphi University, 195 NLRB 639.

The Board declined to grant review of that decision, and Respondent seeks herein to relitigate that issue. Board law requires that, unless special circumstances are shown, or newly discovered evidence appears, not available at the time of the representation proceeding, there may be no relitigation in a subsequent 8(a)(5) refusal-to-bargain proceeding; but in light of the still unsettled nature of Respondent's claim,[32] I permitted Respondent to introduce whatever additional evidence it believed supported its position.

On my review of the record, I conclude that there were no facts introduced by Respondent which persuade me that the Regional Director's decision was incorrect and, on reconsideration, there is no special circumstance which permits Respondent to renew its previously rejected contentions or to relitigate that which it could have raised earlier. Noranda Aluminum, 268 NLRB No. 223 (Feb. 29, 1984). I thus find no merit in any of Respondent's contentions and find that Respondent's professors are not supervisors within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act.

[31] However, although Respondent has contended that the faculty as a body is managerial, it has not based its opposition against any particular professor or group of professors. It was its burden to do so, if it desired. Montefiore Hospital & Medical Center, 261 NLRB 569, 572 fn. 17 (1982). I am constrained to call the parties' attention to the fact that Veerkamp is a member of Respondent's board of trustees and, under the rationale of this decision, could not be deemed anything but managerial.

[32] Yeshiva University did not reach the question of the supervisory status of the university's professors. 444 U.S at 686 fn. 23.

IV. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

The unfair labor practices are clear, simple, and not disputed, with the exception of one matter. After the Union was certified, it made numerous requests of Respondent to bargain. Its letters of February 19 and March 26, 1980, went unanswered. Its letters of May 13, June 6, and July 2, 1980, were replied to by Respondent, which stated that it was either studying the matter or could not determine whether or not to bargain with the Union, in view of the Supreme Court's decisions in Catholic Bishop and Yeshiva University. That Respondent has refused to bargain is implicit in its failure to respond to the Union's letters or its failure to agree to bargain with the Union.

Furthermore, as noted above, without bargaining with and without notice to the Union, Respondent issued a memorandum on May 20, 1980, which provided that, commencing with the summer term 1980 and the academic year 1980–1981, classes would be assigned only to teachers having a master's degree. No such qualification had previously existed. This resulted in the discharge of the following professors, including some who previously been hired to teach in the summer term: Marcos F. Reyes Davila, Hector Aponte Luna, Jose Luis Perez, Pedro Cebollero Perez, and Ramon Antonia Guzman Rivera.

The only discharge which appears to be contested is that of Merril Bowman Waller, who was discharged by the president on June 26, 1980. Earlier that year, on January 31, Bowman was denied tenure by the president, but the basis for his action was unexplained. However, the tenure committee based its recommendation that Bowman not be granted tenure on the following grounds: (1) that Bowman had not obtained his master's degree; (2) that Bowman had served a probationary period of 7 years; (3) that Bowman was only an instructor and had not obtained the rank of assistant professor, a requirement for tenure; (4) that the humanities department and English major already had at least 10 percent of its faculty on tenure; and (5) that the University would not be served well by issuing Bowman tenure, which would permit him to remain for 10 years. As noted above, items (1) and (4) were unilaterally promulgated without bargaining after Respondent was required to bargain. Item (2) was not a basis for the denial of tenure, according to my understanding of the faculty regulations, and the only possibly legitimate grounds were items (3) and (5).

However, none of these grounds, even if they warranted denial of tenure, similarly required dismissal from the University. Although the faculty regulations state that "every member of the Faculty shall serve for a probationary period of not more than seven (7) consecutive years," the president issued an administrative order on December 31, 1978, clarifying that the quoted sentence did "not establish either the choice of granting tenure or dispensing with the services rendered by the professor" but left open the option, inter alia, of denying tenure and issuing another contract. Based on the discharge of other professors solely because they did not have master's degrees in accordance with the unilaterally and illegally imposed new term and condition of employment issued by the president, I conclude that the General Counsel has established a prima facie case that Bowman's discharge was similarly illegally motivated.[33]

The university president did not testify and there is no basis, whatsoever, to conclude that Respondent had a valid reason for discharging Bowman. As noted above, the reasons for denial of tenure are not the equivalent of the justification for discharge. Indeed, two other professors, Brugueras and Joseph Morris, were previously denied tenure but received new contracts of employment. Accordingly, Respondent has not met its burden of proof; and I conclude that Bowman was illegally discharged by reason of Respondent's application of a unilaterally promulgated rule, in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980), enfd. on other grounds 662 F.2d 899 (1st Cir. 1981), cert. denied 455 U.S. 989 (1982); NLRB v. Transportation Management Corp., 462 U.S. 393 (1983).

In addition, Respondent unilaterally issued a second memorandum on July 11, 1980, that required of teachers not only a master's degree but also 12 credits in the studies of any course to which they would be assigned. Jose Maldonado Beltran and Severino Bermudez Varela were advised by Respondent on August 25, 1980, that they would not be teaching any courses during the academic year because there were no courses available in their areas of expertise, a decision which was based solely on the newly promulgated directive. Both had previously taught the same courses to which they were then being denied assignment. The discharge of and failure to appoint these teachers were clearly the result of newly and unilaterally initiated and imposed conditions of employment, in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

Finally, the Union called a strike on September 3, 1980, because of Respondent's continuing refusal to bargain—an unfair labor practice strike. On November 13, 1980, Respondent received the Union's unconditional offer, dated November 12, 1980, for the strikers to return to work. However, Respondent refused to reinstate any of the following strikers, in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act: Brunilda Ferrer Silva, Efrain Ayala Medina, Juan Garcia Marchand, Irma Brugueras Laborde, Juanita Guzman Morales, Jose R. Colon Rodriguez, Maria Lopez Pagan, Ricardo Cruz Garcia, Sylvia Mulling, Maria Curras Lorenzo, Hortencia Panetto Ortiz,[34] Marta Ramos Ortiz, Laura Rios Rodriguez, [33] This conclusion is not affected by the testimony of Bowman that he did, in fact, possess a master's degree and that the university catalogue listed him as having a master's degree from the University of Bridgeport. Respondent's documents denying Bowman tenure find that there was no evidence of such a degree.

[34] Respondent contended that Panetto was sick during the strike but also stipulated that Panetto was on the picket line on more than one occasion. I conclude that she joined the strike.

Evelyn Robles Melendez, and Ernesto Valladares Pombo.

V. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES UPON COMMERCE

Respondent's activities set forth in section V, above, occurring in connection with the operations of Respondent described in section II, above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States, and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow thereof.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Universidad Central de Bayamon is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Union de Profesores Universitarious (UPU) is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. At all times material herein the Union has been and is the sole and exclusive collective-bargaining representative of all of Respondent's employees in the following unit held appropriate for collective bargaining:

> All full-time teaching personnel employed by Respondent at its Bayamon, Puerto Rico campus, including lecturers, instructors, temporary faculty, auxillary professors, associate professors, professors and athletic instructors/coaches; but, excluding all other employees, all part-time teaching personnel, maintenance personnel, directors, all administrative, office clerical employees, guards and all supervisors as defined in the Act.

5. By refusing since February 19, 1980, to bargain collectively with the Union with regard to wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment of the employees in the appropriate unit described above, and by unilaterally, and without bargaining to impasse with the Union, imposing new requirements that teachers have master's degrees and possess 12 credits in the studies of any course to which they would be assigned, Respondent has failed and refused to bargain in good faith in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

5. By discharging Marcos F. Reyes Davila, Hector Aponte Luna, Jose Luis Perez, Pedro Cebollero Perez, Raymon Antonio Guzman Rivera; and Merril Bowman Waller, Jose Maldonado Beltran, and Severineo Bermudez Varela by reason of the application of the newly and unilaterally instituted terms and conditions of employment, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

6. Commencing on September 3, 1980, the Union engaged in an unfair labor practice strike against Respondent.

7. On November 12, 1980, the Union unconditionally offered that the strikers would return to work.

8. By refusing to reinstate Brunilda Ferrer Silva, Efrain Ayala Medina, Juan Garcia Marchand, Irma Brugueras Laborde, Juanita Guzman Morales, Jose R. Colon Rodriguez, Maria Lopez Pagan, Ricardo Cruz Garcia, Sylvia Mulling, Maria Curras Lorenzo, Hortencia Panetto Ortiz, Marta Ramos Ortiz, Laura Rios Rodriguez, Evelyn Robles Melendez, and Ernesto Valladares Pombo, Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

9. The above unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce with the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act, I shall recommend that it cease and desist therefrom, post an appropriate notice, and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the purposes and policies of the Act, including, on request, to bargain in good faith with the Union, and to rescind the unilateral changes of terms and conditions of employment set forth above.

In order to ensure that the employees in the appropriate unit will be accorded the services of their selected bargaining agent for the period provided by law, I shall recommend that the initial period of certification begin on the date that Respondent commences to bargain in good faith with the Union as the recognized bargaining representative in the appropriate unit. Mar-Jac Poultry Co. 136 NLRB 785 (1962); Lamar Hotel, 140 NLRB 226, 229 (1962), enfd. 328 F.2d 600 (5th Cir. 1964), cert. denied 379 U.S. 817 (1964); Burnett Construction Co., 149 NLRB 1419, 1421 (1964), enfd. 350 F.2d 57 (10th Cir. 1965).

Additionally, because employees were discharged due to the unilateral institution of new terms and conditions of employment and because other employees engaged in an unfair labor practice strike and were denied reemployment after they unconditionally offered to make themselves available for work, I shall recommend that Respondent be ordered to offer Marcos F. Reyes Davila, Hector Aponte Luna, Jose Luis Perez, Pedro Cebollero Perez, Ramon Antonio Guzman Rivera, Merril Bowman Waller, Jose Maldonado Beltran, Severino Bermudez Varela, Brunilda Ferrer Silva, Efrain Ayala Medina, Juan Garcia Marchand, Irma Brugueras Laborde, Juanita Guzman Morales, Maria Curras Lorenzo, Hortencia Panetto Ortiz, Mara Ramo Ortiz, Laura Rios Rodriguez, Evelyn Robles Melendez, and Ernesto Valladares Pombo immediate and full reinstatement to their former positions or, if such positions no longer exists, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privilges, dismissing, if necessary, replacement employees, and to make them whole for any loss of earnings they may have suffered by reason of their discharges, or refusals to reinstate, as the case may be, by paying them sums of money equal to that which they normally would have earned absent the discharges and failure to reinstate, less earnings during such period, with interest thereon to be computed in the manner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[35]

Continued

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[36]

ORDER

The Respondent, Universidad Central de Bayamon, Puerto Rico, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to recognize and bargain with Union de Profesores Universitarios (UPU) as the exclusive representative of its employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All full-time teaching personnel employed by Respondent at its Bayamon, Puerto Rico campus, including lecturers, instructors, temporary faculty, auxillary professors, associate professors, professors and athletic instructors/coaches; but, excluding all other employees, all part-time teaching personnel, maintenance personnel, directors, all administrative, office clerical employees, guards and all supervisors as defined in the Act.

(b) Refusing to bargain in good faith with the Union by unilaterally instituting changes in qualifications for teaching positions and other changes of terms or conditions of employment, without notifying, consulting, and bargaining with the Union as exclusive representative of its employees in the above appropriate unit.

(c) Failing promptly to reinstate employees on an unconditional offer to return to work in order to discourage them from engaging in concerted and protected activities and in order to discourage their membership in the Union.

(d) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) On request of the Union, bargain collectively with it as the exclusive representative of all of Respondent's employees in the above appropriate unit and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement.

(b) On request of the Union, rescind the unilateral changes of qualifications for teaching positions, to wit, the requirement that teachers have a master's degree and possess 12 credits in the studies of any course to which they would be assigned.

(c) Offer Marcos F. Reyes Davila, Hector Aponte Luna, Jose Luis Perez, Pedro Cebollero Perez, Ramon Antonio Guzman Rivera, Merril Bowman Waller, Jose Maldonado Beltran, Severino Bermudez Varela, Brunilda Ferrer Silva, Efrain Ayala Medina, Juan Garcia Marchand, Irma Brugueras Laborde, Juanita Guzman Morales, Jose R. Colon Rodriguez, Maria Lopez Pagan, Ricardo Cruz Garcia, Sylvia Mulling, Maria Curras Lorenzo, Hortencia Panetto Ortiz, Marta Ramos Ortiz, Laura Rios Rodriguez, Evelyn Robles Melendez, and Ernesto Valladares Pombo immediate and full reinstatement to their former positions, without prejudice to their seniority and other rights and privileges, dismissing, if necessary, replacement employees, and make them whole for any loss of earnings suffered by reason of the discrimination against them, with interest thereon, to be computed as described in the remedy section of this decision.

(d) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(e) Post at its institution in Bayamon, Puerto Rico, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[37] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 24, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(f) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED for the purpose of determining the duration of the Union's certification as the representative of Respondent's employees in the appropriate unit, the certification period is extended to a date 1 year from the date Respondent commences to bargain in good faith with the Union.

the 15 credits required in their contract. The backpay liability recommended herein specifically includes backpay for additional courses that the employees may have been offered to teach.

[36] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[37] If this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

John Kirkpatrick and Cheryl Kirkpatrick, a partnership d/b/a Karsh's Bakery and Bakery, Confectionary and Tobacco Workers International Union of America, Local No. 85. Case 32–CA–4120

14 December 1984

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

On 30 December 1982 Administrative Law Judge Gordon J. Myatt issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Charging Party filed an answering brief. The General Consel and the Charging Party also filed exceptions and supporting briefs.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions[1] to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order, and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.

The judge found that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by withdrawing recognition from the Union and failing to bargain with it concerning modification of a collective-bargaining agreement, and by repudiating that agreement, after the Respondent filed a petition in bankruptcy. He further found that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) by constructively discharging five employees who refused to work under the terms thus set by the Respondent.

We have considered the judge's decision in light of the Supreme Court's subsequent decision in NLRB v. Bildisco & Bildisco, above, and will modify it accordingly. Briefly, we agree that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) by withdrawing recognition, and that the five employees were unlawfully discharged when they refused to work without representation. Under Bildisco, however, the Respondent's other conduct did not violate the Act, and there is no independent make-whole remedy for the 8(a)(5) violation.

In Bildisco, the Court held that 8(d) procedures do not apply to an employer's rejection of a collective-bargaining contract in bankruptcy, and that such unilateral rejection does not violate Section 8(a)(5) of the Act. 104 S.Ct. at 1199–1200.[2] It follows that the Respondent's unilateral rejection of its collective-bargaining agreement and its consequent modification of certain terms and conditions of employment were not unfair labor practices. The Respondent may not have acted lawfully but, that is solely a question for the bankruptcy court, not the Board, to decide.[3]

At the same time, the Court in Bildisco reaffirmed an employer's general obligation to recognize and bargain with the statutory bargaining agent of its employees. This duty is independent of the rejection or renegotiation of a contract within the framework of a bankruptcy petition. 104 S.Ct. at 1200–1201. We agree with the judge that the Respondent here withdrew recognition from the Union and thereby violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.[4]

We further find that the Respondent offered continued employment to the five named employees on the condition that they forgo union representation. Such an offer constitutes a constructive discharge and violates Section 8(a)(3) of the Act. Advance Electric, 268 NLRB 1001 (1984). The judge found that the employees declined the Respondent's offer because it was conditioned on nonrepresentation and on the abrogated contract. Because the contract abrogation was not an unfair labor practice, neither was it an unlawful condition of the Respondent's offer of employment, and we will modify the judge's conclusions of law and recommended Order to delete any such finding. We still find, however, that the offer was expressly conditioned on a waiver of union representation, and this was unlawful.

The judge credited each employee's testimony that John Kirkpatrick told her that the Respondent would operate "non-union." No exception was taken to this finding and the record supports it. We find inconclusive the record testimony as to what

[1] The Respondent has excepted to the judge's conclusion that its commerce operations meet the Board's $500,000 standard for retail operations; it argues that only its revenues as debtor-in-possession may be considered. We agree with the judge that we may consider the Respondent's revenues before the bankruptcy petition was filed. We note that the Supreme Court has rejected the theory that a bankrupt employer is a "new entity." NLRB v. Bildisco & Bildisco, 104 S.Ct. 1188, 1197 (1984). We also agree that actual revenues in the preceding year are relevant despite a later reduction. This principle was affirmed in Retail/Wholesale Union District 76 (Morgan Shoe), 129 NLRB 1339 (1961), on which the Respondent relies. In that case, unlike here, the respondent's actual revenues in the preceding 12-month period did not meet our discretionary jurisdictional standards.

[2] This ruling is unaffected by bankruptcy reform legislation since enacted by Congress.

[3] The Charging Party contends that the Bankruptcy Appeals Panel of the Ninth Circuit has, in fact, reversed the bankruptcy judge's decison to approve this contract rejection. For the reasons already stated, this evidence is now irrelevant and we do not need to consider it.

[4] While the remedy for this violation includes an order that the Respondent bargain with the Union concerning terms and conditions of employment, it does not include any make-whole relief for unilaterally changed contractual conditions, as in Ogle Protection Service, 183 NLRB 682 (1970). To do so would of course undermine the rule that rejection of the contract in bankruptcy did not violate the Act.

the five employees "meant" by "non-union." The employees were likely describing what they believed were the characteristics of a "non-union" operation, the phrase they testified that John Kirkpatrick used.[5] We will therefore attribute to that phrase its plain meaning.

There can be no doubt what the Respondent intended by its statements, as it then unlawfully withdrew recognition from the Union. We find this meaning was clearly conveyed to the employees even though they were not told that recognition had been withdrawn, or that they had to waive union representation. While it is true that the record does not allow a precise determination of the employees' motivation in declining the Respondent's offer of employment, the Respondent created this uncertainty by telling the employees it was going to operate "non-union." We will therefore resolve the ambiguity against the Respondent.

The judge's recommended Order required that the five employees be offered reinstatement with backpay through 5 March 1982, the date the Respondent offered to recognize and bargain with the Union. We find, however, that backpay was not tolled on that date because, while the Respondent offered to recognize the Union, it did not communicate that offer to the employees.

There is no record evidence that that offer was communicated. The only pertinent testimony is that of two employees who told Kirkpatrick in March that they could not work in a nonunion shop; there is no indication that Kirkpatrick corrected their misperception of his offer.

The judge's recommended remedy also provided that backpay be at the contractual rates set before the bankruptcy petition was filed. For the reasons already discussed, we hold instead that backpay and other monetary relief must be determined in accordance with whatever contractual arrangements are approved by the bankruptcy court. We will therefore leave the determination of the backpay formula to the compliance proceeding.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. By refusing on 4 December 1981 to recognize and bargain with the Union, as the exclusive representative of the employees in the unit set forth below, concerning rates of pay, wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment, the Respondent engaged in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act. The unit appropriate for purposes of collective bargaining is:

> All full-time and regular part-time journeymen and apprentice bakers, doughnut fryers/icers/glazers, miscellaneous employees, and sales persons, including forepersons, excluding office clerical employees, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

2. By conditioning continued employment of the unit employees on 4 December 1981 on their forgoing representation by their exclusive collective-bargaining representative, the Respondent constructively discharged those employees and violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act. The unit employees are:

Janet Higbee	Pamela Hale
Susan Sadoian	Dollie Phillips
Diane Jones

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, John Kirkpatrick and Cheryl Kirkpatrick, a partnership d/b/a Karsh's Bakery, Fresno, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Substitute the following for paragraph 1(b).

"(b) Discharging employees by conditioning their continued employment on their forgoing representation by their exclusive collective-bargaining representative."

2. Delete paragraph 1(c) and reletter the subsequent paragraph.

3. Substitute the attached notice for that of the administrative law judge.

MEMBER HUNTER, concurring and dissenting.

I agree with my colleagues that, under NLRB v. Bildisco & Bildisco,[1] the Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by rejecting its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union on the filing of its petition in bankruptcy on 4 December 1981. I also agree with my colleagues that, notwithstanding the lawful rejection of the collective-bargaining agreement, the Respondent violated

[5] See, e.g., the following testimony of employee Janet Higbee:

Q. Would you state why you decided not to continue working for Karsh's Bakery after December 5?

A. Because he went non-union, primarily.

JUDGE MYATT: What does non-union mean when you say non-union?

THE WITNESS: It means that you work 12 hours a day, you get paid for eight at the minimum, no insurance, no nothing. That's what it means, sir. I know.

[1] 104 S.Ct. 1188 (1984).

Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by withdrawing recognition from the Union.[2] However, contrary to my colleagues, I would find that the Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(3) and (1) by constructively discharging five employees who refused the Respondent's offer of continued employment after 4 December 1981.

According to the majority, the judge found that the five employees declined the Respondent's offer of continued employment because it was conditioned on a waiver of union representation as well as on the abrogation of the collective-bargaining agreement, whereby they were constructively discharged. In reversing the judge regarding the rejection of the contract, the majority recognizes that it has eliminated one of the two grounds for the judge's finding of constructive discharge, i.e., because it was not unlawful for the Respondent to reject the contract, it was not unlawful to offer continued employment on new terms. The majority continues to find the Respondent's offer unlawful, however, on the ground that it was expressly conditioned on a waiver of union representation, as in Advance Electric, 268 NLRB 1001 (1984).

I have several problems with the majority's approach. For one, I do not read the judge's decision as finding, or supporting a finding, that the Respondent expressly conditioned continued employment on a waiver of union representation. For another, I believe that the record conclusively establishes only that the employees terminated their employment because they did not want to work under the new terms, not that they were constructively discharged because they did not want to work without union representation.

As set forth by the judge, the five employees testified that they were informed by the Respondent's owner or manager that the Respondent had filed for reorganization; that it was going nonunion (employees Higbee and Phillips) or that it would operate as a nonunion shop (employees Sadoian, Hale, and Jones); and that their wages would be cut and their contract benefits eliminated. In response to the Respondent's offer to work under these terms, Higbee "declined to work under the new conditions"; Sadoian "could not accept the new terms because she could not work in a nonunion shop"; Jones "declined to accept the Respondent's offer to work under these new terms"; Hale "refused to continue working for the Respondent"; and Phillips "could not work in a non-union shop." The judge noted Higbee's testimony that she would have continued to work for the Respondent if the wages had been high enough to cover individual health insurance and contributions to the union pension fund. He also noted Higbee's testimony, which was similar to Sadoian's, that having to work for lower wages and no contract benefits meant that the Respondent was going nonunion, even though the Respondent never specifically stated that she could no longer be represented by the Union.[3]

In his "Concluding Findings," the judge stated that the Respondent "made it quite clear to these employees that the business was going to be operated henceforth as a non-union establishment." The judge further found that each employee who was offered continued employment on the new terms "declined to do so because they refused to work under 'nonunion' conditions and for the lower pay without any benefits." From this the judge inferred that the employees wanted to continue to be represented by the Union as well as to continue to be employed under the terms of the contract. The judge then concluded that "by refusing to work in a non-union shop for less wages and without any of the benefits provided in the collective-bargaining agreement, the five employees were constructively discharged."

In my view, the judge made no specific finding that the Respondent made the waiver of union representation an express condition of continued employment. I also do not believe that the employees' reasons for declining continued employment have been determined with sufficient precision. In this regard, I note that at the time the judge issued his decision the Respondent's offer of new terms was unlawful under pre-Bildisco law. Thus, it was not necessary at that time to dissect the employees' reasons as closely as we must do now. Additionally, although the majority finds the employees' testimony as to what they "meant" by "non-union" inconclusive and therefore "attribute[s] to that phrase its plain meaning,"[4] I believe that such testimony affirmatively supports a finding that the employees

[2] This finding is supported by credited evidence that on 5 December 1981 the Respondent's owner Kirkpatrick told the Union's assistant business representative Ghan that he did not think he should even be talking to Ghan, and that Kirkpatrick thereafter did not return Ghan's telephone calls. I further agree that a bargaining order is the appropriate remedy for this violation.

I also agree that the Respondent met the Board's jurisdictional standards for retail operations. As indicated in fn. 1 of the majority's decision, the Respondent's actual revenues in the entire 12-month period beginning 1 July 1981 are relevant despite a reduction in its business beginning December 1981. Moreover, in Retail/Wholesale Union District 76 (Morgan Shoe), 129 NLRB 1339 (1961), the respondent's actual revenues in the preceding 12-month period did not meet the Board's discretionary jurisdictional standards and any projected revenues would have had to account for the closing of one store in addition to the opening of two stores. Here, however, the evidence of actual revenues involved the 15-day period that would complete the year, and the projection made by the judge was in line with the Respondent's reduced operations.

[3] Although not mentioned by the judge, there is similar testimony on the record by the other employees involved herein.

[4] See fn. 5 of the majority's decision.

focused only on the loss of wages and benefits,[5] particularly in the absence of evidence that the five employees knew of the Respondent's withdrawal of recognition from the Union at the time they made their individual decisions to decline the Respondent's offer. I also submit, contrary to the majority, that the meaning of the term "nonunion" is not so plain in the post-Bildisco context of bankruptcy cases because the Supreme Court's decision has raised issues concerning post petition bargaining obligations which have yet to be resolved by the Board.

The context of the Respondent's bankruptcy also serves to distinguish this case from Advance Electric, relied on by the majority. In that case the Board found that the respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) by "conditioning the employment of its electricians on their working without union representation and for wages below those specified in the collective-bargaining agreement applicable to them, and that those electricians, having chosen to forgo their employment rather than accept those unlawful conditions, were thereby constructively and unlawfully discharged." (Emphasis added.)[6] Thus, in Advance Electric, the employer's unlawful unilateral changes were a key factor in the Board's decision.

For all of the foregoing reasons, I would find that the preponderance of the evidence fails to establish that the Respondent's offer of continued employment was unlawful or that the employees terminated their employment in consequence of any such unlawful offer. Accordingly, I would dismiss the 8(a)(3) allegation of the complaint.

[5] My colleagues concede that the record does not allow a precise determination of the employees' motivation in declining the Respondent's offer of continued employment. My reading of the employees' testimony persuades me, however, to resolve any ambiguity created by the Respondent's offer against the General Counsel, who had the burden of proving the unlawful condition of employment.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT refuse to recognize and negotiate with Bakery, Confectionary and Tobacco Workers International Union of America, Local No. 85 as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of our employees in the following appropriate unit:

All full-time and regular part-time journeymen and apprentice bakers, doughnut fryers/icers/-glazers, miscellaneous employees, and sales persons, including forepersons, excluding office clerical employees, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

WE WILL NOT discharge employees by conditioning their continued employment on their forgoing representation by their exclusive collective-bargaining representative.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce our employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL recognize and, on request, bargain with the above-named Union, as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of our employees in the unit described above, with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment.

WE WILL offer Janet Higbee, Susan Sadoian, Diane Jones, Pamela Hale, and Dollie Phillips immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges, discharging, if necessary, any employees hired after 4 December 1981, and WE WILL make them whole for any loss of earnings they may have suffered as a result of our discrimination against them, with interest.

JOHN KIRKPATRICK AND CHERYL KIRKPATRICK, A PARTNERSHIP D/B/A KARSH'S BAKERY

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

GORDON J. MYATT, Administrative Law Judge. On a charge filed by Bakery, Confectionary and Tobacco Workers International Union of America, Local No. 85 (the Union), against John Kirkpatrick and Cheryl Kirkpatrick, a partneship d/b/a Karsh's Bakery (the Respondent), the Regional Director for Region 32 issued a complaint and notice of hearing on January 12, 1982. The complaint alleged, inter alia, that the Respondent, through its agents and/or supervisors, on various dates commencing December 4, 1981,[1] informed employees that their continued employment depended on their accepting reduced wages and forgoing representation by the Union. Further, that by such conduct, Respondent caused the termination of several of its employees.[2] Finally, it is alleged that on December 5 the Respondent instituted wage reductions and eliminated employee fringe benefits provided for in the collective-bargaining agreement in effect between it and the Union without first affording the Union an opportunity to negotiate and bargain on these matters. In addition, on the same date, the Respondent withdrew recognition of the Union as the exclusive representative of its employees in a unit appropriate for purposes of collective bargaining. The complaint alleged that by the above conduct the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 151 et seq. (the Act). The Respondent filed an answer in which it admitted certain allegations of the complaint, denied others, and specifically denied the commission of any unfair labor practices.

[1] Unless otherwise indicated, all dates refer to the year 1981.

[2] The complaint alleged that because of Respondent's conduct, six named employees terminated their employment with the Respondent. At

A hearing was held in this matter on June 22, 1982, in Fresno, California. All parties were represented by counsel and afforded full opportunity to examine and cross-examine witnesses and to present relevant and material evidence on the issues involved here. All parties submitted written briefs in support of their positions and they have been duly considered.

On the entire record in this case, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses while testifying, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The complaint alleges that since about June 25, 1981, the Respondent, as a California partnership, had been engaged in the baking and retail sale of bakery products. Further, since that date the Respondent has averaged monthly gross revenues from the operation of its business in excess of $60,000 and, when such revenues are projected on an annual basis, they exceed $500,000. The Respondent denies these allegations and asserts that due to unique circumstances (more fully set forth below) it does not meet the Board's jurisdictional standards. Thus, the Respondent affirmatively pleads that the complaint should be dismissed because the gross dollar volume does not satisfy the Board's discretionary standards for retail enterprises. For this reason, the matter of jurisdiction becomes a threshold issue which must be decided at this point.

The undisputed facts disclose that John and Cheryl Kirkpatrick, as general partners, began negotiations for the purchase of Karsh's Bakery at some undisclosed time in April 1981. At the time the purchase negotiations were taking place, the employees of then owner Rose Karsh were represented by the Union and covered by a collective-bargaining agreement which, among other things, required the employer to make periodic payments into health and pension funds and to grant vacation pay to the employees. Karsh was delinquent in her contributions to the Funds and had not paid vacation benefits to the employees. As a result, the Union and the Funds instituted an action in the Federal district court to collect the amount in arrears.

Sometime in May, the Kirkpatricks entered into an agreement with Karsh to purchase the business. On July 1, the partnership took over the operational control of the business. However, escrow for the purchase was to close at a subsequent date.[3] Under this arrangement, the Kirkpatricks (primarily through John Kirkpatrick) assumed control of the day-to-day operation of the enterprise. John Kirkpatrick testified that he was "to run the bakery as best as [he] saw fit and that [he] could hire and fire employees." Rita Karsh, daughter of Rose, continued to come to the establishment each day to be available as an adviser or consultant to the Kirkpatricks if needed.[4]

On July 9, after what appears to be tripartite negotiations, the Kirkpatricks entered into an agreement with Rose Karsh and the Union whereby the partnership, as purchasers of the business, agreed to the following: (1) to assume and pay Karsh's delinquent obligations to the Funds and the Union; (2) recognize the Union as the collective-bargaining representative of the employees; and (3) abide by the terms of the existing collective-bargaining agreement. (See G.C. Exh. 3.) Kirkpatrick's assumption of the indebtedness was to be effective as of July 1, or on the date he assumed control of the business.

When the Kirkpatricks took over operational control of the bakery, there were four retail outlets located in shopping malls or in existing retail establishments. These outlets were known as: (1) the main store and production center located in Fulton Mall; (2) Gottschalk's Fashion Fair Store; (3) Gottschalk's Manchester Store; and (4) the Hanoian Store. In early August, the Kirkpatricks expanded the retail operation to include three additional outlets. They were the Foodland Herndon Store, Gottschalk's Downtown Store, and the Boy's Market Store.

On July 25, the Kirkpatricks and the Union entered into a collective-bargaining agreement covering a unit of the employees in various bakery and sales classifications. (See G.C. Exh. 4.) In addition, the unrefuted testimony indicates that sometime in July or August, Kirkpatrick held a meeting with all of the employees and assured them that "things would be just as usual" under his ownership and operation of the business. Further, the unrefuted testimony indicates that, between the date the Kirkpatricks assumed control of the operation of the bakery and the actual close of escrow, John Kirkpatrick met on several occasions with Union Representative Randy Ghan to resolve employee grievances.

On December 4, the Kirkpatricks, as general partners doing business as Karsh's Bakery, filed a petition in bankruptcy under Chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code. The partnership was immediately appointed by the Bankruptcy Court as debtors-in-possession and continued to operate the business from that day forward during the pendency of the bankruptcy proceedings. As debtors-in-pos-the hearing, the name of one of these employees, Claude Williams, was deleted from this allegation of the complaint.

[3] Escrow for the purchase of the bakery did not close until October 15, 1981.

[4] According to the undisputed testimony of John Kirkpatrick, this same arrangement applied to Rose Karsh; however, she never came to the bakery during the transition period because of an injury to her leg or hip.

session, the partnership permanently closed the retail outlets located in the three Gottschalk's stores on December 4.

The parties stipulated to the monthly volume of business grossed by the bakery for the period July 1, 1981, to June 15, 1982. These amounts are as follows:

July 1981	$44,175.55
August 1981	53,778.59
September 1981	51,886.17
October 1981	61,901.38
November 1981	54,658.96
December 1981	31,750.43
January 1982	31,333.32
February 1982	34,295.24
March 1982	34,691.79
April 1982	33,668.77
May 1982	30,498.00
June 1–15, 1982	19,614.00
Total Gross	$496,252.20

It was further stipulated at the hearing that for the period July 1, 1981, to November 30, 1981, the bakery purchased and received goods and services which originated outside the State of California valued in excess of $5,000.[5]

Based on the above facts, the Respondent contends that only the gross revenue earned by the general partnership as debtors-in-possession can be considered in determining whether the gross volume of business satisfies the Board's standards for retail enterprises. In support of this argument the Respondent cites the decision of the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit in Iron Workers Local 455 v. Kevin Steel Products, 519 F.2d 698 (1975), and a subsequent decision by the Ninth Circuit in Local Joint Executive Board v. Hotel Circle, 613 F.2d 210 (1980).

In Kevin Steel the Court was confronted with the conflict between Section 313(1) of the then Bankruptcy Act permitting rejection of executory contracts and Section 8(d) of the National Labor Relations Act prohibiting a "party" from terminating or modifying a collective-bargaining agreement without adhering to the requirements of that section. There, the Court reasoned that a debtor-in-possession is a "new entity" from the pre-bankrupt employer and thus can be permitted to reject the existing collective-bargaining agreement as "burdensome executory contract" without regard to the requirements of Section 8(d) of the National Labor Relations Act. The Ninth Circuit in Hotel Circle adopted this reasoning stating it was analogous to the situation of a successor employer who was found not to be bound by the collective-bargaining agreement of its predecessor in the Burns International Security Services decision of the United States Supreme Court.[6]

Intriguing as the Respondent's argument may be, I find that it cannot prevail. In each of the cases relied on by the Respondent the courts were confronted with the narrow concern of resolving the conflict between provisions of the Bankruptcy Act and the National Labor Relations Act. Thus, the courts adopted the "new entity" concept solely for the limited purpose of resolving the conflict between these two sections of the statutes and not for all purposes as the Respondent would urge. Indeed, the Second Circuit in a subsequent decision on the same issue stated that the new entity created was a "new juridicial entity" and that it was "for the narrow purpose of resolving otherwise conflicting provisions of the labor and bankruptcy laws." Teamsters Local 807 v. Bohack Corp., 541 F.2d 312 (2d Cir. 1976). Similarly, the Ninth Circuit in Hotel Circle stated, "We are convinced that the analogy to successorship [made by the court in Kevin Steel and Bohack] cases in this limited area is valuable." (Emphasis supplied.) 613 F.2d at 214.

Therefore, the argument that the prebankrupt partnership and the partnership as debtor-in-possession are not the same entity is not supported by careful reading of the very cases relied on by the Respondent. There is no conflict here between the National Labor Relations Act and the Bankruptcy Code in determining the gross dollar volume of business of the pre-bankrupt debtor and the debtor-in-possession for purposes of ascertaining whether the Board's jurisdictional standards are met. Indeed, the Board has consistently held that a trustee in bankruptcy or a debtor-in-possession is the alter ego of the bankruptcy employer. Jersey Juniors, 230 NLRB 329 (1977); Stateside Shipyard and Marina, 178 NLRB 516 (1969). Therefore, I find the gross revenue experience of the Respondent, both as the pre-bankrupt debtor and as the debtor-in-possession is to be considered in ascertaining whether the Board's jurisdictional standards are met, since for this purpose of the Act they are a continuing entity.

The next question to be resolved on the issue of jurisdiction is at what point did the Respondent become the successor employer? The Respondent argues that since escrow did not close until October 15, it did not legally become owner of the business until that date. I find that this argument is also without merit.

The uncontroverted testimony discloses that the Respondent assumed operational control of the bakery on July 1. Kirkpatrick could hire and fire employees and ran the business as he "saw fit." There was no change whatsoever in the employing enterprise and in August, Kirkpatrick increased the number of retail outlets from four to seven. In July, the Respondent not only assumed its predecessor's obligations to the Union for the vacation pay due employees and to the benefit funds for the delinquent contributions, but also executed, in its own name, a collective-bargaining agreement with the Union. It is apparent that as of July 1, the Respondent had taken over all entrepreneurial control of the business enterprise with the attendant risk of loss and opportunity to gain a profit. Therefore, it is evident that during escrow the Respondent operated the bakery for its own financial benefit and not for the financial benefit of its predecessor. East Beldon Corp., 239 NLRB 776 (1978). Accordingly, I find the Respondent became the successor employer on July 1, when the Kirkpatricks assumed control of the bakery, rather than on October 15, when escrow for the purchase finally closed.

[5] There is no evidence in the record reflecting the gross volume of business earned by the bakery during the ownership of Rose Karsh.

[6] NLRB v. Burns Security Services, 406 U.S. 272 (1972).

Under established Board law, two independent jurisdictional tests apply to the situations involving successor employers. The Board treats the successor as it had commenced operation of a new business and determines whether it meets the jurisdictional standard by making a forward projection based on its actual revenue experience. Where the evidence indicates that the business will continue in essentially the same manner as before the change of ownership, the Board has also used the 12-month experience of the predecessor to project what revenues the successor employer will total during its first 12 months of control. Galaxy Theatre, 210 NLRB 695 (1974). Nor is the application of these tests mutually exclusive. Northgate Cinema, 233 NLRB 586 (1977).

In the instant case, there is no evidence in the record of the 12-month experience of the predecessor. Consequently, it is only the actual experience of the Respondent and its alter ego, the debtor-in-possession, that can be considered and projected forward over a 12-month period.

The stipulation shows that for 11-1/2 months the business enterprise grossed $496,252.20. Even under the reduced operation by the debtor-in-possession the business enterprise averaged $36,339.57 a month for the first 6 months (until the end of May 1982). Thus, it is reasonable to project that the full month's revenue for the month of June 1982 would more than double the half-month total ($19,614) set forth in the stipulation. As this would clearly place the gross revenues above the $500,000 discretionary standard for retail enterprises, I find that the Respondent meets the jurisdictional requirements of the Board. Accordingly, the Respondent's motion to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction is denied and I find that the Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

Bakery, Confectionary and Tobacco Workers International Union of America, Local No. 85 is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

As noted, the Respondent executed a collective-bargaining agreement with the Union on July 25 and filed a petition under Chapter 11 of the bankruptcy code on December 4. Although there are some differences between the testimony of Kirkpatrick and that of the witnesses for the General Counsel, there is no significant dispute over the events which followed the filing of the petition in the bankruptcy court.

Janet Higbee had been employed at the bakery since 1963 as a salesclerk. She was a member of the Union and on December 4 was earning $5.06 an hour working in the main store in Fulton Mall. At the end of her shift on December 4, Higbee spoke to Carl Swatsky, Respondent's manager of operations, and asked for her work schedule for the following day.[7] Swatsky told the employee to go home and that she would be contacted later by Kirkpatrick. When she failed to hear from Kirkpatrick during the course of the evening, Higbee telephoned the store and spoke directly with him. According to Higbee, Kirkpatrick stated he was reorganizing the business and had filed a petition in bankruptcy under Chapter 11. Higbee testified that Kirkpatrick told her he was going nonunion and that her wages would be reduced to $4 an hour with no other benefits.[8] Kirkpatrick then asked the employee to work at the Hanoian outlet under these new terms. Higbee initially agreed to accept Respondent's terms because she was hesitant to become unemployed just before Christmas. After giving the matter additional thought, Higbee decided to call the home of one of the employees who worked at the Hanoian store. This employee told Higbee that she was not going to accept Respondent's offer to work for lower wages with no benefits or a union contract. Higbee then decided she would not work on these terms either. The following morning, Higbee called Swatsky and declined to return to work under the new conditions offered by Respondent. On cross-examination, Higbee stated she would have continued to work for the Respondent if the wages offered had been high enough to enable her to purchase her own health insurance and to make payments into the union pension fund. Higbee also testified on cross-examination that working for less than contract wages without any of the contract benefits and without a contract itself meant to her that the Respondent was going nonunion. She stated this was true even though Kirkpatrick never specifically told her that, if she returned, she could no longer be represented by the Union.

Employee Susan Sadoian had been employed at the bakery as a sales clerk since 1955. She too was a member of the Union and worked at the Hanoian store outlet. On December 4 her hourly rate of pay was $5.05.

Sadoian testified she was called at home by Swatsky on the evening of December 4. Swatsky told the employee that the Respondent had filed for reorganization under Chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code and that the business would operate as a nonunion shop. Swatsky also told the employee that there would be no union contract or benefits given to the employees and that the wages would be reduced to $4 an hour. Sadoian asked for time to think about these new terms. She subsequently called Swatsky back and told him that she could not accept the new terms because she could not work in a nonunion shop.[9]

Diane Jones worked at the bakery since 1978 as a salesclerk. She was a member of the Union and was earning $5.02 an hour on December 4. Jones testified that on December 4 Swatsky telephoned her at home and informed her that the Respondent would no longer be a union shop and that the wages would be reduced to $4 an hour without any other benefits. Jones declined to accept the Respondent's offer to work under these new terms.

[7] Although Swatsky figured prominently in conversations with several of the employees, he was not called as a witness in this proceeding.

[8] Kirkpatrick testified that he told Higbee he was "rejecting" the union contract. He denied making the statement that the Respondent was going nonunion and testified there was no discussion about the Union continuing to represent the employees.

[9] As with the testimony of Higbee, Sadoian stated that working for lower wages without any benefits or a collective-bargaining agreement meant, as far as she was concerned, that the Respondent was going nonunion.

Pamela Hale was a salesclerk at the Hanoian store outlet. She was a union member and was receiving $5.06 an hour on December 4. Hale testified that on December 6 Kirkpatrick called her home and informed her that the Respondent was reorganizing under Chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code. According to Hale, Kirkpatrick said the Respondent would not honor the collective-bargaining agreement with the Union and that the wages of the employees would be cut. He told Hale the Respondent was going to be a nonunion shop. Hale then refused to continue working for the Respondent.

Dollie Phillips was also a salesclerk for the Respondent. Like the other employees Phillips was a member of the Union and was earning $5.06 an hour at the time of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy. She testified that on December 4, Cheryl Kirkpatrick told her the Respondent was closing all of the Gottschalk outlets and since the following day was Phillips' day off, the employee should go home and wait for management to contact her. The following day John Kirkpatrick called Phillips. According to Phillips, Kirkpatrick stated the bakery was going nonunion and her wages would be reduced to $4.50 an hour with no other benefits. He stated the Respondent was rejecting the collective-bargaining agreement with the Union.[10] Phillips testified she asked Kirkpatrick for time to consider this new development. Kirkpatrick called Phillips a short while thereafter and asked her to come to work that Saturday. Phillips at this point refused, telling Kirkpatrick that she could not work in a nonunion shop.

Randy Ghan, assistant business representative of the Union servicing the contract at the bakery, testified that he went to the main office of the bakery on December 5 and spoke with Kirkpatrick. He stated Kirkpatrick informed him that a petition had been filed under Chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code and the Respondent was rejecting the Union's contract along with its Gottschalk's contract. Ghan told Kirkpatrick that he could not do that and asked where they were to go from there. Kirkpatrick replied that he did not know and that he did not think he should even be talking to the union representative. At this point, according to Ghan, Kirkpatrick walked away. Following this conversation, Ghan stated he made several attempts to contact Kirkpatrick by telephone but was unable to get his calls returned.

Kirkpatrick acknowledged that he spoke with Ghan on December 5 at the bakery. According to Kirkpatrick, Ghan was questioning him about rejecting the collective-bargaining agreement. Kirkpatrick stated he told Ghan he had authority to reject all executory contracts under Chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code. The union representative then informed Kirkpatrick that he would be hearing from him. Kirkpatrick stated that he was later informed that Ghan had called him several times but denied receiving any such messages when the calls were allegedly made by Ghan.

Apparently at the time of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, or shortly thereafter, the Respondent filed a motion with the bankruptcy court for approval to reject a number of executory contracts including the collective-bargaining agreement. A hearing was held on the motion on December 22 and the following day the bankruptcy court issued an order approving the rejecting of the agreement by the debtor-in-possession.[11]

On March 5, 1982, the Respondent, apparently on advice of different counsel, contacted the employees who had refused to work for the lower wages and new terms offered by the Respondent in December. Kirkpatrick offered each of these employees a position with the bakery on the identical terms he initially offered after filing the petition in bankruptcy. Each of the employees refused to accept the offer for substantially the same reason; i.e., they would not work for the lower wages without any benefits and without a union contract.

Kirkpatrick also contacted the union representative on that same date. Ghan testified that Kirkpatrick offered to bargain on any issues that the Union wished to discuss. A meeting was set for some time in May but was canceled because of a scheduling conflict of the Union's attorney. Since that time, there has been no effort by the Union to reschedule another meeting with the Respondent.

Concluding Findings

The General Counsel argues that the filing of the Chapter 11 petition and the appointment of the Respondent as debtor-in-possession did not relieve the debtor from its obligations under the collective-bargaining agreement. Thus, when the debtor-in-possession unilaterally abrogated the provisions of the agreement prior to receiving authorization from the bankruptcy court to reject that executory contract, it did so without complying with the requirements of Section 8(d) and thereby violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act. In addition, the General Counsel contends that, even after the bankruptcy court's approval of the rejection of the agreement, the debtor-in-possession remained under an obligation to recognize and bargain with the Union, since the employing enterprise continued to operate in the same manner albeit on a reduced scale, with substantially the same employees. In support of these arguments, the General Counsel cites, among other cases, Burgmeyer Bros., 254 NLRB 1027 (1981); Jersey Juniors, 230 NLRB 329 (1977); Iron

[10] Kirkpatrick testified that he offered Phillips a position as head of the Foodland Herndon outlet at $4.50 an hour. Kirkpatrick said he told the employee that the Respondent was rejecting the union contract. At this point, according to Kirkpatrick, Phillips stated she would not work for those wages and refused his offer.

[11] The Union takes the position in the instant proceeding that the order of the bankruptcy court is not entitled to be honored by the Board. The Union in effect argues that the Court applied an improper standard in determining that the collective-bargaining agreement was burdensome to the debtor's estate and its rejection was necessary to achieve a satisfactory reorganization. I do not consider a proceeding before the Board to be a proper forum to review an order issued by the bankruptcy court. Therefore, the Union's argument in this regard is rejected.

Workers Local 455 v. Kevin Steel Products, 519 F.2d 698 (2d Cir. 1975).

Finally, the General Counsel argues that the five employees who refused to work under the new terms and conditions offered by the debtor-in-possession were constructively discharged in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. The General Counsel reasons that by unilaterally reducing wages and eliminating benefits required by the collective-bargaining agreement, as well as the asserted repudiation of the Union as the bargaining representative of the employees, the debtor-in-possession made the terms and conditions of employment so intolerable that the five employees were forced to quit their jobs.

The Respondent's basic argument is much the same as that advanced in support of the jurisdictional issue. The Respondent contends that the debtor-in-possession is a new entity and, as such, is free to reject the existing collective-bargaining agreement much like a successor employer in the circumstances found by the Supreme Court in NLRB v. Burns Security Services, 406 U.S. 272 (1972). To sustain this position, the Respondent relies heavily on Kevin Steel, supra, and also on Local Joint Executive Board v. Hotel Circle, 613 F.2d 210 (9th Cir. 1980). The Respondent also contends that in exercising its right to reject the collective-bargaining agreement, it did not repudiate the Union's status as the bargaining representative of the employees and hence did not deny the employees their statutory right of representation. In this regard, the Respondent asserts that the five employees quit their jobs because they declined to work for the reduced wages and without any benefits, rather than because they understood the Union would no longer be allowed to represent them.

Addressing first the issue of the unilateral changes in the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement, I find that the Respondent has indeed acted in violation of the National Labor Relations Act. The Board has long held that the filing of a petition in bankruptcy and the subsequent appointment of a receiver, a trustee, or a debtor-in-possession does not invalidate the effectiveness of an existing collective-bargaining agreement; nor does it relieve the receiver, trustee, or debtor-in-possession of the obligation to recognize and bargain with the current collective-bargaining representative of the employees of the financially troubled enterprise. Burgmeyer Bros., supra; Oxford Structures, 245 NLRB 1180 (1979); Jersey Juniors, supra. This principle has likewise received approval in the courts. See Teamsters Local 807 v. Bohack Corp., 541 F.2d 312 (2d Cir. 1976), and Iron Workers Local 455 v. Kevin Steel Products, supra.

The Hotel Circle case heavily relied on by the Respondent does not necessarily, in my judgment, warrant a contrary conclusion. There, the Ninth Circuit recognized a receiver (or debtor-in-possession) has a "general duty to bargain and otherwise comply with the [Act]," but held that a receiver's duty under 8(d) "is limited by his lack of authority to affirm an executory labor agreement without the permission of the bankruptcy court." Local Joint Executive Board v. Hotel Circle, supra, 613 F.2d at 215. The court in Hotel Circle was concerned with a receiver who had participated in negotiations for a new collective-bargaining agreement and then conformed to the terms of the agreement negotiated without prior approval of the bankruptcy court. It was not a situation where compliance with the terms of an existing collective-bargaining agreement was involved. Indeed, in Hotel Circle the court referred to the Bohack case, supra, to note that the "new entity" concept for a receiver or debtor-in-possession is narrowly limited and "cannot be taken literally since one not a party technically cannot affirm or reject an agreement." In a more recent case (involving a lease of the debtor rather than a collective-bargaining agreement), the Ninth Circuit explained the meaning of Hotel Circle. See In re Huntington Ltd., 654 F.2d 578 (9th Cir. 1981). There, the court stated what it intended by its holding in Hotel Circle. The court said in footnote 14 at 587:

> Hotel Circle should be read, however, for the proposition that a receiver's assumption of an executory contract, be it express or implied by conformance to the terms of the contract, is subject to the review of the Bankruptcy Court. See 4A Collier on Bankruptcy ¶70.43 [5]; p. 530 (14th ed. 1978). The receiver's assumption of the contract may be affirmed or denied by the court depending upon the court's judgment of whether such assumption is in the best interest of the debtor's estate.

Turning to the facts in the instant case, it is evident that on December 4, while the debtor-in-possession had applied for approval to reject the collective-bargaining agreement, a hearing was not held on the matter until December 22, and the bankruptcy court did not grant approval until December 23. Since under the Board law the mere filing of a petition in bankruptcy does not invalidate the effectiveness of an existing collective-bargaining agreement, the debtor-in-possession in this case was not free to repudiate the terms of the existing agreement until such action was authorized by the bankruptcy court. Indeed, even under Hotel Circle such action would have to require prior approval of the bankruptcy court. Thus, when the debtor here breached the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement by unilaterally reducing wages and eliminating benefits on December 4, it did so without authorization by the bankruptcy court and without complying with the requirements of Section 8(d) of the National Labor Relations Act. This action was taken in derogation of the exclusive collective-bargaining status of the Union and violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.

While the court decisions hold that after authorization is granted by the bankruptcy court to reject a collective-bargaining agreement the debtor-in-possession is free to do so, neither the Board cases nor the court decisions hold that the debtor-in-possession was relieved of its obligation to recognize and bargain with the Union as the exclusive representative of the unit employees. I.S.G. Extrusion Tooling, 262 NLRB 114 (1982); Burgmeyer Bros., supra; Oxford Structures, supra; Jersey Juniors, surpa; Local Joint Executive Board v. Hotel Circle, supra; Teamsters Local 807 v. Bohack Corp., supra; Iron Workers Local 455 v. Kevin Steel Products, supra.

Although the Respondent here contends that it did not tell the employees the Union could no longer represent them, I find the facts belie this claim. Each of the employees who testified stated they were either told by Kirkpatrick or Swatsky that the Respondent was going "non-union" and was rejecting the collective-bargaining agreement. As noted, Swatsky was not called as a witness and I do not credit Kirkpatrick's denial that he told the employees the business was going to operate "non-union." It is apparent from the manner in which Kirkpatrick carefully couched his words when testifying that he was seeking to portray his actions in a lawful mold rather than to give an accurate recital of the statements which were made to the employees. Indeed, on December 5, when Ghan came to the bakery and spoke to Kirkpatrick, Ghan was told not only that the Respondent was rejecting the collective-bargaining agreement, but also that Kirkpatrick felt he should not even be talking to the union representative. In my judgment, this serves to indicate that Kirkpatrick considered the Union to have no further status as bargaining representative of the unit employees.

Thus, I find the debtor-in-possession not only unlawfully rejected the collective-bargaining agreement on December 4, but also unlawfully refused to recognize and bargain with the Union as the exclusive representative of the employees. Nor does the fact that on March 5, 1982, the debtor-in-possession made an offer to bargain with the Union on any issues between them cure the violations which had already taken place. Accordingly, I find that by rejecting the collective-bargaining agreement and unilaterally reducing wages and eliminating contract benefits on December 4, 1981, the debtor-in-possession violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act. I further find that by refusing to recognize the Union as the exclusive representative of the employees and bargaining with it as such, the debtor-in-possession committed an additional violation of Section 8(a)(5) and in so doing unlawfully deprived the unit employees of their statutory right to be represented by a union of their own choosing in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

Turning to the circumstances surrounding the refusal of the five employees to continue to work for the Respondent after December 4, I find that each of these employees was in fact constructively discharged by the Respondent and its debtor-in-possession. As previously noted, Kirkpatrick made it quite clear to these employees that the business was going to be operated henceforth as a nonunion establishment. Not only were the wages of the employees to be reduced if they continued to work in the bakery, but all of the benefits provided in the contract were to be eliminated. Each of the five employees who were offered continued employment on these terms declined to do so because they refused to work under "non-union" conditions and for lower pay without any benefits. The obvious inference to be drawn from their refusal to work on these terms is that the employees wanted to continue to be represented by their union and employed under terms and conditions negotiated by their bargaining representative. Therefore, I find that by refusing to work in a nonunion shop for less wages and without any of the benefits provided in the collective-bargaining agreement, the five employees were constructively discharged by the Respondent on December 4 in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act. Western Pacific Roofing Corp., 244 NLRB 501 (1979), enfd. sub nom. in pertinent part Seattle Auto Glass v. NLRB, 669 F.2d 1332 (9th Cir. 1982).

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent John Kirkpatrick and Cheryl Kirkpatrick, a partnership d/b/a Karsh's Bakery, and its debtor-in-possession is an employer within the meaning of Section 2(2) of the Act engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. Bakery, Confectionary and Tobacco Workers International Union of America, Local No. 85 is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By refusing on December 4, 1981, to recognize and bargain with the Union, as the exclusive representative of the employees in the unit set forth below, concerning rates of pay, wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act. The unit appropriate for purposes of collective bargaining is:

> All full-time and regular part-time journeyman and apprentice bakers, doughnut fryers/icers/glazers, miscellaneous employees, and sales persons, including forepersons, excluding office clerical employees, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

4. By unilaterally repudiating the collective-bargaining agreement in effect between it and the Union on December 4, 1981, without first securing approval of the bankruptcy court, and on the same date unilaterally changing the terms and conditions of employment of the unit employees without first notifying and bargaining with the Union, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.

5. By conditioning continued employment of the unit employees on December 4, 1981, on lower wages without any of the benefits provided for in the collective-bargaining agreement, the Respondent made the terms and conditions of employment so intolerable that it constructively discharged the following employees in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act:

Janet Higbee
Susan Sadoian
Diane Jones
Pamela Hale
Dollie Phillips

6. By denying the unit employees representation by their exclusive collective-bargaining representative on December 4, 1981, and thereafter, the Respondent has interfered with the rights guaranteed its employees by statute and violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

7. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, it shall be recommended that the Respondent be required to cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Since the record facts that the bankruptcy court approved the rejection of the collective-bargaining agreement on December 23, 1981, and since case law holds that even court-approved rejection of an existing collective-bargaining agreement does not relieve a debtor-in-possession of the obligation to recognize and bargain with the representative of the unit employees, the vindication of the public policy of the statute must be tailored to the particular facts of the instant case. That the conduct of the Respondent and its debtor-in-possession on December 4, 1981, was unlawful, cannot be gainsaid. However, on March 5, 1982, the Respondent and its debtor-in-possession notified the Union of its willingness to recognize and bargain with the Union on the matters at issues between them. Therefore, at this point, the Respondent was willing to comply with the requirements of the Act with respect to the collective-bargaining representative. For this reason, the Respondent shall be ordered to cease and desist from refusing to recognize and bargain with the Union (which was accomplished on March 5, 1982) and affirmatively ordered to bargain, on request, with the Union regarding wages, rates of pay, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment of the unit employees. In addition, the Respondent shall be ordered to reinstate the five constructively discharged employees to their former or substantially equivalent positions without loss of seniority or other rights and privileges, discharging, if necessary, any employee hired subsequent to December 4, 1982. The Respondent and its debtor-in-possession shall be required to make the reinstated employees whole for any loss of earnings they may have suffered, at the rate set forth in the collective-bargaining agreement, from the date of their unlawful discharge until March 5, 1982, the date of the offer to recognize and bargain with the Union. Backpay shall be computed in the manner set forth in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and interest thereon shall be computed in the manner provided in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[12] In addition, the Respondent and its debtor-in-possession shall make the required pension and health fund contributions for the constructively discharged employees from the date of their discharges to March 5, 1982, with interest thereon, if any, to be determined at the compliance stage of this proceeding. See Merryweather Optical Co., 240 NLRB 1213, 1216 fn. 7 (1979).

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[13]

ORDER

The Respondent, John Kirkpatrick and Cheryl Kirkpatrick, a Partnership d/b/a Karsh's Bakery, Fresno, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to recognize and bargain with Bakery, Confectionary and Tobacco Workers International Union of America, Local No. 85 as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of its employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All full-time and regular part-time journeyman and apprentice bakers, doughnut fryers/icers/glazers, miscellaneous employees, and sales persons, including forepersons, excluding office clerical employees, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

(b) Denying employees in the above-described unit representation by their exclusive collective-bargaining representative.

(c) Unlawfully reducing wages, eliminating contract benefits, and denying union representation to the unit employees in order to make terms and conditions of employment so intolerable that employees quit their jobs.

(d) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Recognize and, upon request, bargain with the Union as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the above-described unit.

(b) Offer to Janet Higbee, Susan Sadoian, Diane Jones, Pamela Hale, and Dollie Phillips immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those positions no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges, discharging, if necessary, any employees hired subsequent to December 4, 1982. In addition, make the above-named employees whole for for any loss of earnings or benefits they may have suffered in the manner set forth in the section of this decision entitled "The Remedy."

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at its main facility and all outlets located in Fresno, California, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[14] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 32, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon re-

[12] See generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

[13] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

On 27 September 1983 Administrative Law Judge William L. Schmidt issued the attached decision. The Respondent and the Employer filed exceptions and supporting briefs, and the Respondent filed an answering brief to the Employer's exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions[1] and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.

The Employer has excepted to the judge's finding that the Respondent did not violate Section 8(b)(3) by refusing to provide the Employer with certain information concerning the health and welfare trust and the pension trust. We find merit to the Employer's exceptions, and for the reasons below we find that the Respondent violated Section 8(b)(3) by refusing to provide information which it admittedly possessed concerning the trusts.

The Respondent and the Employer were parties to the Plastering Industry Short Form Agreement which bound the Employer to the terms of the contract between the Respondent and the Associated Plastering and Lathing Contractors of San Diego. The Plastering Industry Short Form Agreement provided that the Employer was bound to the terms and conditions of each of the trust agreements referred to in the Respondent's contract with the Associated Plastering and Lathing Contractors of San Diego, including the health and welfare trust and the pension trust. The Plastering Industry Short Form Agreement also required the Employer to designate and appoint the employers mentioned in the trust agreements as attorney-in-fact for the selection, removal, and substitution of trustees. The trust agreements themselves are not in evidence but the record discloses that the trusts are jointly administered and that an entity known as Allied Trust serves as the administrator.

The most recent agreement between the Respondent and the Employer was scheduled to expire on 3 August 1982,[2] and we agree with the judge that the Employer's notice of 23 April was sufficient to prevent the automatic renewal of that agreement. The parties met on 28 June for their initial bargaining session, and on 20 July the Employer forwarded a written information request to the Respondent. The Employer's request stated, inter alia:

> 4) Please provide us immediately with details regarding the health and welfare plan provided through the jointly administered trust applicable to your union as follows:
> A) A detailed analysis of coverage, benefits and cost as projected for the next contract period;
> B) All actuarial statements or reports involving this trust fund or any of its subsidiaries; and,
> C) All financial reports, audited or unaudited, for this trust fund, including any subsidiary, for the period beginning January 1, 1977.
> 5) With regard to the jointly administered pension plan, please provide us immediately with the following details:
> A) Any actuarial studies or reports which have been completed with regard to the fund, or any of its subsidiaries;
> B) All financial reports and income statements, audited or unaudited, for this trust fund, including any subsidiary thereof, for the period beginning January 1, 1977;
> C) A description of the present unfunded liability of said plan;
> D) With regard to employer contributions to the pension fund for the five-year period ending with the most recent plan year's expiration, > ii) The amount of contributions made by our company;

> iii) The pension fund's unfunded liability as of the end of the most recent plan year;

[1] No exceptions were filed to the judge's finding that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(b)(3) by refusing the Employer's request to provide certain information on the operation of its hiring hall. We agree with the judge's findings, but in doing so we find it unnecessary to consider his additional statement that the Respondent has no duty to expend its resources to conduct a survey of the hiring hall registrants in order to compile additional information which the Employer has requested.

[2] Unless otherwise specified, all dates herein refer to 1982.

> said plan, and costs to employees contributing to said plan for the next three years.

The Employer subsequently reiterated its request on 17 November and on 14 February 1983 but the Respondent consistently declined to provide the information.

The record establishes that Allied Trust maintains all of the records concerning the trusts sought by the Employer in its information request. However, the Respondent's financial secretary and business agent McHenry admitted at the hearing that the Respondent also possesses much of the information contained in the request. McHenry testified that the Respondent possesses actuarial statements and financial reports in connection with both the health and welfare trust and the pension trust. He further testified that the Respondent possessed records of employer contributions to the trust funds from the preceding 5 years. The record is silent as to whether the Respondent possesses the remaining information requested concerning the trusts.

The judge found that the Respondent had no obligation to furnish the requested information. We conclude that the Respondent violated Section 8(b)(3) by failing to submit the information which it admittedly possessed, but that it did not act unlawfully in connection with information not in its possession.

After the judge's decision, the Board issued Food & Commercial Workers Local 1439 (Layman's Market), 268 NLRB 780 (1984). In that case the Board observed that in NLRB v. Amax Coal Co., 453 U.S. 322 (1981), the Supreme Court held that trustees of jointly administered trust funds are not agents of their respective parties. The Board concluded that Amax required a modification of Hospital Employees (Sinai Hospital of Baltimore), 248 NLRB 631 (1980). In Sinai a union representative was also a trustee of a health and welfare trust fund, and the Board found that the representative, as a trustee, violated Section 8(b)(3) by intentionally preventing the employer's access to the requested information. The Board in Sinai also found that in so doing the union representative violated his "affirmative obligation to make a reasonable effort to obtain the information, or to investigate reasonable alternative means for obtaining it, or to truthfully explain or document the reasons for its unavailability."[3] In Layman's the Board concluded that in light of the Supreme Court's decision in Amax, the decision in Sinai continues to be valid "only where a collective-bargaining representative demonstrates that it is in de facto control of a nominally independent trust fund."[4]

Therefore, the threshold question under Layman's is whether a union has de facto control of a trust fund. A finding that a union exercises such control will trigger an analysis of whether it met its "affirmative obligation," but where a union does not exercise such control an affirmative obligation will not arise in most circumstances.

There is no evidence that the Respondent was in de facto control of the trust funds involved in this case. Consequently, with respect to the information which presumably it did not possess, we find that the Respondent did not have an affirmative obligation to make a reasonable attempt to obtain the information, to investigate reasonable alternative means for obtaining it, or to explain its unavailability. Whether the Respondent had such an affirmative obligation, however, is a relevant inquiry only with respect to the information which it did not possess. Clearly a party can never have an obligation to attempt to obtain information which is already in its possession. Therefore, to find that the Respondent has no affirmative obligation to seek information does not resolve the question of whether it was obligated to furnish the information which it admittedly had. The latter issue did not arise in Layman's because the union did not have the specific information requested. We thus conclude that Layman's is not controlling with respect to the information in the Respondent's possession.[5]

Applying our usual principles, we conclude that the Respondent unlawfully refused to furnish the information which it possessed. We note that a labor organization's duty to furnish information is parallel to that of an employer.[6] The information is unquestionably relevant to collective bargaining, and there is no evidence that it is confidential or otherwise privileged, or that its production would be unduly burdensome.[7] We are aware that in some circumstances, such as where the information is easily accessible or readily available to a party making an information request, the Board has not required the party to whom the request is made to provide the information.[8] We find, however, that the record does not establish how readily available the information was to the Employer from the trust funds or from any other source. We emphasize that the record contains only limited evidence concerning the operation of the trusts and the availability of the information from Allied Trust, the trust administrator. The Plastering Industry Short Form Agreement binds the Employer to the terms and conditions of the trust agreements, but the trust agreements themselves are not in evidence. The record does not disclose what procedure the Employer would have to utilize to obtain the information from the trust administrator. It is therefore not clear whether the information would be readily available to the Employer on request, or whether the Employer would confront restrictions or delays in obtaining the information.[9] What the record does establish clearly is that the Respondent possessed much of the information and refused the Employer's request to furnish it. In these circumstances we see no reason to require the Employer to use an alternative procedure, and we find that the Respondent violated Section 8(b)(3) by failing to furnish the information.

[5] The Board in Layman's also overruled Teamsters Local 959 (Frontier Transportation Co.), 244 NLRB 19 (1979). In Frontier Transportation Co., union officers were also trustees of the trust funds and in their capacity as trustees they either possessed or had access to trust fund information. The Board found in those circumstances that the union violated Sec. 8(b)(3) by refusing an employer's information request. In view of the overruling of that case in Layman's, the Board will no longer find an 8(b)(3) violation where a union official, in his role as a trustee, has possession of or access to information, unless the union is in de facto control of the fund. However, our finding here is consistent with the overruling of Frontier Transportation Co. We note particularly that McHenry was the Respondent's only officer, and that there is no evidence that he was a trustee of the funds. He possessed the information simply in his capacity as a union officer and not as a trustee.

An employer has a duty to furnish relevant information to enable a labor organization to carry out its duties as a bargaining representative. NLRB v. Acme Industrial Co., 385 U.S. 432 (1967); NLRB v. Truitt Mfg. Co., 351 NLRB 149 (1956).

AMENDED CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

Substitute the following for paragraph 8:

"8. On July 20, and November 17, 1982, and on February 14, 1983, the Employer requested that the Respondent provide it with the names, classifications, and years of construction industry experience of all registrants on the hiring hall lists maintained by the Respondent. The Employer also requested on the above dates that the Respondent provide it with actuarial statements and financial reports in connection with both the health and welfare trust and the pension trust, and that the Respondent provide it with records of employer contributions for the preceding 5 years to the health and welfare and pension trust funds."

AMENDED REMEDY

Having concluded that the Respondent violated Section 8(b)(3) by refusing to provide certain information admittedly in its possession in connection with the health and welfare and pension trusts, we shall modify the judge's recommended Order to require the Respondent to cease and desist therefrom and to furnish the information in its possession.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, Plasterers Local Union No. 346 of the Operative Plasterers' & Cement Masons' International Association of the United States and Canada, AFL–CIO, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Insert the following as paragraph 1(d) and reletter the subsequent paragraphs.

"(d) Refusing to furnish A. G. Brawner Plastering, Inc. with actuarial statements and financial reports in its possession in connection with both the health and welfare trust and the pension trust, and refusing to furnish A. G. Brawner Plastering, Inc. with records in its possession of employer contributions for the preceding 5 years to the health and welfare trust fund and the pension trust fund."

2. Insert the following as paragraph 2(d) and reletter the subsequent paragraphs.

"(d) Furnish A. G. Brawner Plastering, Inc. with the information specified in paragraph 1(d), above, without further delay."

3. Substitute the attached notice for that of the administrative law judge.

APPENDIX B

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES AND MEMBERS
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain collectively with A. G. Brawner Plastering, Inc. by failing and refusing to honor and abide by the termination provisions of the short-form agreement we entered into with A. G. Brawner Plastering, Inc. on 3 August 1976.

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain collectively, on request, with A. G. Brawner Plastering, Inc. for a new collective-bargaining agreement.

In this connection the Board has frequently noted that absent special circumstances, a party is not relieved of its obligation to furnish relevant information simply because the information may be available to the requesting party from another source. See Borden, Inc., 235 NLRB 982, 983 (1978); Kroger Co., 226 NLRB 512, 513 (1976).

[9] We do not find that these issues are resolved by the conclusional testimony of the Respondent's business agent McHenry that the requested information was "available" to the Employer through the trust administrator. That testimony does not establish whether the Employer would confront obstacles in obtaining the information.

WE WILL NOT refuse to furnish A. G. Brawner Plastering, Inc. with the names, classifications, and information in our possession concerning the years of construction industry experience of the registrants on our hiring hall lists.

WE WILL NOT refuse to furnish A. G. Brawner Plastering, Inc. with actuarial statements and financial reports in our possession in connection with both the health and welfare trust and the pension trust, and we will not refuse to furnish A. WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL bargain collectively with A. G. Brawner Plastering, Inc. by honoring and abiding by the letter dated 23 April 1982 terminating the short-form agreement in effect between A. G. Brawner Plastering, Inc. and us.

WE WILL bargain, upon request, with A. G. Brawner Plastering, Inc. for a new collective-bargaining agreement.

WE WILL furnish A. G. Brawner Plastering, Inc. with the names, classifications, and information in our possession concerning the years of construction industry experience of all registrants on our hiring hall list without delay.

WE WILL furnish A. G. Brawner Plastering, Inc. with actuarial statements and financial reports in our possession in connection with both the health and welfare trust and the pension trust, and WE WILL furnish A. G. PLASTERERS LOCAL UNION 346 OF THE OPERATIVE PLASTERERS' CEMENT MASONS' INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF THE UNITED STATES AND CANADA, AFL–CIO

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

WILLIAM L. SCHMIDT, Administrative Law Judge. This matter was heard by me on May 5, 1983, at San Diego, California. The charge in Case 21–CB–8274, filed on behalf of A. G. Brawner Plastering, Inc. (Brawner) on December 12, 1982, alleged that Plasterers Local Union No. 346 of the Operative Plasterers' & Cement Masons' International Association of the United States and Canada, AFL–CIO (Respondent or Plasterers Local 346), violated Section 8(b)(3) of the National Labor Relations Act (Act), by refusing to bargain collectively in good faith with Brawner in the past 6 months. The charge in Case 21–CB–8357, filed on behalf of Brawner on March 11, 1983, alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(b)(3) of the Act by refusing to bargain collectively in good faith with Brawner since February 28, 1983. On March 30, 1983, the Regional Director for Region 21 of the National Labor Relations Board (Board or NLRB) ordered the two cases consolidated and issued a consolidated amended complaint (complaint) on behalf of the General Counsel of the Board. The complaint alleges that the Respondent violated Section 8(b)(3) of the Act by refusing since July 20, 1982, to furnish Brawner with cetian specified information alleged to be necessary and relevant to Brawner's efforts to prepare for collective bargaining with the Respondent and by refusing to meet and bargain with Brawner as requested in writing on February 14, 1983. The Respondent filed a timely answer denying that it engaged in the unlawful conduct alleged in the complaint.

On the entire record, including my observation of the witnesses who appeared before me at the hearing, and my careful consideration of posthearing briefs filed by the General Counsel and the Respondent, I make the following

I. JURISDICTION

Brawner, a California corporation, is a plastering contractor in San Diego County, California. During its fiscal year from May 31, 1981, to May 31, 1982, Brawner performed services valued in excess of $50,000 for C. A. Larsen Construction Company of San Diego. During the same period, C. A. Larsen Construction Company purchased and received goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from suppliers located outside the State of California. On the basis of the foregoing, I find that Brawner meets the Board's indirect outflow standard for exercising jurisdiction and that Brawner is an employer within the meaning of Section 2(2) of the Act, engaged in commerce, or an industry affecting commerce, within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act. I further find that it would effectuate the purposes of the Act for the Board to assert jurisdiction with respect to this dispute.

II. LABOR ORGANIZATION

Respondent has been a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act at all times relevant to this case.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Pleadings

The complaint alleges that the Respondent violated Section 8(b)(3) of the Act by a February 28, 1983 written refusal to meet and bargain with Brawner concerning a successor collective-bargaining agreement. The complaint also alleges that the Respondent violated Section

8(b)(3) by refusing since July 20, 1982, to furnish information requested by Brawner which was necessary and relevant for it to prepare for collective bargaining with the Respondent. As described in the complaint, the data sought by Brawner was:

> . . . information relating to Respondent's hiring hall, details regarding the health and welfare plan provided through the jointly administered trust applicable to Respondent, information regarding the jointly administered pension plan applicable to Respondent, and the names and titles of those persons on the Respondent's negotiating committee.

The answer to the complaint denies that the Respondent engaged in any unfair labor practices. More particularly, the answer denies that Brawner requested the necessary and relevant information on the dates alleged, and that it had refused to supply any such information. Although the answer admits that Brawner requested bargaining for a successor agreement by its February 14, 1983 letter, the answer denies that the Respondent refused that request. The answer alleges two affirmative defenses. First, Respondent asserted that the information requested by Brawner is "more readily available" from other sources. Secondly, it is alleged that at all relevant times there was a collective-bargaining agreement in effect between Brawner and the Respondent which had not been timely terminated.

B. The Evidence

On August 3, 1976, Brawner executed the Plastering Industry Short Form Agreement (short form agreement) with the Respondent where it agreed to be bound by terms of the collective-bargaining agreement in effect between the Respondent and the Associated Plastering and Lathing Contractors of San Diego (Association) which contained the terms and conditions of employment for journeymen and apprentice plasterers, including working foremen, employed by the Association members.[1] The short form agreement provided that it was to become effective "on the date hereto" and was to remain in effect for a period of 3 years and "from year to year thereafter, unless either party has given sixty (60) days' written notice prior to the anniversary date to the other party of intention to terminate." No date is specified as an opening date for giving a timely termination notice. It is undisputed that the agreement between Brawner and the Respondent renewed itself through the 1981 calendar year.

The short form agreement also provided that the employer signatory agreed to be bound by each of the trust fund trust agreements referred to in the Association agreement and designated the employers mentioned in the trust agreements as its attorney in fact for the selection and removal of trustees. The Association agreement contains provisions requiring employers bound thereto to make contributions to a health and welfare trust and to a pension trust.

By letter dated April 23, 1982, Brawner's counsel, Michael Merrill, notified the Respondent that Brawner desired to terminate its current agreement and to negotiate a new agreement. Specifically, the first paragraph of Merrill's April 23 letter to the Respondent stated:

> In accordance with the termination provisions of the current collective bargaining agreement with your union which terminates by its terms on June 30, 1982, we wish to terminate said agreement on behalf of [Brawner] or any person or firm which may be considered to be an employer bound by a collective bargaining agreement affecting the foregoing named persons or entities.

The letter went on to (1) revoke authority of any association to bargain on Brawner's behalf; (2) request separate bargaining for a new collective-bargaining agreement; (3) suggest that an initial bargaining session be held during the week of May 17; (4) solicit written proposals from the Respondent prior to the date of the first meeting; and (5) request a copy of any collective-bargaining agreement and trust agreements which the Respondent claimed were in effect between it and Brawner for Merrill's review prior to the first bargaining session.

The tenor of Merrill's letter in general and his reference to the fact that the agreement terminated "by its terms on June 30, 1982," in particular, makes it evident that Merrill believed Brawner was directly bound to the Association agreement as an Association member. Thus, the Association agreement then in effect was for a term beginning on June 16, 1979, and continuing through June 30, 1982. Eventually, when Merrill and Robert J. McHenry, the Respondent's financial secretary, met for their initial bargaining session on June 28, 1982, McHenry provided Merrill with a copy of the original short form agreement executed by Brawner in 1976 and asserted that the Respondent's agreement with Brawner continued through August 3.[2] Recognizing that the termination date gave the parties additional time in which to hold further bargaining sessions, Merrill explored the Respondent's position with respect to certain concessions Brawner desired and concluded that more productive negotiations would occur after the Respondent had concluded its negotiations with the Association which, McHenry assured Merrill, were progressing satisfactorily at that time.[3] The June 28 meeting concluded with it being "loosely decided" that the parties would meet again after the Association agreement had been concluded and its terms had been forwarded to Merrill. According to Merrill, McHenry bluntly told him during the course of the June 28 meeting that it was not "feasible" for the Respondent to "give a different contract to a [1] Laborers' Union Local 89 was also a party to the Association agreement as it contained terms and conditions of employment for plaster tenderers who are represented by that Union. However, Local 89 is not involved in these proceedings.

[2] A representative for Laborers Union Local 89 also attended the first bargaining session but was not called as a witness in this proceeding.

[3] More specifically, Merrilll asked if the Respondent would be willing to consider a commercial-residential wage differential and concessions on a "couple of other compensation items" not specified in this record. Merrill testified that he was given a negative response on all items.

given contractor, no matter what his financial circumstances might be."

Merrill claimed that nothing was said during the June 28 meeting which indicated that the Respondent believed Merrill's April 23 letter to be premature with respect to forestalling further automatic renewal of Brawner's agreement with the Respondent or that the letter was otherwise defective for that purpose. Attorney Prochazka testified that he told Merrill at a representation case hearing in May 1982 that the Respondent felt the Brawner termination notice was untimely. McHenry claimed that he expressed doubt concerning the effectiveness of the April 23 letter because it had been submitted more than 90 days prior to the August 3 termination date and following the meeting he checked further. McHenry claims that he ascertained that it was the Respondent's policy to treat termination notices received more than 90 days prior to the termination date as premature, and that he telephoned Merrill within a day or two after the June 28 meeting to advise him that the April 23 termination letter had been sent too soon. Merrill emphatically denied that McHenry made any claim at the June 28 meeting that the short form agreement had already renewed itself. On the contrary, Merrill testified that McHenry explicitly stated that the Brawner agreement would terminate on August 3. Merrill was not recalled as a witness to rebut Prochazka's testimony.

On July 20, Merrill wrote to McHenry confirming several preliminary understandings reached concerning the framework for their negotiations including the fact that Brawner's agreement with the Respondent did not expire until August 3. In addition, Merrill requested that he be furnished with a copy of the Respondent's agreement with the Association if it had been concluded together with some indication of those provisions which were susceptible to a different result in the negotiations between the Respondent and Brawner. Finally, Merrill enclosed a listing of information which Brawner wanted in order to conduct an "evaluation of your negotiation proposals." The request for information enclosed in Merrill's July 20 letter is attached as "Appendix A." The Respondent did not answer Merrill's July 20 letter nor furnish the material requested.

On September 15, 1982, the parties to the Association negotiations executed a new agreement effective by its terms for plasterer employees from July 7, 1982, through July 31, 1983. There is no evidence that Brawner was furnished with a copy of the new agreement.

By letter dated November 17, 1982, attorney Mark T. Bennett, an associate in Merrill's office, wrote to remind the Respondent that there had been no response to Merrill's letter of July 20. Bennett's letter requested that the Respondent supply the information requested in Merrill's letter "by no later than December 1, 1982," because Brawner was "anxious to continue negotiations for a successor collective bargaining agreement."

On January 11, 1983, McHenry finally responded in writing to the information requests of Merrill and Bennett. McHenry enclosed a copy of the 1982–1983 Association agreement and informed Merrill that, although it was the Respondent's desire to adhere to a uniform standard agreement, all portions of the Agreement were "open for negotiation." McHenry's letter also asserted that items 1, 2, and 3 of the information request were unnecessary, burdensome, and overly broad "particularly in light of the fact that our proposal says that, if we are not able to provide you with competent, skilled journeymen, you may hire from any source."

By letter dated February 14, 1983, Bennett renewed Brawner's demand for the requested information and suggested a further bargaining session (the second in 10 months) at the Merrill law offices on February 23, or at some alternate date if that date were not satisfactory. The Respondent replied to Bennett's February 14 letter on February 28. In his February 28 letter, McHenry stated that "we will be happy to meet with you to discuss [Brawner]" but continued by saying that it was the Respondent's position that Brawner's "letter to withdraw from [Respondent] was not untimely." McHenry asserted that he had so informed Brawner by telephone and in the June 28 meeting. As a consequence, McHenry stated that it was the Respondent's position that Brawner was bound by the 1982–1983 Association agreement.

Alex (Sonny) Brawner confirmed that McHenry had telephoned him concerning the timeliness of the termination notice on a day in 1983 which he could not recall. According to Alex Brawner, McHenry told him, in so many words, "Sonny, why don't you come back down and sign up? Your termination was not timely and . . . your contract is still in existence." According to Alex Brawner, McHenry claimed that Brawner's "termination was given too far in advance." Alex Brawner was unimpressed with McHenry's assertion. He told McHenry, "Giving your termination too far in advance is like having too much penis. You can't have too much." The conversation was concluded without Alex Brawner's concession that he was still bound to the 1982–1983 Association agreement.

In connection with Brawner's July 20 information request, the Respondent elicited testimony from Alex Brawner that in the past he had hired employees from a variety of sources. Alex Brawner had no positive recollection of any plasterer referred to his company by the Respondent. However, in certain instances, the employees Brawner hired were cleared through the Respondent's referral system after they were hired. In the past year, Brawner employed individuals he had known for a number of years, individuals who were referred to him by other employees, individuals with whom he had become acquainted as their instructor at the local apprenticeship school and his sons. Alex Brawner has been active in the industry for a number of years in the San Diego area. Brawner and McHenry are acquainted personally.

According to McHenry, the Respondent does not segregate the registrants on the hiring hall list by particular classifications because they are all journeymen. The registrants are required to inform the Respondent of the number of years of construction industry experience they have but the Respondent does not solicit information as to whether the registrant has had experience as a foreman or general foreman. Similarly, in order for McHenry to know the number of registrants who were working on any given day, it would be necessary for him to, in effect, poll the area contractors. McHenry claimed that he had never encountered a situation where a registrant had been referred to a contractor and was refused employment. Additionally, McHenry asserted that the Respondent does not maintain such records containing that information.

An entity known as Allied Trust (Allied) serves as the administrator for the health and welfare trust as well as the pension trust. Allied maintains all of the records which Brawner requested concerning those trusts. At the time of the hearing, McHenry was the only official employed by the Respondent. The other officers apparently are employed at other endeavors. The Respondent does maintain a negotiating committee which is selected each year.

C. Additional Findings and Conclusions

1. As to the refusal to meet and bargain

The Respondent defends its admitted refusal to meet and bargain a new agreement by claiming in effect that Brawner's April 23, 1982 termination notice was not timely to forestall the automatic renewal of the short form agreement on August 3, 1982. As a consequence, the Respondent claims it had no legal obligation to meet and bargain pursuant to Brawner's February 14, 1983 request. The heart of the Respondent's case is that Brawner's termination notice was given too soon. Respondent argues that there is a 30-day period between 90 and 60 days before the agreement's anniversary for exchanging termination notices under the agreement. The Respondent contends that the honoring of notices only if given in this 30-day period has been the "long established practice" of the Respondent and that it is also Board policy as reflected in Leonard Wholesale Meats, 136 NLRB 1000 (1962).

The Respondent's proffered defense of its refusal to meet and bargain for a new agreement pursuant to the February 14, 1983 request lacks merit. The agreement reflects no provision whatsoever concerning the maximum time preceeding the agreement's anniversary which narrows the period for timely termination notices. Because such a limitation is not explicitly set forth in the parties agreement or otherwise clearly inferrable from other specific terms of the agreement, and as a limited notice period severely restricts an important substantive right of the parties, it would not appear that the Board is not at liberty by decisional law to engraft a limited notice period on the parties' agreement. See H. K. Porter Co. v. NLRB, 397 U.S. 99 (1970). Even assuming that the Respondent had been successful in its attempt to prove that it was a long-established practice to honor only those termination notices which were given in the limited 30-day period, such a practice would be of no consequence here in view of its acknowledgement that Brawner had no way of knowing of such a practice. In the absence of a mutual intent to be bound by the claimed practice it would be highly inappropriate to take legal cognizance of such a practice.

Likewise, Leonard Wholesale Meats is inapposite to the situation found here. The holding in that case serves to notify the public of the time period prior to the expiration of a collective-bargaining agreement when the Board will entertain a petition for a representation election and, as such, it involves policy considerations which are completely distinguishable from those involved here. Accordingly, I find that Brawner's April 23, 1982 notice to the Respondent conformed to the requirements in the short form agreements and was sufficient to forestall renewal of the short form agreement. Construction Teamsters Trust v. Con Form Construction Corp., 657 F.2d 1101 (9th Cir. 1981). The Respondent's refusal to give effect to the April 23 termination notice and to thereafter meet and bargain with Brawner as requested violated Section 8(b)(3) of the Act, as alleged. Carpenters Local 743, 261 NLRB 425 (1982).

2. The alleged refusal to furnish information

The issue pertaining to the allegation that the Respondent unlawfully refused to furnish information to Brawner is considerably more troublesome. Citing two cases which hold that hiring hall information is the type of relevant information a labor organization must furnish to an employer and his belief that, as the Respondent wanted to negotiate its standard agreement containing both an exclusive hiring hall and trust funds for which information was sought, the General Counsel claims that it was unlawful for the Respondent to refuse to furnish the requested information.[4] The General Counsel also makes the unsupportable claim that McHenry admitted that "most, if not all, of the information requested by Brawner was in the possession of (the Respondent) and readily retrievable." The General Counsel does not address other obvious questions raised on the face of the request, namely, whether or not the Respondent is obliged to furnish Brawner information about the trust funds where, as here, the funds are jointly administered and whether or not the Respondent is obliged to furnish information about the amount of Brawner's own contributions to the funds at all.

The Union's position with respect to the information request is elusive. McHenry's January 11 letter claimed that the first three items of the informantion request were "unnecessary, burdensome and overly broad"; its answer asserted that the information was available elsewhere; the tenor of the testimony it elicited at the hearing was that certain of the information was unavailable and that, in any event, Brawner did not use the hiring hall; and, finally, in its brief the Respondent claims that Brawner has no need for the hiring hall information and, accordingly, the request was intended as a harassing tactic. Respondent's brief makes no argument at all concerning the requested trust fund information.

The principles governing the duty to furnish information are, for the most part, well settled. The Supreme Court has held that an employer has the duty to furnish a labor organization relevant information necessary for it to carry out its duties as a bargaining representative. NLRB v. Acme Industrial Co., 385 U.S. 432 (1967); NLRB v. Truitt Mfg. Co., 351 U.S. 149 (1956). For decisional purposes, the Board has assumed that a labor organization has a duty to furnish informationn which is parallel to that of an employer. Machinists Lodge 78 (Square D Co.), 224 NLRB 111 (1976). Board cases repeatedly cite and rely on the language of Judge Forman in Curtiss-Wright Corp. v. NLRB, 347 F.2d 61, 68–69 (3d Cir. 1965) that:

[4] The cases cited were: Asbestos Workers Local 80 (West Virginia Insulators Assn.), 248 NLRB 143 (1980); Graphic Communications Local 13 (Oakland Press Co.), 233 NLRB 944 (1977). The complaint does not allege that the Respondent was legally obliged to furnish all of the information sought in the July 20 request.

> [W]age and related information pertaining to employees in the bargaining unit is presumptively relevant, for, as such data concerns the core of the employer-employee relationship, a union is not required to show the precise relevance of it, unless effective employer rebuttal comes forth . . .

See, e.g., Washington Post Co., 237 NLRB 1493, 1495 (1978); A. S. Abell Co., 230 NLRB 1112, 1113 (1977); Northwest Publications, 211 NLRB 464, 465 fn. 4 (1974). Implicit in the Board and court action in imposing a duty on one party in the bargaining process to furnish information to the other party is the fact that the information sought is "reasonably available only from (that party's) records." Whitin Machine Works, 108 NLRB 1537, 1538, enfd. 217 F.2d 593 (4th Cir. 1954). Where the information sought is equally accessible to the parties from outside sources, there is no obligation for one or other of the parties to serve as a messenger for purposes of obtaining and furnishing relevant information. NLRB v. Milgo Industrial, 567 F.2d 540 (2d Cir. 1977). Finally, the duty to furnish information carries with it the concomitant duty to furnish the information promptly or to advise the requested party of the necessity for any delay. NLRB v. Feed & Supply Center, 294 F.2d 650 (9th Cir. 1961).

It is concluded that as a general proposition, information maintained by a labor organization concerning the operation of a hiring hall is presumptively relevant for purposes of collective bargaining or contract administration where, as here, the employer is contractually obliged to look initially to the hiring hall for its unit employees. Asbestos Workers supra; Oakland Press, supra. Therefore, to the extent that the Respondent's record contains the information requested in the first three items of Brawner's request, I find that the Respondent was legally obliged to furnish such information without delay. McHenry's uncontradicted testimony establishes that the Respondent did not maintain records dealing with the registrant's experience as general foreman or foreman, that Respondent does not maintain a running record of the employees who are actually employed, and that it does not seek or maintain information concerning employee terminations or failure to obtain employment. To the extent that the Respondent does not maintain the information about its registrants, it has no duty to expend its limited resources to survey the registrants in order to compile information for Brawner. However, as the Respondent regularly maintains records showing the names, classifications, and the years of construction experience of the hiring hall registrants, it was obliged to furnish such information to Brawner. Although it may well have been true that Brawner did not adhere to the letter or the spirit of its agreement with the Respondent concerning the use of the hiring hall, Brawner's failure in that regard does not excuse the Respondent's inaction here. Indeed, it may very well have been Brawner's intent to attempt to secure relief from the strict contractual requirements concerning the hiring hall by demonstrating that employees readily available to it were, in general, more experienced than the hiring hall registrants. Although it is true the negotiations between Brawner and the Respondent had not gotten off the ground, the evidence adduced by the Respondent here falls far short of demonstrating that Brawner's request was made in bad faith or for harassment purposes. Accordingly, to the extent that the Respondent failed to timely furnish information from its regularly maintained records concerning the names, classifications, and experience of its hiring hall registrants, I find that the Respondent violated Section 8(b)(3) of the Act.

Items 4 and 5 of Brawner's July 20 request concern information about the jointly administered trusts through which unit employees are provided a health and welfare plan and a pension plan. The information is clearly relevant. However, I find that the General Counsel has failed to establish that the Respondent was obliged to obtain and furnish the detailed information requested by Brawner. As Brawner's request indicates, the trusts are jointly administered. Brawner's short form agreement designates the employer representatives mentioned in the trust as its attorney in fact for the selection of the employer trustees. There is no evidence Brawner made the slightest attempt to obtain the requested information through its appointed trust representatives or the trust administrator, or that the information was not available through its appointed representative. From all that appears in this record, Brawner's access to the information sought in items 4 and 5 of its request was equal to, or greater than, the Respondent's.

In cases where the Board had imposed a duty on a labor organization to furnish such information, it is clear that the employer's inability to obtain reasonable access to the requested trust fund information was an important element of proof. Hospital Employees, 248 NLRB 631 (1980); Teamsters Local 959, 244 NLRB 19 (1979). However, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, it is reasonable to infer that where the trusts are jointly administered, trust information is available to both sides from the same source and that before one party or the other can be legally compelled to furnish the trust information, it must be demonstrated that the requesting party has at least made an attempt to obtain trust information from its own trustee. Accordingly, I find that the General Counsel has failed to establish that the Respondent was obliged to furnish the information requested by Brawner in items 4 and 5 of the request because it was not established that the information was reasonably available to Brawner only from Respondent's records. Whitin Machine Works, supra. This is especially true with respect to item 5(D)(ii).

The General Counsel also alleged that the Respondent violated Section 8(b)(3) of the Act by failing to furnish Brawner with the "names and titles" of those persons on the Respondent's negotiating committee pursuant to the July 20 request. At the outset, it should be clearly understood that the issue raised by the Respondent's failure to furnish this information is not the presence or absence of gentlemenly manners; the issue is whether the Respondent violated the Federal labor laws by failing to furnish this information. Under the Curtiss–Wright standard, such information is not presumptively relevant and, hence, the General Counsel was obliged to demonstrate its relevance. Press Democrat Publishing Co. v. NLRB, 629 F.2d 1320 (9th Cir. 1980); San Diego Newspaper Guild v. NLRB, 548 F.2d 863 (9th Cir. 1977). This is especially true when one considers the fact that Merrill's July 20 letter purports to confirm the framework agreed on for furture negotiations at the June 28 negotiating meeting. At the June 28 negotiating sessions, McHenry, the Respondent's only full-time official, appeared on behalf of the Respondent and gave no indication whatsoever that he lacked authority to act on behalf of the Respondent in concluding any understanding. Alex Brawner was thoroughly familiar with McHenry's role. In these circumstances, it is fair to assume that the Respondent would have been bound by McHenry's actions and ageements and that Brawner understood as much. Hence, as the precise relevance of the names and titles of the Respondent's negotiating committee was left tc conjecture, I find that the General Counsel has failed to show the relevance of such information and, therefore, that it has not been established that the Respondent violated Section 8(b)(3) of the Act, as alleged in this respect.

IV. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES ON COMMERCE

The activities of the Respondent set forth above, occurring in connection with Brawner's operations, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Brawner is an employer within the meaning of Section 2(2) of the Act, engaged in commerce or an industry affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. Respondent is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. At all relevant times the Respondent has been the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the journeymen and apprentice plasterers, including all working plasterer foremen, employed by Brawner, an appropriate unit of employees for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

4. On August 3, 1976, the Respondent and Brawner entered into a short form agreement which, by its terms, adopted the applicable terms and conditions of employment contained in the Association's collective-bargaining agreement as the terms and conditions of employment for the employees in the unit described in paragraph 3, above.

5. By its terms, the short form agreement in effect between Brawner and the Respondent was effective for a term of 3 years from the data of its execution and from year to year thereafter unless a notice of termination was provided by one of the parties at least 60 days prior to the anniversary date of the short form agreement.

6. By letter dated April 23, 1982, Brawner notified the Respondent that it desired to terminate the short form agreement and that it desired to negotiate the terms and conditions of a new collective-bargaining agreement for those employees in the unit described in paragraph 3, above.

7. At all material times, the Respondent has refused to recognize Brawner's April 23, 1982 termination notice as being a timely notice under the agreement for the purposes of forestalling the renewal of the short form agreement on August 3, 1982, and since February 28, 1983, has refused to meet and bargain with Brawner concerning the terms of a collective-bargaining agreement to succeed the short form agreement for that reason.

8. On July 20 and November 17, 1982, Brawner requested that the Respondent provide it with certain information the Respondent possessed which is necessary and relevant for the purposes of collective bargaining, namely, the names, classifications and the information it had concerning the years of construction industry experience of all registrants on the hiring hall lists maintained by the Respondent.

9. Following receipt of Brawner's request specified in paragraph 8, above, the Respondent has failed and refused to furnish said information to Brawner.

10. By the conduct specified in paragraphs 7 and 9, above, the Respondent has engaged in, and is engaging in, unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(b)(3) of the Act.

11. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

12. The Respondent did not engage in the other unfair labor practices alleged in the complaint dated March 30, 1983.

THE REMEDY

Having concluded that the Respondent has engaged in the unfair labor practices described above, it is recommended that the Respondent be ordered to cease and desist therefrom. It is also recommended that the Respondent be ordered to give effect to Brawner's timely termination notice of April 23, 1982, to notify Brawner that it will meet and bargain at reasonable times and places in conformance with Section 8(d) of the Act and then do so on Brawner's request, and to furnish Brawner with the names, classifications, and information it has concerning the construction industry experience of the registrants on its hiring hall list without further delay. Finally, it is recommended that the Respondent be ordered to post the notice attached as Appendix B at its offices and meeting halls and that it furnish the Regional Director for Region 21 with signed copies of said notice for posting by Brawner if it so desires.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[5]

ORDER

The Respondent, Plasterers Local Union No. 346 of the Operative Plasterers' & Cement Masons' International Association of the United States and Canada, AFL–CIO, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to bargain collectively with A. G. Brawner Plastering, Inc., by failing and refusing to honor Brawner's April 23, 1982 letter as a timely termination notice under the short form agreement.

(b) Refusing to bargain collectively, on request, with A. G. Brawner Plastering, Inc., for a new collective-bargaining agreement.

(c) Refusing to furnish A. G. Brawner Plastering, Inc., with the names, classifications, and information in its possession concerning the years of construction industry experience of the registrants on the Respondent's hiring hall lists.

(d) In any like or related manner restraining or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Honor and abide by the termination provision of its short form agreement entered into with A. G. Brawner Plastering, Inc.

(b) On the request of A. G. Brawner Plastering, Inc., bargain for a new collective-bargaining agreement.

(c) Furnish A. G. Brawner Plastering, Inc., with the information specified in paragraph 1(c), above, without further delay.

(d) Post at Respondent's business offices and meeting halls, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix B."[6] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 21, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to members are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Sign and return to the Regional Director for Region 21 sufficient copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix B" for posting by A. G. Brawner Plastering, Inc., if willing, in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted.

(f) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that those allegations in the complaint dated March 30, 1983, which have not been proven or otherwise sustained be dismissed.

APPENDIX A

INFORMATION REQUESTED FROM PLASTERERS' LOCAL NO. 346 BY A.G. BRAWNER PLASTERING, INC.

1) State the numbers of persons registered for employment with your hiring hall, indicating their classification (foreman, journeyman, apprentice, etc.) and a general allocation as to the years of construction industry experience in your craft or trade held by such persons. State the numbers of persons having experience in the last three years as general foreman or foreman.

2) Advise us of the number of persons presently employed, describing them with reference to the categories stated in request number one above. Please advise us of the number of persons (by category) who are registered for employment with your union's hiring hall, and who are available for employment.

3) State the names, addreses and employment category of all persons represented by your union who have had employment refused or terminated because of lack of qualifications or cause other than lack of work, and state:

A) the name, address and telephone number of the employer or employers refusing or terminating employment;

B) the date(s) of such termination(s);

C) the stated reasons given by (1) the employer and (2) the employee for the refusal or termination of employment.

4) Please provide us immediately with details regarding the health and welfare plan provided through the jointly administered trust applicable to your union as follows:

A) A detailed analysis of coverage, benefits and cost as projected for the next contract period;

B) All actuarial statements or reports involving this trust fund or any of its subsidiaries; and,

C) All financial reports, audited or unaudited, for this trust fund, including any subsidiary, for the period beginning January 1, 1977.

5) With regard to the jointly administered pension plan, please provide us immediately with the following details:

A) Any actuarial studies or reports which have been completed with regard to the fund, or any of its subsidiaries;

B) All financial reports and income statements, audited or unaudited, for this trust fund, including any subsidiary thereof, for the period beginning January 1, 1977;

[5] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[6] If this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

C) A description of the present unfunded liability of said plan;

D) With regard to employer contributions to the pension fund for the five-year period ending with the most recent plan year's expiration,

DECISION AND ORDER DIRECTING HEARING

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

The National Labor Relations Board, by a three-member panel, has considered objections to an election held 19 November 1982 and the Regional Director's report recommending disposition of them. The election was conducted pursuant to a Stipulated Election Agreement. The tally of ballots shows 12 for the Petitioner, none for the Intervenor, 4 against the participating labor organizations, with 6 challenged ballots, an insufficient number to affect the results.

On 26 November 1982 the Employer filed timely objections to the election. An investigation of the objections was conducted and thereafter on 23 December 1982 the Regional Director issued and served on the parties his Report on Objections in which he recommended that the Employer's objections be overruled in their entirety.

Thereafter on 5 January 1983 the Employer filed timely exceptions to the Regional Director's report, contending that a hearing should be held to resolve the factual issues raised by the three objections. On 13 January 1983 the Petitioner filed an answering brief to the Employer's exceptions.

The Board has reviewed the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and hereby adopts the Regional Director's findings and recommendations except as modified herein.

The Board has indicated two situations where supervisory participation in union organizing campaigns may be objectionable.[2] The first is where employees may be led to believe that the supervisor was acting on behalf of the employer and that the employer favors the union. Here, it is clear that former supervisor Simbahon strongly favored the Petitioner. According to the employee affiant, Simbahon indicated to him after the employees began to discuss unionization that "It's good you guys are going Union." The affiant further indicated that he knew Simbahon was "pushing for the Union" and that Simbahon "was very close to most of the employees and it was common knowledge that he was supporting the Union." Notwithstanding these comments, our dissenting colleague finds no cause for concern in Simbahon's conduct because he characterizes Simbahon's statement in support of the Union merely as his personal opinion and he finds no evidence that Simbahon was speaking on behalf of the Employer. However, he has missed the focus of Stevenson Equipment, supra, in so concluding. As the Board noted in Stevenson Equipment "if supervisors actively encourage employees to vote for the Union, and the employer takes no stance to the contrary, the supervisory conduct might well imply to the employees that the employer favors the Union."[3] The Board in Stevenson further noted that "[a]ny such impression will be dissipated . . . if, in one way or another, the employer's antagonism to the Union is brought to the attention of the employees."[4] The problem in this case, however, is that the Regional Director has supplied no details on the Employer's position on unionization. In the face of Simbahon's strong support of the Petitioner, such evidence is crucial to the Board's disposition of the objection.

A second concern of the Board in analyzing whether supervisory participation in union organizing is objectionable is the posssibility that such conduct would coerce an employee into supporting the union out of a fear of future retaliation by a union-oriented supervisor. The Board's decision in Sheraton Motor Inn[5] is instructive in this regard. There the Board found objectionable the strong prounion activities of a "major" supervisor. The Board did not analyze that supervisor's particular comments to determine whether they were themselves coercive. Rather, the Board stated that:

> While the record does not show Gibbons [the supervisor] gave any indication to employees that he would use his authority as supervisor to punish those who failed to support the Union, we believe, given Gibbons' considerable supervisory authority and his active and outspoken support of the Union throughout the organizational campaign, that there is a reasonable "possibility that [his] conduct could coerce an employee into supporting the union."[6]

Given the Board's approach in Sheraton, there are at least three issues in the instant case which have yet to be addressed fully and which will not be resolved absent a hearing. First, there is the question whether Simbahon was a "major" supervisor like Gibbons in Sheraton. The affiant describes him as "Manager" but the Regional Director did not elaborate on his status. Another question concerns the real extent of his campaign activities. The affiant states Simbahon was "pushing for the Union" and was "supporting the Union." The Regional Director did not pursue the matter further to determine the extent of Simbahon's organizing efforts. And lastly the question arises as to whether Simbahon was working at the Employer at the time of the election. Although Simbahon is referred to by the parties as a "former" manager it is not clear whether he was working at the Employer when the election was held. This fact would certainly be relevant in determining whether his conduct ultimately was sufficient to set aside the election.[7]

In sum, the Employer's Objection 1 concerning Simbahon's actions raises substantial material factual issues which have not yet been resolved and a hearing is necessary.[8]

ORDER

It is ordered that the above-entitled matter is referred to the Regional Director for Region 20 for the purpose of conducting a hearing on the Employer's Objection 1 in accordance with the terms of this decision and that said Regional Director is authorized to issue notice of hearing.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the hearing officer designated for the purpose of conducting the hearing pursuant to this Order shall prepare and cause to be served on the parties a report containing resolutions of credibility of witnesses, findings of fact, and recommendations to the Board as to the disposition of said objection. Within 10 days from the date of issuance of said report, either party may file with the Board in Washington, D.C., eight copies of exceptions thereto. Immediately upon the filing of such exceptions, the parties filing the same shall serve a copy thereof on the other party, and shall file a copy with the Regional Director. If no exceptions are filed thereto, the Board will adopt the recommendations of the hearing officer.

[7] See Stevenson Equipment, supra, Sheraton Motor Inn, supra.

[8] In spite of Simbahon's comments, our dissenting colleague also contends that his remarks showed no preference for either union in this two-union case. The remarks themselves belie the contention that Simbahon was not pushing a particular union. Further, we note that the Regional Director indicated that Simbahon spoke to the affiant sometime between mid-August and mid-September. The election was not conducted until November and the Employer states that Intervenor had not yet formally moved to intervene when the remark was made. Clearly, the import of the affiant is that Simbahon favored a particular union and it seems reasonable to conclude that the union was the Petitioner. At the very least, a material issue of fact exists on this issue which, taken in conjunction with the balance of the case, is further reason for a hearing.

We adopt the Regional Director's findings and recommendations with respect to Objection 2. We also adopt the Regional Director's recommendation to overrule Objection 3 since it appears that the conduct discussed in this objection was prepetition conduct. See Ideal Electric & Mfg. Co., 134 NLRB 1275 (1961).

MEMBER ZIMMERMAN, dissenting in part.

Contrary to the majority, I find no sufficient basis for directing a hearing on the Employer's Objection 1 which alleges impermissible supervisory sponsorship and electioneering by former manager, Al Simbahon.

I note at the outset that mere supervisory participation in a union's organizational campaign does not necessarily warrant setting aside an election.[1] The Board has found that such participation can constitute grounds for setting aside an election where: (1) employees may be led to believe that the employer favors the union; and (2) employees may be coerced into supporting the union out of fear of future retaliation by a union-oriented supervisor. The evidence produced by the Employer does not show that either situation exists in this case.

In support of its allegation of impermissible supervisory participation, the Employer produced an affidavit of a single employee who states that sometime after the employees began to discuss the union, Simbahon came up to him after lunch in back of the office, at a time when no one else was present, and said, "It's good you guys are going union." The employee states, "I know [Simbahon] was pushing for the Union," he was "very close" to most of the employees, and it was common knowledge that he supported the Union.

Assuming the truth of these assertions, the Employer has not made out a prima facie case.[2] Nothing in the employee affidavit suggests that Simbahon misled employees into believing that the Employer was in favor of the Union. Simbahon's statement to the employee witness does not indicate he was speaking on behalf of the Employer. At the most it amounted to nothing more than his personal approval of the employees' "going union." Such evidence, which is all that the Employer—the moving party—has offered, is not sufficient to show Simbahon's conduct had a tendency to interfere with the employees' free choice in the election.[3]

Similarly, this evidence fails to indicate that the employees had reason to believe that Simbahon would engage in reprisals against them in the event

[1] Turner's Express, 189 NLRB 106 (1971); Stevenson Equipment Co., 174 NLRB 865 (1969).

[2] Since the Employer has not presented a prima facie showing of substantial and material issues which would warrant setting aside the election, it is not entitled to an evidentiary hearing. E.g., Modesto Brothers, 255 NLRB 828, 829 (1981).

[3] Since it cannot be found on the evidence presented that Simbahon's conduct could have led employees to believe that the Employer favored unionization, it is immaterial to resolving the merits of Objection 1 whether the Employer in fact conducted an antiunion campaign capable of dissipating an impression that the Employer favored unionization. Admiral Petroleum Corp., 240 NLRB 894, 895 (1979).

they rejected the Union.[4] Surely Simbahon's statement was not inherently threatening. And there is no evidence that Simbahon did anything to indicate that he would use whatever authority he possessed to punish those who did not join the Union. Even assuming that Simbahon was a "major" supervisor, the degree of his supervisory authority cannot, standing alone, render his conduct objectionable.[5] Accordingly, I find Simbahon's conduct did not interfere with the employees' free choice in the election.[6]

Based on the foregoing, I would adopt the Regional Director's recommendation to overrule the Employer's objection without a hearing, and, as the tally of ballots shows that the Petitioner has received a majority of the valid votes cast, I would certify the Petitioner as the employees' representative.

[4] It is significant to note that Simbahon is a former manager of the Respondent. As the record now stands, it is not clear when Simbahon left the Respondent's employ in relation to the alleged objectionable remark or the election. Clearly, however, if Simbahon was terminated before the election, there would be no basis to find this conduct objectionable, as offending supervisors, once no longer employed, are incapable of exerting any coercion. See El Caballo, 251 NLRB 46 (1980).

[6] The Regional Director found, and I agree, that Simbahon's statement showed no preference for either union in this two-union case.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

On 15 December 1982 the National Labor Relations Board issued a Decision and Order in this proceeding,[1] adopting an administrative law judge's findings that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by soliciting grievances from its employees and promising to remedy them in order to induce employees to refrain from supporting the National Organization of Industrial Trade Unions (the Union) and violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) by laying off employees Joseph Benzola and Jack Roberts in order to discourage membership in the Union. The Board also adopted the judge's findings that the Respondent's unfair labor practices were sufficiently widespread and serious to warrant issuance of a bargaining order under NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575 (1969), and that the Respondent's refusal to recognize and bargain with the Union violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5).[2] The Board ordered the Respondent to cease and desist from the conduct found unlawful and to take certain affirmative action, including bargaining with the Union on request as the exclusive bargaining representative of its employees. Thereafter, the Board filed an application for enforcement with the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit.

On 13 March 1984 a panel of the court of appeals enforced the Board's Order to the extent that the Board found the Respondent had violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3). The court declined, however, to enforce that portion of the Order requiring the Respondent to bargain with the Union and remanded this proceeding to the Board for additional findings concerning the propriety of a bargaining order. The court found that events occurring after the unfair labor practices were committed were relevant to the issuance of a bargaining order. Thus, the court directed the Board to consider lapse of time, employee turnover, and other factors and to apply the law of the circuit that the existence of "hallmark" violations alone does not necessarily warrant issuance of a bargaining order.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

Applying the principles in the court's remand as the law of this case, we find for the following reasons that a bargaining order is not warranted.

As found in our original decision the Union commenced organizational activities among the Respondent's 15 unit employees on 7 April 1980.[3] On 10 April the Union demanded recognition. At the employees' request the Respondent held a meeting on company premises the following day where employees' benefits and grievances were discussed. At this meeting the Respondent agreed to "look into" employees' stated concerns and thereafter at the request of an employee posted a list of holidays already enjoyed by employees.[4] On 15 April the Respondent laid off employees Benzola and Roberts because of their activities on behalf of the Union. On 29 May the Respondent offered Benzola reinstatement and on 4 June the Respondent offered Roberts reinstatement. Roberts accepted the reinstatement offer. Benzola did not respond.

At the time of the unfair labor practices in April 1980 the Respondent employed 15 bargaining unit employees. When our original decision issued in the proceeding in December 1982 the Respondent employed 13 unit employees. Only 5 of those 13 employees had been employed at the time of the unfair labor practices in April 1980. Of those five employees only two had signed union authorization cards. Two more years have now elapsed since our original decision in this proceeding.

Substantially similar circumstances were present in NLRB v. Knogo Corp., 727 F.2d 55 (2d Cir. 1984), in which the Second Circuit denied enforcement of a bargaining order. There, 60 percent of the current unit employees were not employed at the time the violations were committed. Here, approximately 60 percent of the unit as it existed when our original decision issued were not employed at the time the violations were committed. There almost two-thirds of the old employees had not signed cards. Here, precisely 60 percent of the employees employed in April 1980 who were still employed in December 1982 had not signed cards. There, the court noted a substantial lapse of time cast doubt on whether employee preference once expressed through authorization cards still reflected

[2] Former Chairman Van de Water and Member Hunter declined to join that portion of the Board's Order directing the Respondent to bargain with the Union.

Chairman Dotson did not participate in the original decision and expresses no view regarding the Board's findings therein.

[3] All dates are in 1980 unless noted otherwise.

[4] The list included no additional holidays that were not already enjoyed.

majority support for the union. Here, a similar substantial lapse of time occurred.

In addition to such substantial employee turnover and passage of time in the instant proceeding, we also find that certain other factors now militate against issuance of a bargaining order. Thus, although the discriminatory layoff of employees Benzola and Roberts were hallmark violations of the Act, the Respondent offered reinstatement to both these employees several weeks later and, indeed, Roberts accepted the Respondent's offer. Further, notwithstanding its solicitation of grievances and implied promise to remedy grievances, the Respondent did not implement any actual changes in response to the grievances solicited.[5] Nor did the Respondent otherwise engage in acts of reprisal or coercion independently violative of Section 8(a)(1).

Taken together with the substantial employee turnover and passage of time, we find that the Respondent's unfair labor practices in April 1980 did not have the tendency to undermine majority strength and impede the election processes as to make a fair election unlikely years later. NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., supra.[6] We shall therefore deny the request for a bargaining order and shall dismiss the complaint insofar as it alleges that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

[5] As noted, the Respondent merely posted a list of holidays already enjoyed by employees.

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed insofar as it alleges that the Respondent, Windsor Industries, Inc., Melville, New York, refused to bargain with National Organization of Industrial Trade Unions in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the request for a bargaining order is denied.

[6] As directed by the court of appeals, in reaching our decision we have carefully considered the court's opinions in NLRB v. General Stencils, 438 F.2d 894 (2d Cir. 1971); J. J. Newberry Co. v. NLRB, 645 F.2d 148 (2d Cir. 1981); NLRB v. Pace Oldsmobile, 681 F.2d 99 (2d Cir. 1982); and NLRB v. Marion Rohr Corp., 714 F.2d 228 (2d Cir. 1983). We conclude that a bargaining order is not warranted in this proceeding under the holdings of those cases. See also NLRB v. Knogo Corp., supra.

International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL–CIO and International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL–CIO, Local Lodge No. 1271 and Bolton-Emerson, Inc. Case 1–CB–5899

14 December 1984

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

Upon a charge filed 23 December 1983 and an amended charge filed 23 January 1984 the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board by the Regional Director for Region 1 issued a complaint and notice of hearing on 2 February 1984. The complaint alleges that the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL–CIO (Respondent International), violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act by maintaining in its constitution article L, section 3, which restricts the rights of members to resign during a strike or within 14 days preceding its commencement.

The complaint further alleges that the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL–CIO, Local Lodge No. 1271 (Respondent Local), violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) when pursuant to article L, section 3 it fined four employees who after tendering resignations from membership in Respondent Local resumed working for the Charging Party.

On 4, 13, and 18 June 1984 the General Counsel, the Respondents, and the Charging Party entered into a stipulation of facts and motion to transfer proceeding to the Board. The parties agree that the stipulation, together with the charge, complaint, and the answer to the complaint, constitute the entire record in the case. The parties waived a hearing and the issuance of a decision by an administrative law judge and submitted the case directly to the Board for findings of facts, conclusions of law, and issuance of an order.

On 28 September 1984, the Board issued an order granting the motion, approving the stipulation, and transferring the proceeding to the Board. Thereafter, the parties filed briefs.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

On the entire record and the briefs, the Board makes the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The Employer is a Massachusetts corporation engaged in the manufacture and nonretail sale and distribution of industrial knives and related products. Annually, the Employer, in the course and conduct of its operations, purchases and receives at its Lawrence, Massachusetts facility products, goods, and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points outside the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. Additionally, the Employer, in the course and conduct of its operations, annually sells and ships from its Lawrence facility products, goods, and materials valued at over $50,000 directly to points outside the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. We find that the Employer is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act. We further find that Respondents are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Stipulated Facts

Respondent Local is the recognized exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the Charging Party's production and maintenance employees, including drivers at the Lawrence, Massachusetts facility. On 28 February 1983 the collective-bargaining agreement covering these employees expired. Commencing on 1 March 1983 certain of the bargaining unit employees, including Victor Delisle, Gilbert Olivera, Manuel Silveria, and Frank Mack, went out on an economic strike which lasted through 19 April 1983. On 11 April 1983, Delisle and Olivera submitted their resignations from membership in Respondent Local and thereafter crossed Respondent Local's picket line to resume working for the Charging Party. On 17 April 1983 Silveria submitted his resignation from membership in Respondent Local, and on 18 April 1983 he crossed the picket line and returned to work. Mack tendered his resignation from membership in Respondent Local on 18 April 1983. He then crossed the picket line and resumed working for the Charging Party.

Article L, section 3 of the constitution of Respondent International provides in relevant part:

> Improper Conduct of a Member: . . .
> Accepting employment in any capacity in an establishment where a strike or lockout exists as recognized under this Constitution, without permission. Resignation shall not relieve a member of his obligation to refrain from accepting employment at the establishment for the duration of the strike or lockout if the resignation occurs during the period of the strike or lockout or within 14 days preceding its commencement. Where observance of a pri> mary picket line is required, any resignation tendered during the period that the picket line is maintained, or within 14 days preceding its establishment, shall not become effective as a resignation during the period the picket line is maintained, nor shall it relieve a member of his or her obligation to observe the primary picket line for its duration.

About 8 December 1983 Respondent Local, in furtherance of this provision, filed charges against employees Delisle, Olivera, Silveria, and Mack. About 17 December 1983 Respondent Local imposed court-collectible fines on Delisle, Olivera, Silveria, and Mack. The parties stipulated that Respondent Local engaged in the conduct described above because these four employees crossed a legally established picket line.

B. Contentions of the Parties

Citing Engineers & Scientists Guild (Lockheed-California), 268 NLRB 311 (1983), and Machinists Local 1414 (Neufeld Porsche-Audi), 270 NLRB 1330 (1984), the General Counsel contends that the constitutional provision restricting resignations is unlawful and that the mere maintenance by a union of a constitutional provision which is unenforceable in its restriction of the right of members to resign during the pendency of a strike is coercive and violates Section 8(b)(1)(A). Accordingly, the General Counsel maintains that Respondent Local and Respondent International have violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) by promulgating and maintaining the restriction on resignation and Respondent Local has violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) by imposing fines on Delisle, Mack, Olivera, and Silveria for crossing the picket line and returning to work after resigning their membership in Respondent Local.

The Charging Party argues that the Respondents violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) by imposing fines on employees who returned to work after resigning their union membership. The Charging Party urges that the Board order Respondent Local to rescind the fines and Respondent International to expunge article L, section 3 from its constitution.

In its brief, the Union simply states:

> [F]or the reasons set forth in Machinists Local 1327, 263 NLRB 984, enf. denied, Machinists Lodge 1327, International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers v. NLRB (Dalmo Victor II), 725 F.2d 1212 (9th Cir. 1984), pet. for rehg. den. (July 10, 1984), the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL–CIO, and the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL–CIO, Local Lodge 1271, urge the Board to find that the Union has not violated Section 8(b)(1)(a) [sic] of the Act, and to dismiss the Complaint in its entirety.

C. Analysis and Findings

Unions may not, pursuant to their constitutional provision prohibiting resignations during a strike or within 14 days preceding its commencement, lawfully impose fines on members who resigned and returned to work during the course of a strike. In urging the Board to dismiss the complaint, the Respondents rely on Machinists Local 1327 (Dalmo Victor), 263 NLRB 984 (1982). In that case the Board found invalid the same IAM constitutional restriction on a member's right to resign at issue here. The plurality opinion held that a union could lawfully restrict a member's right to resign for 30 days after the tender of the resignation. The concurring opinion held that any restriction imposed on a member's right to resign is invalid.

In a subsequent case, Neufeld Porsche-Audi, supra, the Board adopted the view of the Dalmo Victor concurrence and overruled that case and its progeny. For the reasons set forth in Neufeld Porsche-Audi, we find here that by restricting members' right to resign and by fining and filing charges against four employees who crossed Respondent Local's picket line after resigning, the Respondents violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.[1] Further, in accord with Neufeld Porsche-Audi we shall require that the Respondents cease and desist from maintaining the restriction on resignation and expunge the provision from their governing documents.[2]

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Charging Party is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Respondents are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By maintaining in their governing documents article L, section 3 prohibiting resignations during a strike or within 14 days preceding its commencement; and by filing charges and fining employees who after submitting resignations from membership in the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL–CIO, Local Lodge No. 1271 resumed working for the Charging Party, the Respondents have engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(b)(1)(A) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

REMEDY

Having found that the Respondents have violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act, we shall order them to cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the purposes of the Act. We shall order the Respondents to remove from their governing documents the portion of article L, section 3 of the constitution of the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers set forth above,[3] rescind any fines levied against those employees who resigned their membership and subsequently resumed working for the Charging Party, refund any moneys these employees may have paid as a result of the fines imposed against them, with interest computed in the manner prescribed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977), and cease any prosecution of these employees.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that

A. Respondent International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL–CIO, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Maintaining in its constitution article L, section 3 to the extent it provides:

> Improper Conduct of a Member: . . .
> Accepting employment in any capacity in an establishment where a strike or lockout exists as recognized under this Constitution, without permission. Resignation shall not relieve a member of his obligation to refrain from accepting employment at the establishment for the duration of the strike or lockout if the resignation occurs during the period of the strike or lockout or within 14 days preceding its commencement. Where observance of a primary picket line is required, any resignation tendered during the period that the picket line is maintained, or within 14 days preceding its establishment, shall not become effective as a resignation during the period the picket line is maintained, nor shall it relieve a member of his or her obligation to observe the primary picket line for its duration.

(b) In any like or related manner restraining or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action which is designed to effectuate the purposes of the Act.

(a) Remove from its constitution the portion of article L, section 3 set forth above.

(b) Post at its business office copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix A."[4] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 1, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to members are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(c) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

B. Respondent International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL–CIO, Local Lodge No. 1271, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Maintaining in its governing documents article L, section 3 of the constitution of the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers to the extent it provides:

> Improper Conduct of a Member: . . .
> Accepting employment in any capacity in an establishment where a strike or lockout exists as recognized under this Constitution, without permission. Resignation shall not relieve a member of his obligation to refrain from accepting employment at the establishment for the duration of the strike or lockout if the resignation occurs during the period of the strike or lockout or within 14 days preceding its commencement. Where observance of a primary picket line is required, any resignation tendered during the period that the picket line is maintained, or within 14 days preceding its establishment, shall not become effective as a resignation during the period the picket line is maintained, nor shall it relieve a member of his or her obligation to observe the primary picket line for its duration.

[3] Although the complaint in this case does not specifically allege the maintenance of the provision by Respondent Local in its governing documents as being unlawful, the absence of such an allegation has no bearing on the Board's discretion to fashion appropriate remedies for the violations found. Neufeld Porsche-Audi, supra. We will therefore order Respondent Local to cease and desist from maintaining the provision in its governing documents and to expunge the provision therefrom.

[4] If this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

(b) Restraining and coercing employees who have resigned from and are no longer members of the Respondent in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act by imposing fines on such employees because of their postresignation conduct in working at Bolton-Emerson, Inc. during the strike which commenced on 1 March 1983.

(c) Prosecuting any former members for their postresignation crossing of Local Lodge No. 1271's picket line during the strike at Bolton-Emerson which commenced on 1 March 1983.

(d) In any like or related manner restraining or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Remove from its governing documents the portion of article L, section 3 of the constitution of the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers set forth above.

(b) Vacate, rescind, and expunge from its records all charges and rescind any and all fines levied against Victor Delisle, Gilbert Olivera, Manuel Silveria, and Frank Mack, who submitted resignations of their membership in Local Lodge No. 1271 during the strike against Bolton-Emerson, Inc., which began on 1 March 1983 and concluded on 19 April 1983, and crossed Local Lodge No. 1271's picket line to return to work for Bolton-Emerson, Inc.

(c) Notify each of the above-named employees in writing that the charges and fines have been vacated, expunged, or rescinded, and that it will take no action to collect the fines.

(d) Refund to each of the above-named employees all moneys they may have paid to it as a result of the fines, plus interest in accordance with the Board's established policies.

(e) Post at its business office copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix B."[5] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 1, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to members are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(f) Mail to the Regional Director signed copies of the notice for posting by Bolton-Emerson, Inc., if the Company is willing, in places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Copies of the notices, furnished by the Regional Director after being duly signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be returned forthwith to the Regional Director.

(g) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

United Services of America International Labor Union and Lincoln Contracting & Equipment Co., Inc. and United Mine Workers of America, District 28 and United Mine Workers of America, Local 6843. Case 6–CD–797

14 December 1984

DECISION AND DETERMINATION OF DISPUTE

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

The charge in this Section 10(k) proceeding was filed 21 May 1984 by the Employer, Lincoln Contracting & Equipment Co., Inc. (the Employer), alleging that the Respondent, United Services of America International Labor Union (USA), violated Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the National Labor Relations Act by engaging in proscribed activity with an object of forcing the Employer to assign certain work to employees it represents rather than to employees represented by United Mine Workers of America, Local 6843 (UMWA). The hearing was held 7 June 1984 before Hearing Officer Kim Siegert.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board affirms the hearing officer's rulings, finding them free from prejudicial error. On the entire record, the Board makes the following findings.

I. JURISDICTION

The Employer, a Pennsylvania corporation, is a coal mine construction company with an office and place of business in Boswell, Pennsylvania, where it annually receives supplies and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points outside the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. The parties stipulate, and we find, that the Employer is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act and that USA and UMWA are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE DISPUTE

A. Background and Facts of Dispute

The Employer is engaged in the business of coal construction and fabrication. It is currently performing field construction work at the Consolidated Coal Company Robena Mine located outside Carmichaels, Pennsylvania. The work includes renovating, repairing, and updating existing structures.

On 6 April 1984 the Employer and USA entered into a contract that specifically covers all field construction work performed for the Consolidated Coal Company at the Robena Mine. The Employer is also a member of the Association of Bituminous Contractors (ABC) and is signatory to the National Coal Mine Construction Agreement of 1981 (ABC contract) entered into with UMWA. Article I of the ABC contract "covers all work related to the development, expansion or alteration of coal mines . . . and all other such coal-related work that is performed at or on coal lands by the members of the association for coal mine operators which require such construction work to be performed under the jurisdiction of the United Mine Workers of America."

In mid-April the Employer assigned the disputed work to employees represented by USA. Thereafter, UMWA filed a grievance claiming the Employer violated article I of the ABC contract. On being informed of the grievance, USA responded by advising the Employer that it would picket if the work was assigned to employees represented by another union. Employees represented by USA have continued performing the disputed work.

B. Work in Dispute

The disputed work involves the renovating, repairing and updating of existing structures at the Consolidated Coal Company Robena Mine. The work is currently being performed by 10 employees represented by USA.

C. Contentions of the Parties

The Employer and USA contend that the disputed work has properly been assigned to the employees represented by USA on the basis of their contract of 6 April 1984, the Employer's assignment and past practice, area practice, and efficiency and economy of operations. The Employer also argues that it is not obligated to assign the disputed work to UMWA-represented employees since Consolidated did not specify that the work be given to employees represented by that organization.

UMWA contends that the ABC contract has jurisdiction over the disputed work and that the work should be assigned to employees represented by UMWA. UMWA further claims that article I of the ABC contract does not create a contract whose jurisdiction is based solely on the coal mine operator's specific request that work be performed by employees represented by UMWA.

D. Applicability of the Statute

On 6 May 1984 UMWA filed a grievance against the Employer with respect to the assignment of the disputed work. The Employer informed USA of the grievance and requested its position on the matter. USA responded by claiming the disputed work and threatened to picket the Employer if the disputed work were assigned to another union.

The parties stipulated that there is no agreed-on method for voluntary adjustment of the dispute.

We find reasonable cause to believe that a violation of Section 8(b)(4)(D) has occurred and that there exists no agreed-on method for voluntary adjustment of the dispute within the meaning of Section 10(k) of the Act. Accordingly, we find that the dispute is properly before the Board for determination.

E. Merits of the Dispute

Section 10(k) requires the Board to make an affirmative award of disputed work after considering various factors. NLRB v. Electrical Workers IBEW Local 1212 (Columbia Broadcasting), 364 U.S. 573 (1961). The Board has held that its determination in a jurisdictional dispute is an act of judgment based on common sense and experience, reached by balancing the factors involved in a particular case. Machinists Lodge 1743 (J. A. Jones Construction), 135 NLRB 1402 (1962).

The following factors are relevant in making the determination of this dispute.

1. Certifications and collective-bargaining agreements

There are no orders or certifications of the Board awarding jurisdiction of the disputed work to employees represented by USA or UMWA.

The Employer's president and vice president testified that the contract between the Employer and USA specifically covers all field construction work of the Employer at the Consolidated Coal Company Robena Mine.

As described above, the Employer is signatory to the 1981 ABC contract negotiated between ABC and UMWA. Article I of the ABC contract also covers the disputed work. However, it has been the Employer's and area practice to interpret article I to cover projects only where the coal mine operator requires that the work be performed under UMWA jurisdiction. In this case Consolidated did not request that the disputed work be performed under UMWA jurisdiction. Thus, it appears that the ABC contract is not applicable to the Robena Mine[1] but the USA agreement explicitly covers the work in dispute.[2] Accordingly, we find that the collective-bargaining agreements favor assigning the work to employees represented by USA.

2. Employer assignment, company past practice, and area practice

The Employer assigned the disputed work to employees represented by USA.

The Employer's president and vice president testified that the Employer's consistent practice has been to apply the ABC contract only where the coal company requires that the work be performed under UMWA jurisdiction. When the coal company does not make a specific request, the Employer is free to assign the work to employees represented by unions other than UMWA. The record also discloses that the area practice is consistent with the Employer's assignment. Accordingly, these factors favor an award to the employees represented by USA.

3. Relative skills

Both groups of employees appear equally skilled in performing the disputed work. Therefore, this factor favors neither group.

4. Economy and efficiency of operations

According to the Employer's president and vice president, there are several reasons continued performance of the disputed work by the employees represented by USA is more economical and efficient. The USA contract permits the use of working foremen and provides for an 8-hour workday as opposed to a 7-1/2-hour workday under the ABC contract. The USA contract also allows for greater flexibility in scheduling makeup work on Saturdays, utilizing employees in needed classifications, and hiring needed employees. Finally, employees represented by USA provide continuity since they have been performing the disputed work since mid-April. Accordingly, we find that this factor favors an award of the disputed work to employees represented by USA.

[2] We reject UMWA's contention that the Roberts and Schaeffer arbitration decision is controlling on the interpretation of art. I. There the employer, a signatory to the ABC contract, contracted with a coal mine operator to perform construction work and then subcontracted the work to a nonsignatory subcontractor. The employer argued that it was not bound to the ABC agreement since the mine operator did not request that jurisdiction for the work be given to the UMWA. In finding, inter alia, that the employer has no authority under the ABC contract to subcontract out the work, the arbitrator relied primarily on the fact that the employer was signatory to only one contract. He distinguished Elk Run in which the employer was signatory to two contracts and emphasized that there was no evidence that Roberts and Schaeffer was a multiunion signator. Here the Employer is signatory to two contracts. Therefore, as the facts in the instant case differ significantly from the Roberts and Schaeffer arbitration decision, we find it is not controlling.

Conclusions

After considering all the relevant factors, we conclude that employees represented by USA are entitled to perform the work in dispute. We reach this conclusion relying on the collective-bargaining agreements, Employer assignment and past practice, area practice, and economy and efficiency of operation. In making this determination, we are awarding the work to employees represented by USA, not to that Union or its members. The determination is limited to the controversy that gave rise to this proceeding.

DETERMINATION OF DISPUTE

The National Labor Relations Board makes the following Determination of Dispute.

Employees represented by United Services of America International Labor Union are entitled to perform all field construction work at the Consolidated Coal Company Robena Mine, Carmichaels, Pennsylvania.

14 December 1984

DECISION AND DETERMINATION OF DISPUTE

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

This is a consolidated proceeding under Section 10(k) of the National Labor Relations Act, following charges filed by Gunther (Case 5–CD–279) and Mountaineer (Case 5–CD–278) alleging that USA violated Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the Act by engaging in proscribed activity with an object of forcing or requiring these Companies to assign certain work to its members rather than to employees represented by UMWA.

Pursuant to notice, a hearing was held before Hearing Officer Mark M. Carissimi on 4 June 1984. All parties appeared and were afforded full opportunity to be heard, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, and to adduce evidence bearing on the issues. Thereafter, Gunther and Mountaineer filed a joint brief and the UMWA filed a brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board affirms the hearing officer's rulings, finding them free from prejudicial error. On the entire record, the Board makes the following findings.

Case 5–CD–279

I. JURISDICTION

Gunther, a Missouri corporation, is engaged in the mining construction business in various States of the United States. During the past year, a representative period, Gunther purchased and received materials and supplies valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points outside the State of Missouri. We find that Gunther is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act and that USA and UMWA are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE DISPUTE

A. Background and Facts of Dispute

About September 1983 Consolidated Coal Company (Consolidation) invited bids for the job of constructing the ventilation shaft at its Buchanan Number One Mine in Virginia. Gunther indicated to Consolidation that it intended to assign the work on that project to employees represented by USA. Gunther's bid was accepted on that basis without any objection from Consolidation. Gunther entered into a collective-bargaining agreement with USA for a 3-year term effective 19 September 1983 specifically covering all field construction work at the ventilation shaft, which commenced with employees represented by USA.

Gunther is a member of the Association of Bituminous Contractors (ABC) and as such is also a signatory of the National Coal Mine Construction Agreement between ABC and UMWA.[5] Article I, which is entitled "Enabling Clause," provides in pertinent part that the contract "covers all work related to the development, expansion or alteration of coal mines . . . that is performed at or on coal lands by the members of the Association for coal mine operators which require such construction work to be performed under the jurisdiction of the [UMWA]."

On 4 May 1984 some UMWA members sent Gunther's President Robert McCoy an ABC-UMWA grievance form wherein it claimed that Gunther violated article I and "other relevant [but unspecified] portions" of the ABC contract in "contracting or subcontracting of work involved in construction of the [ventilation] shaft at . . . Consolidation['s] . . . Buchanan Mine." Gunther on 11 May 1984 notified USA President Charles R. Rush of the grievance and inquired as to USA's position concerning UMWA's claim that the work in question should be done "under [the latter's] jurisdiction." In response, Rush stated that the "work is under the USA contract with [Gunther] . . . [and] that any attempt to defeat [USA's] jurisdiction . . . will no doubt result in the establishment of a picket line." McCoy testified that he took Rush's reply to be a threat by USA to picket if Gunther assigned the work at the ventilation shaft to employees represented by another union.

[1] The name of this organization (USA) has been corrected to reflect the record.

[2] Mountaineer.

[3] Gunther.

[4] UMWA.

[5] This ABC contract provides for a term extending from 25 June 1981 to 30 September 1984, and effective thereafter in the absence of 60 days' notice by either party.

B. Work in Dispute

The work in dispute involves all field construction work regarding the ventilation shaft for Consolidation's Buchanan Number One Mine.

C. Contentions of the Parties

Gunther asserts that it has already assigned the work in dispute to employees represented by USA and prefers to continue that assignment. It further asserts that its assignment of the work to these employees is appropriate in view of its collective-bargaining agreement with USA and its practice and that of other companies in the area in not having such construction work done "under [UMWA] jurisdiction" when not "required" to do so by the coal mining company for which the work is to be performed.

UMWA contends that under article I of the ABC contract as interpreted in a recent arbitration decision involving another construction company[6] the disputed work should be assigned to employees it represents. It also contends that Gunther has no past practice of performing work under USA jurisdiction and that no evidence was presented as to area practice concerning the utilization of USA-represented employees. The UMWA further contends that an award of the work to its members would promote efficiency and economy of operations in view of their relative skills and greater experience in performing construction work for coal mine operators.

D. Applicability of the Statute

Before the Board may proceed with a determination of the dispute pursuant to Section 10(k) of the Act, it must be satisfied that there is reasonable cause to believe that (1) Section 8(b)(4)(D) has been violated and (2) that the parties have not agreed on a method for the voluntary adjustment of the dispute.

As to (1), it is clear that USA categorically stated that any attempt to "defeat" its jurisdiction by assigning the work to UMWA-represented employees would result in its establishment of a picket line. As to (2), the parties stipulated that there is no agreed-on method for the adjustment of this dispute.

On the basis of the entire record, we conclude that there is reasonable cause to believe that a violation of Section 8(b)(4)(D) has occurred and that there exists no agreed-on method for the voluntary adjustment of the dispute within the meaning of Section 10(k) of the Act. Accordingly, we find that this dispute is properly before the Board for determination.

E. Merits of the Dispute

Section 10(k) of the Act requires the Board to make an affirmative award of disputed work after considering various factors. NLRB v. Electrical Workers IBEW Local 1212 (Columbia Broadcasting), 364 U.S. 573 (1961). The Board has held that its determination in a jurisdictional dispute is an act of judgment based on common sense and experience, reached by balancing the factors involved in a particular case. Machinists Lodge 1743 (J. A. Jones Construction), 135 NLRB 1402 (1962).

The following factors are relevant in making the determination of the dispute.

1. Certification and collective-bargaining agreements

Neither of the Unions involved herein has been certified by the Board as the collective-bargaining representative for a unit of Gunther's employees. Therefore, certification is not a factor in this case.

As indicated above, Gunther made the following argument in support of its assignment to USA-represented employees: Under the terms of article I of the ABC contract, it is under no obligation to have the construction work on the ventilation shaft performed under "UMWA jurisdiction" unless it is required to do so by Consolidation, the coal mine operator herein. As Consolidation accepted Gunther's bid without objecting to the latter's announced intention to use USA-represented employees on that project, it was free to enter into a contract with USA which provided that the work in question be done "under [USA's] jurisdiction."

As already noted, the UMWA asserts that the assignment should go to employees represented by it on the basis of an arbitration decision which held that disputed construction work should be "under UMWA jurisdiction."

We find that Gunther's interpretation of article I of the ABC contract is consonant with its terms and consistent with the interpretation given identical contract language in earlier Board cases involving employer signatories of the ABC contract.[7] In addition, the UMWA has implicitly recognized that the ABC contract permits use of non-UMWA-represented employees when, as here, the coal mine operator does not require the work to be done by UMWA-represented employees, for it has attempted in these circumstances to gain jurisdiction

[6] Opinion and award in the Matter of Roberts & Schaeffer Company, and United Mine Workers of America, District 4, Local Union 1846 (Apr. 6, 1984).

[7] Mine Workers (Elk Run Coal), 251 NLRB 1267 (1980); and Mine Workers (Codell Construction Co.), 235 NLRB 1134 (1978).

through execution of special project agreements. Accordingly, we do not find that article I of the ABC contract obligated Gunther to perform the disputed work "under UMWA jurisdiction."[8]

2. Employer assignment, past practice, and area practice

Gunther has applied the ABC contract and assigned work to UMWA-represented employees only where the coal company has required that this be done. The record shows that, in the absence of such a requirement, Gunther, as in the instant case and on a Beckley, West Virginia project for another coal company, Cannelton Industries, assigned work in 1983 and 1984 to USA-represented employees. In addition, other companies in the area here followed the same practice.[9]

The record herein shows that Gunther is satisfied with the results of its assignment to USA-represented employees and prefers to continue to have them perform the disputed work.

In view of the foregoing, we find that area practice and Gunther's preference for the USA-represented employees clearly weigh in favor of continuing to assign the work in dispute to those employees.

3. Relative skills

Gunther's president testified that the USA-represented employees, one-fourth of whom had previously been represented by the UMWA, have demonstrated the skills necessary to perform the disputed work and were doing "a good job." He further testified that the majority of the UMWA-represented employees who have worked for Gunther in the past are qualified to perform construction work on coal mine projects.

As it appears that the employees represented by each labor organization possess the requisite skills to perform the work, we find this factor to be inconclusive.

4. Economy and efficiency of operation

Foremen, who are classified as pushers, are permitted to perform bargaining unit work under the USA contract but are prohibited from doing so by the ABC contract. The USA contract provides for an 8-hour day at straight-time rates while the ABC contract provides for a 7-1/2-hour workday and a half hour paid lunch period. The record also shows that the USA-represented employees were already performing the disputed work and, as indicated above, were doing a good job when the UMWA members filed their grievance.

In view of the foregoing, we find that the factors of economy and efficiency favor the continuation of the assignment to the USA-represented employees.

Conclusion

On the record as a whole, and after full consideration of all relevant factors involved, we conclude that employees who are represented by USA are entitled to perform the work in dispute. We reach this conclusion relying on the collective-bargaining agreements, economy and efficiency of operation, the prevailing area practice, and Gunther's preference to assign the work to USA-represented employees whenever it is not required by the coal mine operator to have the work done by UMWA-represented employees. In making this determination, we are awarding the work in question to employees who are represented by USA, but not to that Union or its members.

Case 5–CD–278

I. JURISDICTION

Mountaineer, a Pennsylvania corporation whose principal place of business is in West Virginia, performs, inter alia, field construction work at coal mine sites. During the 12-month period preceding the hearing, it received gross revenues in excess of $500,000. During the same period, Mountaineer purchased and received goods and material valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points outside the State of West Virginia for use at its West Virginia and Virginia jobsites.[10] The parties stipulate, and we find, that Mountaineer is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act. As already found in the Gunther case, USA and UMWA are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE DISPUTE

A. Background and Facts of Dispute

Mountaineer, which has been in business since 1978, is a wholly owned subsidiary of Salem Corporation as are Industrial Contracting of Fairmont, Inc. (Industrial) and Salem Construction Company, Inc., which also perform construction work at coal mine sites. Mountaineer and Salem Construction Company are not ABC members and have never been signatories to the ABC contract or any other agreement with the UMWA. However, Industrial is a signatory to the ABC contract.

[8] For the reasons set forth in United Services Union (Lincoln Contracting), 273 NLRB 1164 (1984), we reject UMWA's contention that the arbitration decision on which it relies is controlling as to a contrary interpretation of art. I of the ABC contract.

[9] See the Mountaineer case in this consolidated proceeding, as well as the decisions in Lincoln Contracting, supra, and another companion case, United Services Union (Mountaineer Resources), 273 NLRB 1172 (1984).

[10] These figures are taken from the record in the companion cases, 273 NLRB 1172, involving the same Company.

Whenever a coal company invokes article I of the ABC contract to require that work on a construction project at its mine be done "under UMWA jurisdiction," it has been the practice that only Industrial makes bids on that work. However, when a coal company has not called for the use of UMWA-represented employees, Mountaineer then makes the bid for that work.[11] Thus, when Consolidation did not require that UMWA-represented employees be used on a project for the construction of a coal preparation facility at the Buchanan Number One Mine and in fact stated its desire for the most competitive bid, that of Mountaineer was accepted by Consolidation. Accordingly, in April 1984 Mountaineer entered into a 3-year contract with USA to have the employees represented by that organization perform the work in question.

On 4 May 1984 some members of the UMWA sent Don Hoylman in his capacity as president of Industrial an ABC-UMWA grievance form wherein they claimed that Industrial violated article I and "other relevant [but unspecified] portions" of the ABC contract by "contracting or subcontracting of work involved in construction of the preparation facility at the Buchanan Mine." Mountaineer thereupon notified USA President Rush of the grievance, and the latter reiterated the response made in the Gunther case, namely, that it would "no doubt" engage in picketing if any attempt were made to "defeat" its jurisdiction.

B. Work in Dispute

The work in dispute involves all field construction with respect to a preparation plant at Consolidation's Buchanan Number One Mine.

C. Contentions of the Parties

Mountaineer makes the following argument in support of its position.

It has already assigned the disputed work to employees represented by USA and prefers to continue to do so. It is not and never has been a signatory to the ABC contract or any other collective-bargaining agreement with the UMWA and hence there is no basis for attributing to Mountaineer the ABC contract merely because Industrial, its sister company, is a signatory to that contract. A second reason for not applying that contract to Mountaineer is that its employees and those of Industrial constitute separate bargaining units.[12] In any event, the ABC contract does not apply to work on the preparation plant because Consolidation has not required that it be done with UMWA-represented employees.

Mountaineer also relies on its collective-bargaining agreement with USA, area practice, relative skills, and economy and efficiency of operation as factors favoring the assignment to USA-represented employees.

The UMWA asserts that Mountaineer and Industrial are sister companies which have the same officers and engage in the same type of construction work performed by employees who enjoy the same health and insurance benefits. It therefore contends that Mountaineer and Industrial constitute a single employer and that consequently the former is bound by the ABC contract to which the latter is a party.[13]

The UMWA also states that Mountaineer's contract with USA provides that the latter initially determines the skills of the employees it refers to that Company and for that reason there is no assurance that they can perform the work to which they are assigned.

D. Applicability of the Statute

Before the Board may proceed with a determination of the dispute pursuant to Section 10(k) of the Act, it must be satisfied that there is reasonable cause to believe that Section 8(b)(4)(D) has been violated and that the parties have not agreed on a method for voluntary adjustment of the dispute.

For the reasons set forth in the Gunther case, we find that the dispute is properly before the Board for determination.

E. Merits of the Dispute

As indicated above, Section 10(k) of the Act requires the Board to make an affirmative award of disputed work after taking into account the evidence supporting the claims of the parties and balancing all relevant factors.

The following factors are relevant in making the determination of the dispute before us.

[11] As indicated in the companion case involving Mountaineer, Salem Construction Company restricts itself to bids for construction work which is to be performed by AFL–CIO-represented employees.

[12] In this connection, Mountaineer cites Peter Kiewit Sons' Co., 231 NLRB 76 (1977), in which the Board found that the employees of two sister companies, one union and the other nonunion, constituted separate bargaining units, and for that reason refused to impose on the latter the collective-bargaining agreement of the former.

[13] In this connection, UMWA reiterates the interpretation of the ABC contract set forth in support of its claim against Gunther.

1. Certification and collective-bargaining agreements

As already stated in the Gunther case, certification is not a factor in this case because neither of the Unions involved herein have been certified by the Board as the collective-bargaining representative for a unit of Mountaineer's employees.

Mountaineer contends, and we agree, that as a nonmember of ABC and a nonsignatory of the ABC contract it is free to perform construction work at coal mine sites with non-UMWA represented employees. We also agree with its contention that it is an entity separate from Industrial and that consequently the latter's membership in ABC does not oblige Mountaineer to be governed by the ABC contract. However, assuming, as the UMWA contends, that Mountaineer and Industrial constitute one employer, we have already found in the Gunther case and the other two companion cases issued today that a single employer which uses UMWA-represented employees when so required by the coal mine operator may also properly rely on USA-represented employees in the absence of such a requirement.

2. Employer assignments, past practice, and area practice

As indicated above, it has been and continues to be Mountaineer's preference and practice to restrict itself to construction work for only those coal companies which do not require the use of UMWA-represented employees. This practice is also followed by Mountaineer's competitors.

In view of the foregoing, we find that area practice and Mountaineer's preference for the use of USA-represented employees clearly weigh in favor of continuing to assign the disputed work to those employees.

3. Relative skills

Mountaineer's president Don Hoylman testified that the USA-represented employees have demonstrated the skills necessary to perform the disputed work. Mountaineer's project manager Vernon Toothman also testified that those employees have done a "pretty good" job. However, Hoylman conceded that the work could be performed by the UMWA-represented employees utilized by Industrial.

As it appears that the employees represented by each labor organization possess the requisite skills to perform the work in dispute, we find this factor to be inconclusive.

4. Economy and efficiency of operations

For the reasons stated in the Gunther case, we find that economy and efficiency of operation with USA-represented employees favor the continuation of the assignment to them. An additional factor in favor of that assignment is that Mountaineer has greater flexibility in hiring because it is not limited to a panel of UMWA-represented employees and is free to select from the employees referred by USA only those individuals who are deemed by Mountaineer's supervisors to be best qualified.

Conclusion

On the record as a whole, and after full consideration of all relevant factors involved, we conclude that employees who are represented by USA are entitled to perform the work in dispute. We reach this conclusion relying on the non-ABC membership of Mountaineer, the fact that it is not a signatory of the ABC contract, the absence of any requirement by Consolidation that it utilize UMWA-represented employees, Mountaineer's collective-bargaining contract with USA, economy and efficiency of operating with USA-represented employees, its preference for those employees, and area practice in that regard.

In making this determination, we are awarding the disputed work to employees who are represented by USA, but not to that Union or its members.

DETERMINATION OF DISPUTE

The National Labor Relations Board makes the following Determination of Dispute.

Employees of Gunther-Nash Mining Construction Company represented by United Services of America International Labor Union are entitled to perform the job of constructing the ventilation shaft at Consolidation Coal Company's Buchanan Number One Mine in Virginia.

Employees of Mountaineer Resources, Inc. represented by United Services of America International Labor Union are entitled to perform the work of constructing a preparation plant at Consolidation Coal Company's Buchanan Number One Mine in Virginia.

DECISION AND DETERMINATION OF DISPUTE

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

This is a proceeding under Section 10(k) of the National Labor Relations Act, following a charge filed by Mountaineer alleging the USA had violated Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the Act by engaging in proscribed activity with an object of forcing or requiring Mountaineer to assign certain work to its members rather than to employees represented by UMWA.

Pursuant to notice, a hearing was held before Hearing Officer Sandra Beck Levine on 6 July 1984. All parties appeared and were afforded full opportunity to be heard, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, and to adduce evidence bearing on the issues. Thereafter, Mountaineer and UMWA filed briefs.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board affirms the hearing officer's rulings, finding them free from prejudicial error. On the entire record, the Board makes the following findings.

I. JURISDICTION

Mountaineer, a Pennsylvania corporation whose principal place of business is in West Virginia, is engaged in the construction of material handling and processing facilities for coal mine operators and companies in other industries. During the 12-month period preceding the hearing, it had gross revenues in excess of $500,000. During the same period, Mountaineer purchased and received goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points outside the State of West Virginia for use at its West Virginia and Virginia jobsites. We find that Mountaineer is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act and that USA and UMWA are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE DISPUTE

A. Background and Facts of Dispute

Mountaineer, which has been in business since 1978, is a wholly owned subsidiary of Salem Corporation as are Industrial Contracting of Fairmont, Inc. (Industrial) and Salem Construction Company, Inc. (Salem Construction), which also perform construction work at coal mine sites. Industrial is a member of the Association of Bituminous Contractors (ABC) and as such is also a signatory of the National Coal Mine Construction Agreement between ABC and UMWA.[4] Mountaineer and Salem Construction are not ABC members and have not been signatories to the ABC contract or any other agreement with the UMWA. When a coal company invokes article I of the ABC contract to require that the work at its mine be done "under UMWA jurisdiction," it has been the practice to have only Industrial make bids for that work.[5] However, when a coal company does not require the use of UMWA-represented employees, Mountaineer then makes the bid. Thus, when Consolidated Coal Company (Consolidation) invited Mountaineer to make bids for certain construction work at its Humphrey and Loveridge, West Virginia mines in the most "economical" way and stated that it would award the contracts therefor "on basis of price, delivery, and quality," it did not object to Mountaineer's plan to use USA-represented employees. Accordingly, on Consolidation's acceptance of its bids, Mountaineer on 14 May 1984 entered into 3-year contracts with USA to have the employees represented by that organization perform installation work for a coal preparation plant at each location. On 7 June 1984 about 3 weeks after Mountaineer began construction work at the Loveridge preparation plant with USA-represented employees, UMWA filed a class grievance against Industrial stating that it violated the ABC contract by contracting out work to Mountaineer, "a non-[UMWA] company to circumvent [the ABC contract]." Mountaineer and Industrial thereupon notified USA President Charles R. Rush of the grievance and the latter promptly replied that any attempt to defeat USA jurisdiction will "no doubt" result in the establishment of a picket line by USA.

On 13 June 1984 a little more than a week after Mountaineer began construction work at the Hum-

[4] Art. I, which is entitled "Enabling Clause," provides in pertinent part that the contract "covers all work related to the development, expansion or alteration of coal mines . . . that is performed at or on coal lands by the members of the Association for coal mine operators which require such construction work to be performed under the jurisdiction of the [UMWA]."

[5] Salem Construction restricts itself to bids for construction work which is to be performed by AFL–CIO-represented employees.

phrey preparation plant with the USA-represented employees, UMWA filed a similar class action against Industrial, and USA President Rush again responded by stating it would "no doubt" picket to "retain its jurisdiction."

B. Work in Dispute

The work in dispute involves the installation of new coal preparation and material handling equipment at Consolidation's preparation plants in Loveridge and Humphrey, West Virginia.

C. The Contentions of the Parties

Mountaineer reiterates the following contentions which it made in a companion case involving that Company.[6]

It has already assigned the work in question to employees represented by USA and prefers to continue to do so. It is not and never has been a signatory to the ABC contract or any other collective-bargaining agreement with the UMWA and hence there is no basis for attributing the ABC contract to Mountaineer merely because Industrial, its sister company, is a signatory to that contract. Another reason for not applying that contract is that its employees and those of Industrial constitute separate bargaining units.[7] In any event, the ABC contract does not apply to the work at the Loveridge and Humphrey coal preparation plants because Consolidation has not required that it be done with USA-represented employees.

Mountaineer also relies on its collective-bargaining agreements with USA, its practice, area practice, relative skills, and economy and efficiency of operation as factors favoring the assignment to USA-represented employees.

The UMWA also repeats the argument it made in the companion case. The UMWA asserts that Mountaineer and Industrial are sister companies which have the same officers and engage in the same type of construction work performed by employees who enjoy the same health and insurance benefits and that consequently the former is bound by the ABC contract to which the latter is a party.

UMWA also asserts that, when Industrial performs work under the ABC contract, the panel of UMWA-represented employees is drawn from workers who have already performed coal lands construction for Industrial and, if an employee attempts to perform work for which he does not have the requisite ability, the construction company has the right to return him to his former job or to the panel. The UMWA contrasts that situation with Mountaineer's contract with USA under which the latter initially determines the skills of the individual it sends to the jobsite. However, the UMWA concedes that Mountaineer has authority to return the employee to USA if it determines that he is "incompetent" to perform the work.

D. Applicability of the Statute

Before the Board may proceed with a determination of the dispute pursuant to Section 10(k) of the Act, it must be satisfied that there is reasonable cause to believe that (1) Section 8(b)(4)(D) has been violated and (2) that the parties have not agreed on a method for the voluntary adjustment of the dispute.

As to (1), it is clear that USA categorically stated that any attempt to "defeat" USA jurisdiction by assigning the work to UMWA-represented employees would result in USA's establishment of a picket line. As to (2), the parties stipulated that there is no agreed-on method for voluntary adjustment of this dispute.

On the basis of the entire record, we conclude that there is reasonable cause to believe that a violation of Section 8(b)(4)(D) has occurred[8] and that there exists no agreed-on method for voluntary adjustment of the dispute within the meaning of Section 10(k) of the Act. Accordingly, we find that this dispute is properly before the Board for determination.

E. Merits of the Dispute

Section 10(k) of the Act requires the Board to make an affirmative award of disputed work after considering various factors. NLRB v. Electrical Workers IBEW Local 1212 (Columbia Broadcasting), 364 U.S. 573 (1961). The Board has held that its determination in a jurisdictional dispute is an act of judgment based on common sense and experience, reached by balancing the factors involved in a particular case. Machinists Lodge 1743 (J. A. Jones Construction), 135 NLRB 1402 (1962).

The following factors are relevant in making the determination of the dispute.

1. Certification and collective-bargaining agreements

Neither of the Unions included herein have been certified by the Board as the collective-bargaining

[6] 273 NLRB 1167 (1984).

[7] Neither the bargaining unit employees at the Loveridge project nor the bargaining unit employees at the Humphrey project have worked for Industrial.

[8] Although Mountaineer's president testified that the work at the Loveridge project would be completed within a few days of the hearing, the dispute as to that work is not moot absent evidence that it will not arise again if Mountaineer later performs similar work. See Boston Building Trades Council (Methuen Construction), 269 NLRB 479 (1984).

representative for a unit of Mountaineer's employees. Certification is not a factor in this case.

Mountaineer contends, and we agree, that as a nonmember of ABC and a nonsignatory of the ABC contract it is free to perform construction work at coal mine sites with non-UMWA represented employees. We also agree with its contention that as an entity separate from Industrial the latter's membership in ABC does not oblige Mountaineer to be governed by the ABC contract. However, assuming, as the UMWA contends, that Mountaineer and Industrial constitute one employer, in the companion cases issued today[9] we refuse to find that article I of the ABC contract obligated signatory employers to use UMWA-represented employees in the absence of a requirement by the coal companies that such employees be used. As Consolidation interposed no objection to Mountaineer's plan to utilize USA-represented employees and made it clear that it awarded contracts for the Loveridge and Humphrey projects on the basis of "price, delivery and quality," we find that Consolidation did not require that the work be performed "under UMWA jurisdiction" and that Mountaineer was therefore free to utilize employees represented by USA.

2. Employer assignment, past practice, and area practice

As indicated above, it has been and continues to be Mountaineer's preference and practice to restrict itself to construction work for only those coal companies which do not require the use of UMWA-represented employees. This practice is also followed by Mountaineer's competitors.

In view of the foregoing, we find that area practice and Mountaineer's preference for the use of USA-represented employees clearly weigh in favor of Mountaineer continuing to assign the disputed work to those employees.

3. Relative skills

Mountaineer's president Don Hoylman testified that the USA-represented employees at the Loveridge and Humphrey projects have demonstrated the skills necessary to perform the work and that they have done an outstanding job, as a result of which he anticipated that the work would be done ahead of schedule and "under budget." Hoylman also stated that if the UMWA-represented employees were not subject to the terms of the ABC agreement they were competent to perform the work in question.

As it appears that the employees represented by each labor organization possess the requisite skills to perform the work in question, we find this factor to be inconclusive.

4. Economy and efficiency of operation

As indicated above, Mountaineer's president testified that the USA-represented employees were doing an outstanding job as a consequence of which the work would be completed ahead of schedule and under budget. He also testified as follows. The USA contracts provide Mountaineer with greater leeway than the ABC contract with respect to moving employees from one classification to another. In contrast to the ABC contract which limits employees to a panel of UMWA-represented employees, Mountaineer is free under the terms of the USA contracts to select from those referred by USA only those individuals who are deemed by Mountaineer to be best qualified. The USA contracts promote efficiency because they, unlike the ABC contract, permit foremen (who are classified as pushers) to perform bargaining unit work and help employees. The USA contracts are economically beneficial in that they provide for an 8-hour workday at straight time while the ABC contract provides for a 7-1/2-hour workday and a half hour paid lunch period. In sum, application of the terms of the ABC contract would make Mountaineer noncompetitive.

In view of the foregoing, we find that the factors of economy and efficiency favor the continuation of the assignment at the Loveridge and Humphrey projects to the USA-represented employees.

Conclusion

On the record as a whole, and after full consideration of all relevant factors involved, we conclude that employees who are represented by USA are entitled to perform the work in dispute. We reach this conclusion relying on the non-ABC membership of Mountaineer, the fact that it is not a signatory of the ABC contract, the absence of any requirement by Consolidation that it utilize UMWA-represented employees, Mountaineer's collective-bargaining contracts with USA, economy and efficiency of operating with USA-represented employees, its preference for such employees, and area practice in that regard. In making this determination, we are awarding the disputed work to employees who are represented by USA, but not to that Union or its members.

14 December 1984

DECISION ON REVIEW AND UNIT CLARIFICATION

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

On 6 February 1984 the Regional Director for Region 26 issued his decision and order dismissing the Union's petition for unit clarification. The Regional Director found the petition inappropriate because it attempted to clarify the contractually agreed-upon bargaining unit during the term of the parties' collective-bargaining agreement. Thereafter, in accordance with Section 102.67 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the Union filed a timely request for review alleging that the Regional Director made inadequate and erroneous findings of fact.

By telegraphic order dated 24 May 1984 the Board granted the Union's request for review, reinstated the petition and remanded the case to the Regional Director for a hearing and an appropriate decision. On 6 July 1984 the hearing officer issued a report setting forth the issues and facts. On 11 July 1984 the Acting Regional Director issued an order transferring the case to the Board.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the entire record in this case and makes the following findings.

The Employer manufactures modular office furniture. The Union was certified in 1965 and represents the following unit of employees:

> All production and maintenance employees at the Employer's Marked Tree, Arkansas, plant, excluding office clerical employees, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

The Employer and the Union are parties to a collective-bargaining agreement effective 14 November 1983 through 15 November 1986. The parties' previous contract was negotiated in late 1980 and was in effect from 1980 to 1983. The petition urges that the job classifications of inventory cycle counter, quality control technician, receiving clerk, and dock auditor are properly included in the unit. For the reasons discussed below we find that the inventory cycle counter, quality control technician and receiving clerk have been historically excluded from the unit and that the position of dock auditor is appropriately included in the unit.

The classifications covered by the petition are salaried positions which participate in programs and receive benefits different from those of the hourly unit employees. These benefits include different systems of performance review, education reimbursement, medical insurance, life insurance, vacation scheduling, and pension benefits. Unlike the unit employees, the disputed classifications do not punch a timeclock.

The position of inventory cycle counter was created 5 September 1977. The position was originally entitled production and inventory control coordinator and was necessitated by expansion and the institution of a new inventory system. The counter's duties include daily monitoring of inventory, counting parts in work areas and checking them against a ledger balance, and overseeing the inventory control system. Although the position involves a substantial amount of time working on the factory floor it also entails a significant amount of paperwork. For the first 3 years of the position's existence, the counter had a desk in the main clerical office, an area separate and enclosed from the plant floor. When the main clerical office became overcrowded, the counters were moved to an enclosed cubicle in the plant area.

The position of quality control technician was created in October 1979. The position was necessitated by an increase in inventory and a need to assure that all materials complied with specifications. The position evolved from the unit classification of inspector, which primarily involved the visual checking of goods from a specific department. The technician position is more complex in that it requires the use of sensitive equipment, the ability to read blueprints, and the ability to conduct chemical paint analysis. The technician's duties include checking the material acceptability of parts, sampling, and assuring compliance with blueprints. Technicians perform a significant amount of clerical work and are situated in cubicles in the plant area.

The position of receiving clerk, originally entitled receiving and supply clerk, has been in existence since at least October 1977. The receiving clerk checks and identifies incoming materials and directs them throughout the plant. The position involves a substantial amount of paperwork including maintenance of purchase orders, logs, financial data, inspection sheets, and invoices.

The position of dock auditor was created 2 March 1981. The position was necessitated by frequent mistakes in outgoing shipments. The dock auditor's duties consist of checking the merchandise being shipped against a packing list. The dock auditor works primarily in the loading dock area and works closely with unit employees in the shipping crew. The dock auditor and the shipping crew are commonly supervised. The position involves minimal clerical work. Before the dock auditor's position was established, a crew leader or unit employee performed this function. Following the creation of the dock auditor's position the number of shipping errors decreased and the need for a full-time dock auditor diminished. Since October 1983 the position has been vacant.[1] The auditor's functions are currently performed by unit employees or the crew leader, much the same as preceded the creation of the dock auditor position.

The Union contends that it reserved the right to file a unit clarification petition concerning the disputed classifications after the parties reached impasse during the 1983 contract negotiations. It further asserts that the duties of the disputed classifications were performed in the past by bargaining-unit employees and that these duties are plant clerical in nature, similar to those of unit members. The Employer contends that most of the disputed positions existed before the 1980 and 1983 contract negotiations and that they do not share a community of interest with bargaining-unit employees.

We find that the position of inventory cycle counter, quality control technician, and receiving clerk have historically been excluded from the unit. The evidence shows that these positions were in existence at the time of the parties' 1980 and 1983 contract negotiations. The record does not indicate that the Union sought to include these positions in the unit.[2] The contractual unit reached by the parties did not include the above-mentioned classifications. Furthermore, the evidence does not show that the duties of these positions have changed. Based on the foregoing evidence, we agree with the Regional Director that clarification of the unit with respect to these classifications is inappropriate.

Contrary to the Regional Director, we find that the dock auditor has not historically been excluded from the unit and that it is appropriate to clarify the unit so as to include that classification. The dock auditor position was created in March 1981. The Union's first opportunity to include this position in the unit was during the parties' 1983 contract negotiations. The Union unsuccessfully attempted to include the dock auditor. Upon reaching impasse, however, the Union informed the Employer that it would pursue the disputed classifications, including dock auditor, by way of a unit clarification petition. The Union did not abandon its proposal to include the dock auditor in exchange for a concession during bargaining. Thus, the Union did not acquiesce in the exclusion of the dock auditor from the unit.

We further find that the dock auditor shares a community of interest with unit employees. The dock auditor works in close contact with the shipping crew in the loading area and performs functions closely related to those of the unit employees. The dock auditor and unit employees are commonly supervised and the dock auditor's duties are performed by unit employees when the former is absent.

Accordingly, as we find the position of dock auditor has not historically been excluded from the unit and shares a community of interest with unit employees, we shall clarify the unit to include it. The petition is otherwise dismissed.

ORDER

The unit of production and maintenance employees represented by UBC, Southern Council of Industrial Workers, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, AFL–CIO, Local No. 2982, at SunarHauserman is clarified to include the classification dock auditor.

[1] The Employer's plant manager and assistant manager testified that the dock auditor position has not been eliminated, that the auditor's job description remains on file, and that the position would be filled if the number of shipping errors increased to previous levels.

[2] At the time the quality control technician position was created the Union filed a grievance alleging that the Employer was removing work from the bargaining unit. The parties resolved the grievance by returning four employees to their hourly positions and keeping two as technicians.

Production Workers Union of Chicago and Vicinity, Local 707; The National Production Workers Union and Checker Taxi Company, Inc. and Yellow Cab Company, Inc. Cases 13–CC–1159 and 13–CC–1160

14 December 1984

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

On 9 March 1981 Administrative Law Judge Stanley N. Ohlbaum issued the attached decision. The General Counsel and the Charging Parties[1] filed exceptions and supporting briefs, and the Respondents filed an answering brief and motion to strike the Charging Parties' briefs.[2]

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and recommendations only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

The pertinent facts are not in dispute. The two Charging Parties, Checker Taxi Company (Checker) and Yellow Cab Company (Yellow), own between them 3666 of the 4600 taxicabs franchised in Chicago. As franchise holders they may lease out their cabs but the lessees ("leased cab drivers" or "LCDs") may not, under a city of Chicago ordinance, sublease the cabs or permit them to be driven by other drivers.

Six of Yellow's seven garages house only LCD cabs. The remaining garage houses cabs operated by "commission drivers," who are drivers employed by Yellow. Similarly, Checker maintains five garages all with cabs operated exclusively by LCDs with the exception of one garage with cabs operated both by LCDs and commissioned drivers. At the time of the hearing, only 340 of Yellow's 2166 cabs and 200 of Checker's 1500 cabs were operated by commissioned drivers. LCDs lease their cabs for periods ranging from half of a day to 1 week. Generally, they lease the cabs on a daily basis.

No clerical personnel at the Yellow and Checker garages are unionized but the service and maintenance employees and commissioned drivers are represented by the Seafarers Union Local 777.[3] The LCDs are alleged and admitted to be independent contractors.[4]

Sometime in 1980, the LCDs became increasingly dissatisfied with the terms of their leases and began to band together to deal collectively with the Charging Parties under the leadership of an LCD, the Reverend Joseph McAfee. In early July 1980, McAfee consulted with officials of Respondent Unions. By the end of July, McAfee had enlisted about 1200 of the approximately 3126 Yellow and Checker LCDs in his collective effort and had formed the so-called "Leased Taxicab Drivers Division" within Respondent Unions. For a time the division had a separate office. Initiation fees and dues collected from the LCDs were used for office rent and maintenance, and for organizational expenditures.

By letters dated 8 August 1980 Respondent Unions requested on behalf of "the overwhelming majority of the drivers who are leasing cabs from your company" that the Charging Parties, respectively, meet with the Unions "for the purpose of reaching an agreement setting forth uniform conditions regarding the leasing of the cabs." The Charging Parties refused to recognize, meet, or bargain with the Unions and have continued to refuse to meet with the Unions up to the time of the hearing.

On 12 August 1980 the Respondent Unions and the LCDs started picketing and handbilling several of the garages of the Charging Parties.[5] The picket signs read variously: "Please do not lease a cab until an agreement is signed regarding your working conditions"; "On Strike Production Workers Union Local 707";[6] "Lease Cabs on Strike Production Workers Union Local 707"; and "Lease Cab 707 Drivers 707 on Strike Yellow & Checker Taxi Cab Company." The picketing activity was effective in reducing the number of cabs leased by the LCDs from the Charging Parties.

At the inception of the picketing, a picket line went up at the one Yellow garage housing vehicles operated only by its commissioned drivers. As soon as a Seafarers official arrived and complained, the

[1] The Charging Parties have requested oral argument. This request is denied as the record, the exceptions, and the briefs adequately present the issue and the positions of the parties.

[2] The Respondents have moved to strike the briefs of the Charging Parties as failing to comply with Board Rules and Regulations. This motion of the Respondents is denied as lacking in merit.

[3] The parties stipulated that the Respondents do not seek to represent any employees represented by the Seafarers.

[4] The United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia found these LCDs to be independent contractors in Seafarers Local 777 v. NLRB, 603 F.2d 862 (D.C. Cir. 1979). The General Counsel has stated correctly that for purposes of the instant case, the court's decision is the law of the case and therefore controlling on the independent contractor status of the LCDs. The parties stipulated that the nature of the Charging Parties' operations has not changed since the court of appeals' decision.

[5] The Respondents' counsel stated on the record, "We started picketing . . ." and "We agree we picketed."

[6] This sign was not authorized by the Respondents and its use was discontinued within a day or less after it was first displayed.

pickets left. The picketing at that garage lasted at most for 30 minutes. Other than this one incident, the picketing was confined to garages out of which LCDs operated and was soley directed at the Charging Parties and their potential LCDs. Apparently, however, during the picketing some of the Charging Parties' suppliers refused to make deliveries. There is no evidence that members of the public who use taxicabs patronize the garages directly or that any individuals declined to use taxicabs during the picketing.

There is evidence that considerable violence, not shown to have been directly linked to the Respondents or the picketing, occurred during the Respondents' efforts to obtain recognition as representative of the LCDs. On 9 September 1980 the Board's Regional Director in Chicago sought a temporary injunction under Section 10(l) of the Act in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division, pending disposition of this proceeding. The Regional Director's petition was denied by the court on 11 December 1980. The Charging Parties also unsuccessfully sought an injunction in the Circuit Court of Cook County against the Respondents and all the LCDs involved in the collective activity. The Illinois Court of Appeals affirmed the Circuit Court's ruling that there was, inter alia, no illegal purpose to the picketing and no nexus shown between the alleged violence and the Respondents.

Relying in part on the absence of any conventional "labor dispute," the administrative law judge concluded, inter alia, that subject matter jurisdiction could not properly be asserted here and, accordingly, that the Respondents have not violated Section 8(b)(4)(i) and (ii)(B) of the Act. We cannot agree with the judge that the Board lacks subject matter jurisdiction here or that the Respondents did not violate Section 8(b)(4) of the Act.

With regard to the lack of a conventional labor dispute as defined in Section 2(9) of the Act, there is some conflict in the circuit courts regarding the import of that fact on Board jurisdiction. As noted by the judge, the Fourth Circuit has found that a conventional labor dispute is a prerequisite to Board jurisdiction.[7] In contrast, the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia held in Maritime Union (Delta Steamship) v. NLRB,[8] and later in Monarch Long Beach Corp.,[9] that Section 2(9) of the Act does not define the Board's jurisdiction and, since the term "labor dispute" does not appear in Section 8(b)(4), that section's operation is not limited by the definition of "labor dispute" in Section 2(9). This dispute appears to have been laid to rest by the Supreme Court recently in Longshoremen ILA v. Allied International,[10] in which the union argued that the boycott in question was not a "labor dispute" but rather a political dispute with a foreign nation. The Supreme Court rejected the union's argument stating that neither the plain language of Section 8(b)(4) nor the legislative history confined the scope of that section to "labor" as opposed to "political" disputes. The Court added that Section 8(b)(4) was deliberately "drafted broadly" and that "[d]espite criticism from President Truman as well as from some legislators that the secondary boycott provision was too sweeping, the Congress refused to narrow its scope. Recognizing that '[i]llegal boycotts take many forms' . . . Congress intended its prohibition to reach broadly."[11] In this light, we find that, contrary to the judge, the Board does have subject matter jurisdiction in this case.

The judge further concluded that the activities of the Unions here were not those of a "labor organization qua labor organization and as such they should not be treated as labor organizations for purposes of Section 8(b)(4)." This hypothesis is not supported by case precedent. In their answer, the Respondents admit that they are labor organizations within the meaning of the Act, thus avowing that they exist at least in part for the purposes set forth in Section 2(5) of the Act. And, as such, it has long been established that the Respondents are subject to the proscriptions of Section 8(b)(4) whether or not their activities concern statutory employees.[12] Accordingly, the fact that the Respondent Unions' ultimate objective was improved leases for a group of independent contractors rather than more customary union objectives cannot shield the Unions if their conduct is otherwise unlawful in nature.

The question remains then whether the Respondents' conduct, when subjected to the scrutiny of Section 8(b)(4), was violative of that section of the Act. Concededly, the usual example cited in the legislative history of conduct addressed by Section 8(b)(4) involves a labor dispute in which the union's activity is directed toward a neutral employer in order to pressure another employer whose employees the union seeks to represent or benefit. This is clearly not the factual situation presented to us here. However, "the mere fact that the language of this Section comprehends the familiar patterns of a secondary boycott in the customary sense does not inexorably dictate the conclusion that it excludes all variations from those patterns."[13] Moreover, although the term "secondary boycott" is generally used as a "short-hand reference to the conduct forbidden by Section 8(b)(4),"[14] as noted earlier the actual language of Section 8(b)(4) is intentionally broad and our application of that section need not be limited by that term when, as here, a union's conduct fits within the actual language of the statute.[15]

For interpretation of such a broadly drafted legislative provision the Supreme Court suggests, in National Woodwork Mfrs., examining the problem to which the legislation was addressed.[16] In this regard, the general congressional declaration of purpose and policy stated in the Act itself is "to promote the full flow of commerce" and "to define and proscribe practices on the part of labor and management which affect commerce and are inimical to the general welfare." Thus, as the Supreme Court stated in Allen Bradley Co. v. Local 3,[17] Congress was concerned with preserving a "competitive business economy" and balancing this goal with preserving "the rights of labor to organize to better its conditions through the agency of collective bargaining." And, specifically regarding Section 8(b)(4), the Supreme Court has found "the dual Congressional objectives of preserving the right of labor organizations to bring pressure to bear on offending employers in primary labor disputes and of shielding unoffending employers and others from pressures in controversies not their own."[18] Although it is fairly clear here that the aim of the Unions is to circumvent the circuit court decision finding the LCDs to be independent contractors rather than employees, the fact remains that these LCDs have been found to be independent contractors and, as such, the Unions' efforts on their behalf[19] fall neither within "the right of labor to organize to better its conditions" (Allen Bradley, supra) or "the rights of labor organizations to bring pressure to bear on offending employers in primary labor disputes" (Denver Building Trades, supra). Moreover, the Respondents' activities clearly had a deleterious effect on commerce. As a matter of balancing general policy objectives, then, the equations are not balanced in the Respondents' favor.

Additionally, note should be made of the intent behind the 1959 amendments to Section 8(b)(4). It is clear from the legislative history that the Congress was concerned, in part, with instances during which unions had used coercive tactics where their objectives were unrelated to representing employees. Thus, the Senate report on the bill states that it was designed to include "boycotts by railroad employees, agriculture workers, Government employees, and other groups now excluded from the secondary boycott ban of the Taft-Hartley Act—secondary boycotts by these groups are just as much against the public interest as boycotts by anyone else."[20] Thus the courts have found that Section 8(b)(4) encompasses conduct on behalf of individuals found not to be statutory employees.[21] And, consistent with this legislative history, the Supreme Court agreed with the court of appeals in Allied International, supra, involving a refusal by longshoremen to unload vessels with cargo shipped from the Soviet Union, that it is "more rather than less objectionable that a national labor union has chosen to marshal against neutral parties the considerable powers derived by its local and itself under the federal labor laws in aid of a random political objective far removed from what has traditionally been thought to be the realm of legitimate union activity."[22]

Given the strong legislative and case history, some equally strong indication that picketing on behalf of independent contractors, i.e., forcing or requiring any "person" to cease using the products of any other producer, was intended to be protected by the proviso shielding primary activity would seem to be required. However, we find no implication in either the legislative history or case precedent that Congress intended the "primary" proviso to apply to this conduct. Indeed, what precedent there is weighs heavily against such an extension of the definition of "primary." Thus, in Santini Bros., the union was attempting to become the collective-bargaining representative of a group of truckdrivers. Since the Board found those drivers to be independent contractors, it also found the union's conduct violative of Section 8(b)(4).[23]

We note in a related vein that it is not necessary, in order to find unlawful "secondary" activity, to find that a "primary" dispute exists at all.[24] For example, in Monarch Long Beach, supra, the union urged consumers to boycott those soft drinks sold by Monarch, a retail store, which were not locally bottled. Since the location of bottling was not clearly marked on the soft drink containers, the union in effect was urging a general boycott of soft drinks sold by Monarch. The court found "ample authority to support the Board's view that it need not identify a 'primary labor dispute' to find a violation of Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(B)."[25]

In conclusion, the Union's picketing here, directed at the LCDs with the objective of circumventing the circuit courts' decision finding that the LCDs are independent contractors, was violative of Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(B) of the Act. And, it is not material whether or not the Unions' ultimate goal was lawful, since its intermediate goal, that of causing the interruption of leases between the Charging Parties and the LCDs, in the absence of a primary labor dispute, was clearly within the scope of the broad proscription of Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(B).

With regard to the alleged violation of Section 8(b)(4)(i)(B)—the picketing of the Yellow Cab garage housing only vehicles operated by commissioned drivers —there is no evidence that the Respondents could not have learned that no LCDs used the garage before they commenced picketing. Concededly, the Respondents ceased picketing at that garage as soon as they were apprised by a representative of the Seafarers that no LCDs were present. However, "[t]he Act does not say you may picket whenever you wish, and against any employer you may wish, and continue picketing while you inquire and determine—in your own judgment—whether you have a right to do such picketing."[26] Accordingly, we find the Respondents' conduct to be violative of Section 8(b)(4)(i)(B) of the Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondents Production Workers Union of Chicago and Vicinity, Local 707 and The National Production Workers Union are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

2. By picketing the Charging Parties with an object of interrupting the leases between the Charging Parties and the leased cab drivers and inducing the commissioned drivers to cease work, the Respondents have violated Section 8(b)(4)(i) and (ii)(B) of the Act.

3. These unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that the Respondents have engaged in certain unfair labor practices, it shall be recommended that the Respondents be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and that they take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

ORDER

The Respondents, Production Workers Union of Chicago and Vicinity, Local 707; The National Production Workers Union, Chicago, Illinois, their officers, agents, and representatives, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Threatening, coercing, or restraining Checker Taxi Company, Inc. and Yellow Cab Company, Inc. or any other persons engaged in commerce or an industry affecting commerce, where an object thereof is to force the above-named persons or any other person to cease doing business with leased cab drivers under circumstances prohibited by Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(B) of the Act.

(b) Engaging in or inducing or encouraging employees of the Yellow Cab Company, Inc. or other employees engaged in commerce or in an industry affecting commerce to engage in a work stoppage or strike or refusal in the course of their employment to use or handle any materials or to perform any service as prohibited by Section 8(b)(4)(i)(B) of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Post at their business office and meeting halls copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[27] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 13, after being signed by the Respondents' authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondents immediately upon receipt and maintained by them for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to members are customari-

Thus, while we find that the restrictive scope of Sec. 8(b)(4) is not limited to "labor disputes," this finding is thoroughly consistent with our conclusion that the "primary proviso" was not intended to exempt picketing by labor organizations on behalf of independent contractors. Indeed, that is precisely our point—it is unnecessary to even decide here where the "primary" disputes lie, or whether there is any primary dispute at all, since it is clear that the Union here is not engaged in a primary labor dispute with the employers.

ly posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondents to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(b) Sign and mail to the Regional Director for Region 13 sufficient copies of said notice, to be furnished by him for posting by Checker Taxi Company, Inc. and Yellow Cab Company, Inc. if willing.

(c) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondents have taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the complaint is dismissed insofar as it alleges violations of the Act not specifically found.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES POSTED BY ORDER OF THE NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT threaten, coerce, or restrain Checker Taxi Company, Inc., or Yellow Cab Company, Inc. or any other person engaged in commerce or in an industry affecting commerce, where the object thereof is to force the above-named persons or any other person to cease doing business with leased cab drivers under circumstances prohibited by Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(B) of the Act.

WE WILL NOT induce or encourage employees of the Yellow Cab Company, Inc. or any other employer engaged in commerce to engage in a work stoppage or strike or refusal in the course of their employment to use or handle any materials or perform any service as prohibited by Section 8(b)(4)(i)(B) of the Act.

PRODUCTION WORKERS UNION OF CHICAGO AND VICINITY, LOCAL 707; THE NATIONAL PRODUCTION WORKERS UNION

DECISION

PRELIMINARY STATEMENT

STANLEY N. OHLBAUM, Administrative Law Judge. This consolidated proceeding[1] under the National Labor Relations Act was litigated before me in Chicago, Illinois, on October 22–24, 1980, with all parties participating throughout by counsel, who were afforded full opportunity to present evidence and contentions and thereafter to file briefs received by November 26, 1980. Additional documents were subsequently received. These[2] have been made part of the record which, together with briefs, have been carefully considered.

The basic issue is whether Respondent Unions have violated Section 8(b)(4)(i) and (ii)(B) of the Act in various respects to be described.

On the entire record and my observation of the testimonial demeanor of the witnesses, I make the following

FINDINGS AND CONCLUSIONS

I. PARTIES; JURISDICTION

At all material times, Respondents Production Workers Union of Chicago and Vicinity, Local 707 and The National Production Workers Union have been and are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act, with their principal office in Chicago, Illinois. At all material times Charging Party Checker Taxi Company, Inc. (Checker Taxi or Checker) has been and is a New York corporation and Charging Party Yellow Cab Company (Yellow Cab or Yellow) has been and is a Maine corporation; each of said Charging Parties has maintained an office and place of business in and has been engaged in providing public taxicab service in Chicago, Illinois. During the representative year immediately preceding issuance of the consolidated complaint, each of the Charging Parties derived gross revenues exceeding $500,000 in its business operations; and, during the same period, each of the Charging Parties annually purchased and received goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 at and for use in its business operations in Illinois.

I find that at all material times each of the Charging Parties has been and is a person engaged in commerce within the meaning of the Act.[3]

II. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Facts as Found

Much basic fact here is not in essential dispute. The record contains expansive colloquy with counsel exploring their basic contentions in what appears to be fundamentally a case of novel impression.

[1] Based on a consolidated complaint issued on September 23 by the Board's Acting Regional Director for Region 13, stemming from charges filed by the Charging Parties on September 2 as amended on September 9, 1980.

[2] I.e., (1) a December 15, 1980 one-page letter from Respondents' counsel, with attached five-page transcript of proceedings before Honorable Prentice H. Marshall, U.S. district judge for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division, in Case No. 80 C 4819 entitled Donald J. Crawford, Acting for the National Labor Relations Board, Petitioner v. Production Workers Union of Chicago, Local 707; The National Production Workers, Respondents (marked herein ALJ Exhs. 1 and 2); (2) a seven-page December 19, 1980 letter from the Charging Parties' counsel, responsive to the foregoing item (1) (ALJ Exh. 3); and (3) a January 21, 1981 one-page letter from Respondents' counsel, with attached seven-page opinion of Justice Jiganti on behalf of the Illinois Appellate Court, First District, on December 31, 1980, in Case No. 80-2516 entitled Yellow Cab Company, Inc. and Checker Taxi Company, Inc., Plaintiffs-Appellants vs. Production Workers Union of Chicago and Vicinity, Local 707, an Affiliate of the National Production Workers Union: National Production Workers Union [et al.], Defendants-Appellees (ALJ Exhs. 4 and 5).

[3] Conclusions concerning jurisdiction over the subject matter of this proceeding are set forth infra.

Charging Parties Checker Taxi and Yellow Cab control most of the taxicab industry in Chicago. Of the 4600 taxicabs franchised in Chicago, Yellow Cab owns 2166 and Checker Taxi 1500, for an aggregate of 3666, with only 934 comprising all of the remainder. By Chicago ordinance, cabs may be operated only by the licensees or franchise (medallion) holders, who may, however, lease out their cabs; but such lessees (leased cab drivers or LCDs) may not sublease or permit the cabs to be operated by others. Yellow Cab maintains seven Chicago cab garages, with only one (South Indiana Avenue) housing cabs operated solely by drivers (commission drivers) in its own employ, all six others housing only LCD-operated cabs. Checker Taxi maintains five Chicago cab garages, with cabs in only one (North Elston Avenue) housing cabs operated by "commission drivers" in its own employ as well as cabs operated by LCDs; all of its four other garages house only LCD-operated cabs. All garages of each Company are staffed and maintained by nonunionized managerial and clerical personnel and by unionized maintenance and service employees (carwashers, greasers, mechanics, radio technicians, etc.) represented by Seafarers Union Local 777. There is no indication that the traveling public patronizes any of these garages. Taxicabs are leased out by each of the Companies to LCDs on a daily, half-daily, several days, or weekly basis, the predominant arrangement being the daily lease at a base rental of $41 or $43.

Over the course of the past several years (2 in the case of Yellow Cab, 5 in the case of Checker Taxi), both Yellow Cab and Checker Taxi have converted the essential nature of their operations from running their cabs through their own employees (commission drivers)—with whom they were under obligation to bargain collectively under the Act—to the present system of leasing out their taxicabs to individual independent operators (LCDs), so that as of August 1980 only 340 of Yellow Cab's 2166 cabs were operated by its own commission driver employees and the balance of 1826 by LCDs; and similarly, at the time of this trial, only 200 of Checker Taxi's 1500 cabs were operated by drivers in its own employ and the balance of 1300 by LCDs.[4] The commission driver-operated cabs and the LCD-operated cabs of each of the Companies are not commingled, but segregated from each other by identifying numbers.

At all times here material, Charging Parties Checker Taxi and Yellow Cab have been involved in "providing" public taxicab service in Chicago through their ownership of taxicabs, franchised by the city of Chicago, operated through the foregoing two different categories of drivers—i.e., (1) a dwindling number of commission drivers in their direct employ as employees within the meaning of the Act and represented for collective bargaining by Seafarers Union and (2) an ever-increasing number of operators to whom they rent or lease their taxicabs (leased cab drivers or LCDs). As to the second category (LCDs), the complaint (par. II(g)) alleges that they (i.e., the LCDs) have at all material times been and are independent contractors.[5] As has already been indicated, the first category drivers—i.e., the taxicab companies' commission drivers in their employ as employees—have been and are, together with the Companies' "inside" maintenance and automotive service personnel, represented for collective bargaining by Seafarers Local Union 777, and it is stipulated that Respondents do not seek to represent any of them. At least since the conversion of the Charging Parties' operations from direct employment of drivers to the leasing of their cabs, the LCDs—as they no longer have the status of employees within the meaning of the Act—have been unrepresented for collective bargaining as employees.

Because of mounting dissatisfaction with what they regarded as the unsatisfactory and increasingly onerous terms and provisions under which the Charging Parties were leasing out their taxicabs, the LCDs, under leadership of one of their number, Reverend Joseph McAfee, associated themselves to deal collectively with the taxicab companies in order to obtain more favorable lease terms. There accordingly came a time, in early July 1980, when McAfee consulted with officials of Respondent Unions to seek the benefit of their supposed expertise in dealing with the taxicab companies to obtain more favorable lease terms. Before the end of July, McAfee had enlisted about 1200 fellow LCDs in this cooperative endeavor. McAfee did not seek to enlist any "commission driver" employee or inside employee, nor is there any indication or claim that any person in that category at any time joined therein.

On this basis, in late July or early August 1980, there was organized, formed, or constituted within Respondents an infrastructure known as the Leased Taxicab Drivers Division,[6] for a time with its own separate office location and meeting place. Initiation fees and dues, collected from LCDs who joined, were utilized for office rent and maintenance and for organizational expenditures.

By letters to each of the Charging Parties on August 8, 1980, from Respondents on behalf of the "overwhelming majority of the drivers who are leasing cabs from your company," Respondents requested "that you meet with us for the purpose of reaching an agreement setting forth uniform conditions regarding the leasing of these cabs" (G.C. Exhs. 11 and 12). The Charging Parties failed to accede to this request. It is conceded that the Charging Parties have at all times refused to recognize, meet, or negotiate with Respondents or the LCDs in any way concerning the terms and conditions on which the taxicabs are leased or rented out. Indeed, Checker Taxi acknowledges posting notices to the effect that it would "never" deal with Respondents, while Yellow Cab acknowledges that it has publicized that it would not deal with Respondents since the LCDs are independent contractors with whom it is under no obligation to negotiate under the Act or otherwise. It is stipulated that the nature of the operations of the Charging Parties has in no way changed since or in consequence of the U.S. court of appeals 1978 decision cited supra (fn. 5) determining the LCDs to be independent contractors and not employees within the meaning of the Act.

[4] This changeover in Yellow and Checker operations from their own "commission driver" employees to independent contractor LCDs is discussed in the opinions of U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals Judge MacKinnon at 603 F.2d 862 (1978) in the case cited in fn. 5, infra.

[5] It is also so conceded by all parties and has likewise been so determined by the U.S. court of appeals in its October 20, 1978 (as amended July 5 and 27, 1979) decision in Seafarers Local 777 v. NLRB, 603 F.2d 862 (G.C. Exh. 2). The General Counsel has indicated on the record here, on behalf of the Board, that the Board acquiesces in that decision and that it is binding and controlling here on the issue of the status of the LCDs as independent contractors as distinguished from employees within the meaning of the Act.

[6] See, e.g., G.C. Exhs. 20, 21, and 24.

Commencing on August 12, 1980, LCDs picketed and handbilled various Chicago garages of the Charging Parties, admittedly in order to attempt to induce the Charging Parties to negotiate with them for improved lease terms and conditions for the LCDs, as well as to induce potential LCDs to refrain from leasing taxicabs until the taxicab companies so negotiated. The picket signs read: "Please do not lease a cab until an agreement is signed concerning your working conditions" (G.C. Exh. 13); "On Strike Production Workers Union Local 707" (G.C. Exh. 14);[7] "Lease Cabs on Strike Production Workers Union Local 707" (G.C. Exh. 15); and "Lease Cab 707 Drivers 707 on Strike Yellow & Checker Taxi Cab Company" (G.C. Exh. 16). Handbills (G.C. Exhs. 17–25) were distributed reflecting meetings held or to be held by LCDs on various dates in July, August, and September 1980 in order to attempt to deal collectively with the Charging Parties taxicab companies so as to achieve more equitable or advantageous taxicab lease/rental terms. There is no doubt that the picketing activity has been effective in reducing the volume of taxicabs leased by LCDs from the Charging Parties, with substantial losses of revenue to the Charging Parties[8] (to say nothing of losses of revenue to the nonleasing LCDs).

With only a single, brief, and unintended exception,[9] at no time were any of the picketing efforts staged, aimed, or beamed at any of the Charging Parties' commission drivers or other employees or at any persons other than the Charging Parties themselves and their potential LCDs—neither to organize them, nor to solicit their membership in or support of Respondents, nor to seek to persuade them to cease, interrupt, or otherwise interfere with their work, work arrangements, relationships, or deliveries.

[7] Although commission drivers and inside employees could hardly have been misled since they were firmly represented by another union of their own, the Seafarers, under a subsisting collective agreement, and the picketing was (with the sole incidental exceptions described and dealt with infra) limited to garages housing only LCD-operated vehicles, nevertheless, according to testimony of the General Counsel's witness Stroud, an official of Respondents, use of this particular sign was unauthorized and was discontinued by Respondents immediately on discovery within a day or less after it was displayed.

[8] Estimated by Yellow Cab President Logue at over $300,000 out of gross annual revenues exceeding $22 million and by Checker Taxi President Feldman at over $250,000 out of gross annual revenues of $16 million although the diminution by the trial date was only 5 percent (or 400 leases per week).

[9] This occurred at the very inception of the picketing, around 5:30 a.m. on August 12, 1980, at Yellow Cab's South Indiana Avenue garage housing only vehicles of its commission driver employees. As soon as an official of the Seafarers Union arrived shortly thereafter and explained that the garage housed no LCD-operated vehicles, the LCD pickets left at once. The entire incident—clearly an unintended error—lasted no more than possibly a half-hour.

Although there is ample evidence, some undisputed and persuasive, that nonpicket-related acts of violence[10] occurred at various street locations during the period of the effort by the LCDs to get the Charging Parties to agree to discuss their lease terms, this is not alleged in the consolidated complaint as violative of the Act on the part of Respondents; nor is there substantial evidence persuasively linking those acts to Respondents. It is also undisputed that, during part of the picketing period, a few of the Charging Parties' suppliers' employees, apparently unwilling to cross the picket "line," failed to make deliveries (or, in one case, a pickup).

On September 9, 1980, the Board's Acting Regional Director in Chicago, with whom the charges here had been filed a week earlier, petitioned the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division, for a temporary injunction under Section 10(1) of the Act pending final dispositon of the instant proceeding (G.C. Exhs. 7–10). On December 11, 1980, the petition was denied (ALJ Exhs. 1–3).[11] An injunction proceeding had also been commenced in the Circuit Court of Cook County, Illinois, by the two taxicab companies who are the Charging Parties here against Respondents, their officials, and all LCDs acting in concert. On September 8, 1980, following a trial in which some 1384 pages of transcript were taken, Judge George A. Higgins of the court denied plaintiffs' application for a temporary injunction (R. Exh. 3), among other things concluding (id. at 1378–79):

> . . . that the individual Defendants and all Lease Drivers have the Constitutional Right to picket in a peaceful and lawful manner on the public way as a means of communicating complaints and grievances, and that they have the right to engage the services of the Defendant Union to assist them in their endeavors, and that these rights, under the First Amendment to the Constitution of the United States cannot be enjoined or otherwise denied.

On December 31, 1980, this decision was unanimously affirmed by the Illinois Appellate Court (ALJ Exh. 5), which in part stated "that the plaintiffs failed to establish an illegal purpose for the defendants' actions" and that:

> . . . [t]he [trial] court found that there was no evidentiary connection between the acts of violence cited by the plaintiffs and the lawsuit before it. The parties introduced sharply conflicting testimony concerning the extent and nature of the violence

[10] Including much windshield smashing and threats by wholly unidentified persons, as well as by one or two LCDs, and also much tire slashing, as well as arson, to cabs. On one occasion at Checker's North Pulaski garage, police were called to disperse a large, nonviolent group allegedly interdicting access to the garage while exclaiming, "Don't ride Checker and Yellow. They are unsafe cars."

[11] Although U.S. District Judge Prentice Marshall's decision (ALJ Exh. 2) appears to be based, at least in part, upon his belief that the LCDs were employees or their "equivalent" within the contemplation of the Act, the complaint here (par. II[g]) alleges, all of the parties agree, and the U.S. court of appeals (fn. 5, supra) had determined the opposite. In any event, Judge Marshall's decision is not dispositive here. NLRB v. Denver Building & Construction Trades Council, 341 U.S. 675, 681–683 (1951).

which occurred. . . . The defendants offered testimony that the Union opposed the violence and even offered a reward for information leading to the arrest of those who committed violent acts. We believe that the evidence supports the trial court's finding that there was no nexus between the alleged violent acts and the defendants in this cause.[12]

B. Discussion and Resolution

1. The basic question: legality of the picketing

The Charging Parties, owners-franchisees of predominating portions of the Chicago taxicab fleet, have during the past several years altered their basic method of operation from employing their own drivers to drive their fleet to leasing out their cabs, usually on a daily basis, to individual cab drivers who are concededly not employees as defined by the Act but independent contractors not within the Act's coverage. Dissatisfied with the cab-leasing terms imposed on them, substantially similarly, by the taxicab companies, the leased cab drivers have attempted, through Respondent Unions as their advisers presumably skilled in negotiating, to deal collectively with the taxicab companies in order to obtain more favorable lease terms. The taxicab companies have refused to negotiate, claiming they are not obligated to do so since the leased cab drivers are not employees under the Act, which is not applicable to them. When the organized leased cab drivers, carrying banners containing Respondents' name, thereupon picketed the taxicab companies at their cab storage garages in an attempt to compel them to negotiate and in order to persuade other potential cab lessee-drivers not to rent cabs until such negotiations occurred, the taxicab companies sought to invoke the Act as allegedly applicable to that activity by filing charges against Respondents alleging that the picketing constituted a secondary boycott in violation of Section 8(b)(4)(i) and (ii)(B) of the Act. This presents the threshold issue here, i.e., whether the described picketing violates Section 8(b)(4)(i) or (ii)(B). After close consideration, I have concluded that it does not.

Section 8(b)(4)(i) and (ii)(B) makes it an unfair labor practice for a labor organization or its agents:

> (4)(i) to engage in, or to induce or encourage any individual employed by any person engaged in commerce or in an industry affecting commerce to engage in, a strike or a refusal in the course of his employment to use, manufacture, process, transport, or otherwise handle or work on any goods, articles, materials, or commodities or to perform any services; or (ii) to threaten, coerce, or restrain any person engaged in commerce or in an industry affecting commerce, where in either case an object thereof is:
> (B) forcing or requiring any person to cease using, selling, handling, transporting, or otherwise dealing in the products of any other producer, processor, or manufacturer, or to cease doing business with any other person, or forcing or requiring any other employer to recognize or bargain with a labor organization as the representative of his employees unless such labor organization has been certified as the representative of such employees under the provisions of section 9: Provided, That nothing contained in this clause (B) shall be construed to make unlawful, where not otherwise unlawful, any primary strike or primary picketing. [Emphasis added.]

The basic question presented, i.e., whether the picketing here was in violation of Section 8(b)(4)(i) and (ii)(B), appears to be novel; no case directly in point has been cited by counsel. Thus, the Charging Parties' counsel's impressively scholarly 90-page brief arrays cases for the most part dealing with conventional secondary boycott situations in one way or another involving traditional employer-employee relationships, with attempted embroilment of another employer or employees alien to the controversy, within the frame of reference of traditional industrial disputes,[13] without providing a single case dispositive of the principal issue here. Since of the myriad of cases assembled none is dispositive or substantially assistive, it would serve no useful purpose to indulge in a harrowing beating through the thicket only to point out repetitively that each cited case thus differs from the described *non*employer-employee, *non*industrial relations dispute situation here, seemingly for the first time in Board annals, presented.

At the threshold, it is clear that the mere colloquium, joinder, association, or organization of the LCDs for dealing collectively with the taxicab companies was not violative of the Act, since the Act contains no proscription of such activity. See National Woodwork Mfrs. v. NLRB, 386 U.S. 612, 645 (1967). Beyond this, as to the picketing, certainly the prohibitions of the Act should be read with an eye cocked toward its purposes:

> The most universal and effectual way of discovering the true meaning of a law, when the words are dubious, is by considering the reason and spirit of it, or the cause which moved the legislator to enact it. [1 W. Blackstone Commentaries 61.]

[12] While these determinations are likewise not dispositive herein, we have been instructed to accord them deserving weight. Mitchell Plastics, 117 NLRB 597, 598 fn. 1 (1957), enfd. as modified 260 F.2d 472 (6th Cir. 1958); Seyfert Foods Co., 109 NLRB 800, 810 fn. 5 (1954); Sun Co. San Bernardino, California, 105 NLRB 515, 521 (1953), enfd. as modified 215 F.2d 379 (9th Cir. 1954); Aerovox Corp., 104 NLRB 246, 247 1953), enfd. 211 F.2d 640 (D.C. Cir. 1954), cert. denied 347 U.S. 968 (1954); Nashville Corp., 94 NLRB 1567, 1568–69 (1951).

[13] With a few cases, heavily relied on by the Charging Parties, seemingly sui generis because of the perhaps unique configurations of the prevailing extraordinary and ambivalent jural relationships at various levels among "employed," "employers," and "employees" (or even both simultaneously), "contractors," "subcontractors," "hirers," and "users" as in the highly singular, Janus-like performing arts (music; ballet) field. Cf. Musicians Local 16 (Manor, Inc.), 206 NLRB 581 (1973), enfd. 512 F.2d 911 (D.C. Cir. 1975); Musical Artists (National Symphony Orchestra Assn.), 157 NLRB 735 (1966).

It cannot be without significance that the introductory "declaration of policy" of the 1947 "Labor Management Relations Act" is couched in terms of the interrelationship of "employers, employees, and labor organizations," the "rights of both employees and employers," and the regulation of "practices on the part of labor and management" (1947 Act, Sec. 1; emphasis added); nor can it be devoid of design that the basic frame of reference constituting the "Findings and Policies" of the Act is likewise cast in terms of pacification of tensions between "employers" and "employees" (Sec. 1, as amended by 1947 Act, Sec. 101). Nowhere is any legislative purpose to be found in or gleaned from the Act to regulate the relationships between entrepreneurs as distinguished from those between employers and employees (and labor organizations as proxies of employees). It is conceded by the parties here that the leased cab drivers on whose behalf Respondents sought to negotiate improved lease terms are not employees but independent contractors or entrepreneurs, whose entry into leasing arrangements with the taxicab companies was entirely optional on the part of both the lessees and the lessors. Thus, the attempt by the leased cab drivers to obtain more favorable lease terms, and failing that to withhold their trade if the existing less favorable leases were not ameliorated, meanwhile publicizing that endeavor through first amendment-protected communicatory picketing, may hardly be regarded, even with inordinate linguistic stretching, to constitute that unfair labor practice by a labor organization in that situation representing employees "refus[ing] in the course of [their] employment . . . [to] handle or work on any goods . . . or to perform any services" (Act, Sec. 8(b)(4)(i) supra), within the proscription of the Labor Act's provision here invoked.

Since there is concededly no employer-employee relationship between the primary contestants here (i.e., the leased cab drivers and the taxicab companies)[14] nor employee-employer strife requiring pacification through the processes of the Board for any of the reasons recited in the preamble of the Act, I am unable to discern how Respondents' picketing here falls under the umbrella of the Act's purposes or proscriptions. While it may be argued—in what appears to be a somewhat wooden or gunbarrel reading of selected words of Section 8(b)(4)(i) and (ii)(B)[15]—that that provision is applicable to the situation here per se simply because a labor organization is involved and charged, as distinguished from the leased cab drivers themselves, such an interpretation appears to be strained and out of keeping with the declared purposes of the Act. The labor organizations here functioned at most as advisers of the independently contracting, entrepreneurial leased cab drivers who were their principals, and whom they represented—in a segregated groupment known as the Leased Taxicab Drivers Division not commingled with the membership at large of the Unions—not as employees but only because those entrepreneurs had invoked their assistance as presumed experts in the negotiating art. Since there was no labor dispute here[16] and the activities of Respondents were simply not those of a labor organization qua labor organization, the picketing for improved leases does not fall comfortably within the regulatory prescription of the Act, and I do not believe it should be deposited or engrafted there by administrative-judicial fiat. Cf. NLRB v. Longshoremen ILA (Ocean Shipping) and National Woodwork Mfrs. v. NLRB, supra at fn. 16.

There is a further answer to the argument that the picketing was violative of the Act because it was "connected" with Respondents labor organizations, although it would not have been if it had been carried out merely by their principals, the leased cab drivers. Just as the Act was not intended to regulate the behavior of employers generally, but only certain aspects of their relationships with employees and their representatives, so, too, the Act was not intended to regulate the behavior of labor organizations generally, but only certain aspects of their employee vis-a-vis employer related activities. It is admitted, indeed even alleged, here that no employer-employee relationship existed between the Charging Parties taxicab companies and the leased cab drivers, the independent contractors who had enlisted the supposed negotiating expertise—but not qua labor union in relation to themselves—of Respondents. The Act does not prevent labor organizations from advising or representing persons, groups, or other organizations who are not employees or in matters which are not employment related. Nor

[15] Qui haeret in litera haeret in cortice. As stated by Chief Judge Sobeloff in NLRB v. Longshoremen ILA (Ocean Shipping), 332 F.2d 992 at 997 (4th Cir. 1964), "Section 8(b)(4) must be interpreted, not merely read literally," citing Electrical Workers IUE Local 761 v. NLRB, 366 U.S. 667, 672 (1961), and Lesnick, The Gravamen of the Secondary Boycott, 62 Colum. L. Rev. 1363 (1962). Cf. also NLRB v. Fruit Packers, 377 U.S. 58, 63–73 (1964), citing Holy Trinity Church v. U.S., 143 U.S. 457, 459 (1892), in which the Court had pointed out:

> It is a familiar rule that a thing may be within the letter of the statute and yet not within the statute, because not within its spirit, nor within the intention of its makers. This has been often asserted, and the reports are full of cases illustrating its application. This is not the substitution of the will of the judge for that of the legislator; for frequently words of general meaning are used in a statute, words broad enough to include an act in question, and yet a consideration of the whole legislation, or of the circumstances surrounding its enactment, or of the absurd results which follow from giving such broad meaning to the words, makes it unreasonable to believe that the legislator intended to include the particular act.

[16] "The Act has been interpreted as conferring Board jurisdiction over a variety of labor matters, but there can be no jurisdiction where the complaint presents a controversy unrelated to the resolution of a 'labor dispute' as defined. . . . Not every activity of a labor organization, not even every controversy in which it may become involved, is a 'labor dispute' within the statutory meaning. . . . [Here the union, which declined to supply members to work on ships carrying on trade with Cuba (characterized by the court as 'a general political question,' 332 F.2d at 996)] is not seeking to alter any terms or conditions of employment." NLRB v. Longshoremen ILA Local 1335 (Ocean Shipping), supra at 995–996. In par. 5(g) of his September 9, 1980 petition to the U.S. district court for a preliminary injunction herein (fn. 2, supra), the Board's Acting Regional Director expressly asserted that "[a]t no times material herein have Respondents [the Unions] been engaged in a labor dispute with the [taxicab] Companies." (G.C. Exh. 7, p. 4.) It is to be noted that the Act's definition of "labor dispute" (Act, Sec. 2(9)) is couched in terms of "any controversy concerning terms, tenure or conditions of employment, or concerning the association or representation of persons in negotiating . . . or seeking to arrange terms or conditions of employment," even though the immediate "disputants [do not] stand in the proximate relation of employer and employee" (id., emphasis added). Cf. also Woodwork Mfrs. v. NLRB, 386 U.S. 612 at 645 (1967).

does the Act place any ban on the picketing of even employers by independent contractors (or their agents), whether the latter be customers, buyers, sellers, lessors, or lessees; nor of independent contractors by other independent contractors. Nor does it circumscribe the freedom of expression of labor organizations in, at any rate, matters unrelated to labor disputes, nor otherwise curb first amendment guarantees. Cf., e.g., Steelworkers Local 14055 v. NLRB, 524 F.2d 853 (D.C. Cir. 1975), remanded for reconsideration under changed circumstances 429 U.S. 807 (1976). The Act is not a full-scale "Emily Post" behavioral capsule covering everything a labor organization may or may not do. NLRB v. Longshoremen ILA Local 1335 (Ocean Shipping), supra. It would seem, for example, that for a labor organization not representing employees in any labor controversy to boycott or picket a real estate landlord or a rental car lessor to attempt to persuade him to reduce his rent or grant more favorable lease terms, or to picket a merchant to reduce his prices, or even secondarily to picket a customer of a bank with an object of compelling the bank to reduce its interest rates would no more violate the Act than if any other person—employer, lessee, potential lessee, customer, or agricultural worker not within the Act's coverage—did so, as they indeed have on innumerable occasions. Although the picketing of the taxicab companies here was "primary" and limited to primary sites (i.e., business locations of the Charging Parties themselves) in that it was beamed at the parties directly involved, while also not within an employment-related "labor dispute" context,[17] it is to be noted that not all secondary boycott or picket activity, even within a "labor dispute" configuration, is violative of the Act. Cf. NLRB v. Fruit Packers, 377 U.S. 58 (1964); NLRB v. International Rice Milling Co., 341 U.S. 665, 672–673 (1951). Existence of an objective proscribed by the Act may not be inferred on the basis of picketing alone. Cf. Houston Building Trades Council (Everett Construction), 136 NLRB 321, 323–324 (1962); Laborers Local 41 (Calumet Contractors), 133 NLRB 512, 513 (1961). Were this otherwise, grave constitutional questions would arise. It is a cardinal principle of statutory construction to avoid, if at all possible, resolving a case on the basis of determining a constitutional question.[18]

A union, in its activities in support or on behalf of persons or causes not within the protection or prohibition of the Act, is entitled to exercise its first amendment and other constitutional rights like any other individual or organization. Since the actions of Respondent Unions here were solely on behalf of persons (i.e., leased cab driver entrepreneurs) explicitly excluded from the definition of employees under the Act, and solely in furtherance of ends sought by those nonemployees not concerning any aspect of an employment relationship, they were of that category. I accordingly conclude that it was not violative of the Act for the entrepreneurial cab drivers, acting in concert or counseled by Respondents, not to lease cabs from the Charging Parties' taxicab companies, or for them or Respondents to attempt through picketing and handbilling to persuade other potential entrepreneurial cab lessees not to lease cabs from those companies, until the companies bargained about the lease terms. It would be a strange anomaly if the Act that was intended to free employees to organize for collective action toward employers were permitted to be turned against consumers or lessees organizing for collective action toward their suppliers or lessors. No basis has been shown to attribute any such purpose, as is now essayed in this novel proceeding, to the framers of the Act. Cf. NLRB v. Longshoremen ILA (Ocean Shipping), supra. If Congress had intended to brand activity of this kind illegal, with the attendant stringent if not quasicriminal penalties, it could readily have said so in plain words, obviating the necessity for the tortuous statutory constructions here advanced to support the prosecution's case. "It is a rule of statutory construction that a casus omissus cannot be supplied by the courts." McCaffrey, Statutory Construction 25. Cf. Levberg v. Schumacher, 225 N.Y. 167 (1919). Respondents are correct in maintaining that the burden is not on them to establish the inapplicability of the Act or that their actions were not unlawful.

For the foregoing reasons, it is concluded that the picketing activities here did not fall within the purview, and were therefore not violative, of the Act.

2. Other incidents

It remains to consider whether various incidents, some arguably related to and others clearly unrelated to the picketing, were violative of Section 8(b)(4)(i) or (ii)(B).

We begin with a strong condemnation of any violence of the type which occurred. While it is clear that such incidents call for police action, it does not follow that they therefore constitute violation by Respondents of Section 8(b)(4) of the Act. Cf. NLRB v. International Rice Milling Co., supra at 671–672 (1951). It needs no saying that all kinds of criminal acts are, unfortunately, constantly occurring, but that the mere commission of crime, even by a union, does not necessarily constitute a violation of the particular Act under which this proceeding is required to be judged.

It is to be noted that the consolidated complaint does not even allege that Respondents committed, are responsible for, or violated the Act through any violent acts. Further, however, as in the lengthy case tried before the Circuit Court of Cook County and affirmed by the Illinois Appellate Court (supra), there is simply an absence of substantial evidence linking Respondents to any act of violence here. The gap cannot be supplied through suspicion, surmise, or conjecture, particularly since serious crime is involved and Respondents are entitled to the benefit of a presumption of innocence. This proceeding is governed by the Administrative Procedure Act, which requires that findings and conclusions be based on substantial credible evidence,[19] lacking here insofar as providing reliably persuasive linkage of any violent acts to Respondents. Indeed, none of the violence has been shown to have been picket-related. Under these circumstances, to pronounce Respondents guilty of serious violent crime here would find no adequate support in the record.[20]

[17] It is reemphasized that the Act's definition of "labor dispute" is cast in terms of controversies concerned with "employment." NLRA, Sec. 2(9), emphasis added.

[18] Cf., e.g., Steelworkers Local 14055 v. NLRB, supra; Nebbia v. New York, 291 U.S. 502, 537–539 (1934); People v. Barber, 289 N.Y. 378 (1943); Johnson v. City of New York, 274 N.Y. 411 (1973); Tauza v. Susquehanna Coal Co., 220 N.Y. 259 (1917). Statutes are presumed constitutional. Butterfield v. Stranahan, 192 U.S. 470, 493 (1904). And it is not for an agency created by statute to assail its own legislative birth certificate as unconstitutional. Cf. U.S. v. Butler, 297 U.S. 1 (1936); Panitz v. District of Columbia, 112 F.2d 39, 41–42 (D.C. Cir. 1940).

With regard to the alleged failure of some "commission drivers" in the employ of the taxicab companies to report for work or cross the picket "lines" here, and of a few merchandise suppliers to make some expected deliveries (and one service company to make a usual call), it is to be emphasized at the outset that the picketing was in no way beamed at them and that they were not among its objects. The commission drivers as well as all "inside" maintenance and service employees of the taxicab companies were and are represented by the Seafarers Union, and no organizational objective is attributed to Respondents. If any of these persons elected on occasion not to report for work, whatever the reason or reasons may have been (not here shown through the testimony of any of them), or even not to cross a picket line because of some perhaps strongly held or perhaps misperceived (depending on the point of view) "general principle" which some unionists and others choose to avow, that hardly supports a finding of illegality here, since such was not an object of the picketing; to hold otherwise would substitute possible effect for the Act's test of object, or to suppose object solely from possible effect. Cf., e.g., International Rice Milling Co., supra; Baldovin v. Longshoremen ILA, 626 F.2d 445 (5th Cir. 1980); Maritime Union (Shippers Stevedoring), 245 NLRB 149 (1979).

This leaves only, as meriting mention, the isolated incident at Yellow Cab's South Indiana Avenue garage which, although housing only cabs of commission drivers, was inadvertently picketed for perhaps a half hour at the very outset of the picketing activity around 5:30 a.m. on August 12, 1980, but which was immediately discontinued (without repetition) when the error was pointed out. Under the circumstances, such an isolated and almost immediately rectified and unreiterated error may hardly be deemed to warrant extension of the Board's strong remedial arm.

In sum: Here the direct, primary, and only dispute of the leased cabdriving entrepreneurs, represented by Respondents not as a labor union but only for technical advisory purposes, was with the taxicab companies, which refused to negotiate regarding the terms on which they were leasing their cabs to the cabdriving entrepreneurs. This was the only reason the taxicab companies were being picketed. Obviously it was not and could not have been "an object" of that picketing to force or require the taxicab companies to cease doing business with the leased cabdrivers, since the taxicab companies were perfectly willing to continue leasing cabs to the drivers on the existing companies-imposed terms. Nor was an object of the entrepreneurial picketing, purposed to achieve more favorable leases, to induce or encourage leased cabdriver entrepreneurs to cease using the cabs of or to do business with the taxicab companies, violative of Section 8(b)(4)(B), since, not being employees, they were not engaging and could not engage in or induce or encourage other cabdriving entrepreneurs to engage in "a strike or a refusal in the course of [their] employment to use . . . or otherwise handle or work on any goods, articles, materials, or commodities or to perform any services" (Act, Sec. 8(b)(4)(i); emphasis added); nor did or could they "threaten, coerce, or restrain" the overwhelming number of leased cabdriving entrepreneurs who had made common cause with them, as well as those who perhaps had not, to "cease" doing business with the taxicab companies or "force or require . . . any other employer to recognize or bargain with a labor organization as the representative of his employees" (id., Sec. 8(b)(4)(ii)(B); emphasis added.) The direct and primary dispute remained with the taxicab companies, at their own site locations. The picketing was not purposed to make the taxicab companies stop leasing cabs to the pickets or others; nor was it an object of the picketing to "force or require" leased cabdriving entrepreneurs to stop doing business with the taxicab companies, but merely to urge them as fellow entrepreneurs to withhold their trade until the taxicabs companies were willing to discuss, rather than impose, lease terms; and, finally, even if an object had been to "force or require" some entrepreneurial leased cabdrivers to withhold their trade, it would still not have been violative of the Act, since the entire issue concerning lease terms was not in an employment or industrial relations context within the declared purposes or schema of the Act. Insofar as any effect of the picketing on the taxicab companies' commission driver employees was concerned, concededly it had no organizational objective and, I find, it was not an object thereof to enmesh them in any way violative of the Act, any work interruption on their part not having been established by substantial credible evidence (as through the testimony of even a single such employee) to have been other than uncoerced, voluntary, or an incidental effect or byproduct of the lawful picketing. Insofar as violent and disorderly acts are concerned, while not alleged in the consolidated complaint as violative of the Act, they have in any event not been established by substantial credible evidence to have been committed by, at the direction of, or with the authorization, connivance, or approbation of Respondents; and they should be dealt with through the local law enforcement machinery.

For these reasons, I have concluded that the consolidated complaint should be dismissed in its entirety.

[19] Administrative Procedure Act, 5 U.S.C. §§ 556(d) and 706(2)(E); Consolidated Edison Co. v. NLRB, 305 U.S. 197, 229, 230 (1938); Willapoint Oysters v. Ewing, 174 F.2d 676, 690, 691 (9th Cir. 1949), cert. denied 338 U.S. 860 (1949); NLRB v. Bell Oil & Gas Co., 98 F.2d 406, 410 (5th Cir. 1938); *NLRB v. A. S. [20] It is strongly emphasized that disorderly or criminal conduct, whether or not connected with picketing, is in no manner here condoned, but, on the contrary, deplored and denounced. Such conduct should be reported to local police or other law enforcement authorities for investigation and prosecution in the usual way. As for the occasional colorful or exuberant language ascribed to some pickets here, it appears to have been little more than the usual outcropping—on both sides—of a rancorous situation exacerbated by the refusal of one side to even listen to or to talk with the other. Cf., e.g., NLRB v. International Rice Milling Co., supra at 670–673.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Jurisdiction is properly asserted herein over the persons of the parties to this proceeding.

2. The leased taxicab drivers of each of the Charging Parties taxicab companies, who have been picketing the Charging Parties and on whose behalf Respondents sought to negotiate with the Charging Parties, have in the inception, purpose, course, and conduct of that picketing been and continue to be independent contractors and customers of the Charging Parties and not employees within the meaning of the Act.

3. Said picketing activities of said leased taxicab drivers and insofar as participated in by Respondents were and are in lawful exercise of constitutionally guaranteed rights of said leased taxicab drivers and of Respondents, in pursuance of a primary economic contention between independently contracting taxicab-driving entrepreneurs and the Charging Parties concerning terms, provisions, and conditions governing the rental of taxicabs owned by and franchised to the Charging Parties.

4. Jurisdiction is not properly asserted herein over the subject matter of the said picketing activities of Respondents seeking to achieve more favorable leasing arrangements on behalf of said independently contracting taxicab-driving entrepreneurs with the Charging Parties.

5. Said picketing activities have not been and are not in violation of the Act.

6. It has not been established by substantial credible evidence that Respondents have violated the Act in any other respect alleged in the consolidated complaint.

7. For the reasons set forth in section III, supra, the consolidated complaint should be dismissed.

14 December 1984

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND DENNIS

On 28 September 1983 Administrative Law Judge John H. West issued the attached supplemental decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

Unlike the Chairman, we find the judge did not err by extending the backpay period to 31 July 1980.[2] The Respondent failed to meet its burden of proving that the backpay period termination date should be other than 31 July, the date the General Counsel alleged in his backpay specification.

In the original unfair labor practice proceeding,[3] the Board found that the Respondent discharged 11 employees in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act and awarded backpay from the discharge date, 11 June, to the date of their employment, or waiver of employment, with Midway Trailer, which purchased a portion of the Respondent's assets. The Board concluded that "even assuming Respondent's financial condition was precarious, it is obvious that Respondent's practice and intention, until June 11, 1980, and the advent of the Union, was to keep its repair shop employees working and occupied in spite of its economic difficulties."[4]

The Eighth Circuit[5] affirmed the Board's finding that the discharges were unlawful, but remanded the backpay issue to further consider when, in the exercise of reasonable business judgment, the Respondent would have been forced to close the shop.

It is well settled that in a backpay proceeding the General Counsel's sole burden is to show the gross amounts of backpay due. Kansas Refined Helium Co., 252 NLRB 1156, 1157 (1980), enfd. 683 F.2d 1296 (10th Cir. 1982); NLRB v. Brown & Root, Inc., 311 F.2d 447, 454 (8th Cir. 1963). Once he has done so, "the burden is upon the employer to establish facts which would . . . mitigate that liability." Brown & Root, 311 F.2d at 454.

In Brown & Root, the Eighth Circuit observed that "in many cases it is difficult for the Board to determine precisely the amount of backpay which should be awarded to an employee." Id. at 452. The court went on to state that the Board may use close approximations, and may adopt formulas reasonably designed to produce close approximations, so long as the method selected is not arbitrary or unreasonable under the circumstances. Accord: Iron Workers Local 378 (Judson Steel), 227 NLRB 692 (1977); Bagel Bakers Council v. NLRB, 555 F.2d 304 (2d Cir. 1977).

The Respondent has raised an affirmative defense that it would have been forced to close 13 June, and thus jobs for the discriminatees were not available thereafter. The burden of going forward with evidence to prove a defense based on lack of job availability rests with the Respondent. NLRB v. Mastro Plastics Corp., 354 F.2d 170, 176 (2d Cir. 1965), cert. denied 384 U.S. 972 (1966); Underwood Machinery Co., 95 NLRB 1386, 1392–93 (1951).

In the instant case, the General Counsel in the backpay specification and at the hearing met his burden of showing the gross amounts of backpay due. The General Counsel reasonably selected 31 July to terminate the Respondent's backpay liability, as the third quarter of the Respondent's fiscal year ended on that date and as the court of appeals had concluded that the record did not support an award of backpay for August.[6]

The burden of establishing its affirmative defense therefore fell on the Respondent. At the backpay hearing, the Respondent failed to meet its burden. In an effort to demonstrate that it would have closed the shop 13 June, the Respondent merely reiterated evidence which the judge discredited at the original hearing. The judge in the backpay proceeding specifically found that "Mastell was not being truthful when he testified that he had decided on June 10 to close the shop and parts department on June 13," and that Mastell was attempting to find ways to keep the shop open and "was not about to call it quits." The Respondent failed to present any evidence at the backpay hearing to show that it would have been forced to close its shop on a date earlier than 31 July but later than 13 June.

Our dissenting colleague would remand the case to the judge for further findings as to when the Respondent would have been forced to close the shop absent unlawful discrimination. But, because the Respondent insisted on presenting evidence only with regard to 13 June, and because the judges in both the original and backpay proceedings discredited that evidence, no finding of a different date is supported by this record.

In the alternative, our dissenting colleague would remand the case for further evidence. This option, however, would give the Respondent two bites at the apple. The Respondent had full opportunity to produce evidence, if it had such evidence, of when it would have been forced to close the shop other than 13 June. It failed to avail itself of the opportunity. A remand for further evidence would cause additional delay, and would not likely elicit substantially different evidence from that the Respondent previously adduced. Further, in its 31 August 1982 statement of position following the court remand, the Respondent stated:

> [T]he position of Mastell Trailer Corporation [is] that this matter not be remanded to Region 18 for a subsequent back pay hearing. The testimony which will be adduced at such hearing will be no different than that adduced approximately twenty months ago when this matter was initially heard with the exception that Mastell would be calling its banker and accounting firm to further substantiate its deteriorating economic condition. The record dictates that Mastell would have shut down its shop and parts department on June 13, 1980 regardless of the union.

In other words, the Respondent stated it did not desire a backpay hearing to present evidence.

Unlike our dissenting colleague, we see no conflict between our decision and the court of appeals' statement, as follows (682 F.2d at 756):

> The Board should employ an economic analysis to determine when Mastell, in the exercise of reasonable business judgment and, with appropriate concern for the welfare of its employees, would have been forced to close its repair shop and parts department. Backpay should then be computed from the date of actual discharge to the date the employees would have been discharged in the absence of antiunion animus.

We do not interpret this statement as changing long-established Board and court law regarding evidentiary burdens in backpay proceedings. Rather, we view the court's direction as requiring us to analyze the Respondent's economic evidence in light of evidence of union animus. This we believe the judge properly did.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Mastell Trailer Corporation, St. Paul, Minnesota, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

CHAIRMAN DOTSON, dissenting.

Contrary to my colleagues, I am unable to adopt the judge's calculation of the appropriate amount of backpay owing in this proceeding. In my view, the judge's finding that the backpay period extends to 31 July 1980[1] is unsupported by the record in this proceeding and is based on a rationale at odds with the remand order of the court of appeals.

In Mastell Trailer Corp. v. NLRB,[2] the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit enforced on the merits the Board's finding[3] that the Respondent violated the Act by closing its repair shop and parts operation and discharging employees on 11 June because of their union activities. The Eighth Circuit, however, vacated and remanded for additional Board consideration matters pertaining to the proper backpay entitlement of the unlawfully discharged employees. Contrary to the Board's order of backpay extending to August, the court concluded that although the record justified a backpay order "for a short period of time" the award of backpay into August "appears punitive in nature" inasmuch as the Respondent's financial condition "continued to deteriorate during June, July, and August."[4] Because of the deficiencies in the Board's analysis regarding the backpay issue, the court specifically ordered:

> The Board should employ an economic analysis to determine when Mastell, in the exercise of reasonable business judgment and, with appropriate concern for the welfare of its employees, would have been forced to close its repair shop and parts department. Backpay should then be computed from the date of actual discharge to the date the employees would have been discharged in the absence of antiunion animus.

At the compliance hearing following the court's remand the General Counsel presented as the sole witness in support of the backpay specification Compliance Supervisor James Miller. Miller testified that he did not speak with anyone in the Respondent's management in determining when the Respondent likely would have closed its shop in the absence of the employees' union activities and that in drafting the backpay specification it was "assumed" that the Respondent would have kept open its shop until 31 July. According to Miller, this assumption was reached because it so happened that 31 July was the end of the third quarter of the Respondent's fiscal business year. The General Counsel presented no other evidence.

The Respondent contended at the hearing that it was on the brink of imminent financial collapse in June and would have closed its shop for economic reasons shortly after 11 June. Consistent with the Eighth Circuit's description of the Respondent's perilous financial condition in June, the Respondent's banker Bradley Rinsum testified that the Respondent could not have continued to sustain the losses it already had incurred in view of its outstanding business debts. Indeed, it is undisputed that the Respondent had to obtain additional credit from its bank immediately prior to 11 June just to meet its payroll and also was required to seek an advance under its existing loan arrangement to pay employees their accrued vacation pay.

Notwithstanding this uncontradicted record evidence of the Respondent's critical economic condition, the judge dismissed this evidence of a likely imminent shutdown as "purely speculative" and completely failed to undertake the economic analysis ordered by the Eighth Circuit. Instead, the judge accepted the General Counsel's "assumption" that the Respondent would not have closed its shop until the end of the fiscal quarter on 31 July. The judge made this finding because "Board calculations based on calendar quarters have been approved" by the courts, citing NLRB v. Brown & Root, Inc.[5] Brown & Root, however, concerned the propriety of the customary quarterly formula used by the Board in calculating gross backpay once the proper backpay period has been determined[6] and therefore does not answer the question of when backpay ceases to accrue because of a loss of employment pursuant to legitimate business reasons. In seeking to answer that question, the happenstance of when the Respondent concludes its fiscal quarterly period has only minimal, if any, probative value.

More importantly, in Brown & Root the Eighth Circuit adopted a standard that the General Counsel's backpay calculation must not be "arbitrary or unreasonable in the circumstances involved." 311 F.2d at 452. Applying this reasonableness standard to the instant proceeding in light of the court's instructions on remand, it is clear that the Eighth Circuit has ordered the Board to engage in an "economic analysis" and that application of the assumption proffered by the General Counsel derived solely from the date the Respondent commenced its fiscal year does not satisfy that requirement. It therefore follows that the failure of the judge and the majority to render a decision based on the mode of analysis ordered by the Eighth Circuit is to engage in precisely the "arbitrary or unreasonable" calculation the Eighth Circuit directed the Board to avoid in Brown & Root.

In sum, given the law of this case as ordered by the Eighth Circuit, I would find that a calculation of backpay based solely on the General Counsel's fiscal year assumption is arbitrary and unreasonable. Accordingly, it is my view that the General Counsel has failed to satisfy his burden of presenting a reasonable basis for awarding backpay to 31 July. I would therefore remand this proceeding to the judge with instructions to make sufficient additional findings of fact in line with the economic analysis ordered by the Eighth Circuit or, in the alternative, I would remand this proceeding to the judge for rehearing for the purpose of taking additional evidence sufficient to enable the Board to comply with the directions of the court of appeals.[7]

[5] 311 F.2d 447 (8th Cir. 1963).

[6] The court rejected the employer's contention in Brown & Root that a gross backpay formula based on a "lump sum" amount was appropriate rather than one based on calendar quarters.

[7] The majority concedes that it is the General Counsel's burden and not the Respondent's burden to show the gross amount of backpay due. This calculation, of course, requires the General Counsel to demonstrate a reasonable basis to support the gross backpay period set forth in the backpay specification. In determining that the gross backpay period terminated on 31 July 1980, the General Counsel and the majority rely exclusively on the fact that 31 July 1980 is the date ending the third quarter of the Respondent's fiscal year. Why is the Respondent's fiscal year a reasonable date to terminate the gross backpay period? The majority offers no explanation. What is the connection between the Respondent's fiscal year and the likely closing of its shop? The majority again offers no explanation. Instead, the majority merely assumes that 31 July 1980 is a reasonable date to terminate the backpay period. To rely exclusively on such an assumption is to ignore the Eighth Circuit's admonition to employ an economic analysis in computing the appropriate amounts of backpay in this case. Unlike my colleagues, I decline to do so.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION

JOHN H. WEST, Administrative Law Judge. The National Labor Relations Board (Board), in its decision herein, see Mastell Trailer Corp., 258 NLRB 1234 (1981), adopted the findings and conclusions of an administrative law judge who recommended, among other things, a backpay award from the day of the involved employees' unlawful discharge, June 11, 1980,[1] to the date of their employment or waiver of employment with the corporation which purchased a portion of Respondent's operation. On review, the court in Mastell Trailer Corp. v. NLRB, 682 F.2d 753 at 755 (8th Cir. 1982), as here pertinent, determined that when Respondent unlawfully discharged the employees it was in "financial plight . . . [and] would not have operated for very long." The court went on to state at 756:

> As we review the record, it justifies a backpay order for a short period of time. Because Mastell's financial condition continued to deteriorate during June, July, and August, the record does not appear to support a backpay award for August. The award of backpay to August lacks evidentiary support, and therefore, appears punitive in nature.

It then concluded at 756:

> Accordingly, we . . . vacate and remand the backpay issue to the Board. The Board should employ an economic analysis to determine when Mastell, in the exercise of reasonable business judgment and, with appropriate concern for the welfare of its employees, would have been forced to close its repair shop and parts department. Backpay should then be computed from the date of actual discharge to the date the employees would have been discharged in the absence of antiunion animus.

On January 4, 1983, the Board's Regional Director for Region 18 issued a backpay specification and notice of hearing, which specifies a backpay period which ends on July 31, "the date on which the Respondent would have closed the [involved] shop repair facility."

In its answer, Respondent denied that the appropriate period of backpay ends on July 31. It states two affirmative defenses. The first alleges that due to deteriorating economic conditions Respondent would have closed its repair shop and discharged the 11 employees on June 13 and, therefore, the backpay period should end on that date. The second alleges that the 11 discharged employees failed to make a reasonable and diligent search and a good-faith effort to find interim employment and to otherwise mitigate their damages following their discharge.

A supplemental hearing was held on April 11, 1983, in Minneapolis, Minnesota. On the entire record thus made, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the briefs filed by the General Counsel and counsel for Respondent, I make the following findings of fact and conclusions of law.

The General Counsel called one witness, James Miller, who is a compliance supervisor with the Board, and who testified that he compiled the information for the backpay specifications; that he assisted in drafting the backpay specification; that it assumed that Mastell would have kept its shop open until July 31; and that he did not talk with anyone in Respondent's management regarding when it would have closed its shop.

The General Counsel then argued at the hearing that the computation of backpay on a quarterly basis has been approved by the Board; that[2] while the involved "employees were reinstated or effectively declined or waived reinstatement . . . with Respondent's successor on August 12 . . . [i]n view of the decision of the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals, it appears inappropriate to seek backpay for any part of August"; and that it is Respondent's burden to establish that the discriminatees would have been laid off due to economic considerations prior to July 31, but for the unlawful layoff of June 11.

With respect to the backpay period, Respondent called four witnesses: David Mastell, who owns Respondent, Bradley Rinsum, who is Respondent's banker, and Robert Schneider and Jack McCabe, who own the successor corporation and who formerly were Respondent's shop service manager and parts manager, respectively. Of these witnesses, only Rinsum did not testify at the first hearing.

In the April 1983 hearing, Schneider testified that he knew Respondent was losing money. At monthly meetings with Mastell every area of the Company was discussed. Mastell's philosophy had always been to try to keep the men working, "and at a couple of different times, he told me if they had to sweep floors, to keep them busy, not to lay them off"; that the employees in the repair shop were repairing few customer-owned truck trailers; that to keep the men busy they repaired Respondent-owned units, which it was trying to sell and, therefore, no return was had until these units were sold. Prior to 1980 about 75 percent of the trailers repaired were customer-owned; that on the day the shop closed Respondent had only two customer-owned trailers in the shop. He was surprised when the shop was closed down. He knew it was coming but he "just didn't think it would be that quick." In the January or March 1980 management meeting it was determined that, if conditions could not be improved within 3 or 4 months, something would have to be done or the Company might go bankrupt. The successor corporation, which purchased Respondent's parts and repair business (and more recently Respondent's fabrication business), grew from 2 employees in August to 15 employees (not counting office personnel) in April 1983. The successor corporation did not purchase the trailer sales portion of Respondent's business and, therefore, did not have the expenses of the trailer inventory.

McCabe testified that the fact that Respondent had an accumulated loss of over $100,000 was brought up in a management meeting held between June 1 and June 7. He was not surprised when the shop shut down because "with the losses we were having every month, I was surprised he didn't do it three or four months before that." One of the two banks which extended credit to the successor corporation was the same bank at which Respondent had its line of credit. He did not remember whether at the above-described June management meeting Mastell said he was considering laying off all shop employees or shutting down the business. He was not advised prior to June 11 that Mastell was going to close the shop.

[2] Respondent operates on a fiscal year basis, and July 31 would have been the end of its third quarter.

Mastell testified that from the start of fiscal 1979 to June 1980 Respondent went from 22 to 11 employees in the repair shop. While during fiscal 1979 about 85 percent of the work of the repair shop was on customer-owned units and the remainder of the work was on Respondent's units which it was selling, there was a decrease in shop work in 1980 due to a loss of major accounts. In the spring of the year 85 percent of the work was on equipment Respondent was attempting to sell. The accountant who Respondent employed, who testified at the prior hearing, advised Mastell in March to liquidate all but the sales department (Respondent had about 120 trailers for sale in the spring of 1980). At the time of the April 1983 hearing he thought the account was out of State (the accountant did not testify). On June 9, he received the May 31 profit/loss statement which showed a loss of almost $23,000 in May with an accumulated loss for year-to-date of over $103,000. The accountant again advised liquidation; and then prepared a statement of income and expenses by department (according to the statement, the shop lost over $57,000 and the parts department lost over $26,000 during the year-to-date period. Mastell, on June 9, showed Rinsum both the profit and loss and the department income and expense statements. He decided to close the shop and parts department while lying awake the morning of June 10, and decided that he was going to shut them on Friday, June 13. He did not tell anyone because he "was hoping—maybe a trailer sale would come up, maybe I could have liquidated something—anything to pull it off." While his mind was made up he had hopes that something drastic would happen. He was calling on customers on June 11 when he learned that "the Union was going to come in" with a contract that afternoon. He was relieved because he believed it was no longer necessary to feel guilty about closing the shop and parts department. He "was overdrawn $2,000 from the payroll from the . . . [preceding week and] . . . [t]he bank was good enough to cover the checks that went through, and I had to borrow money for the payroll." When the shop was closed there were only two customers' trailers which needed a total of 10 hours of work; he could not reasonably liquidate Respondent's trailer inventory because at that time he could only expect 25 cents on the dollar, even though he had personally guaranteed the loan covering his inventory, his personal assets would not have covered the difference between what he owed and what he believed his inventory was worth at the time.[3] He paid the discharged employees the 1 to 3 weeks' vacation they had accrued with funds obtained from his line of credit. Prior to the discharge he made every effort to keep his shop and parts employees working. He was not going to give the employees any advance warning of the closing and at his last meeting with the employees, in May 1980, he advised them they would be receiving a raise but, at the same time, there could be layoffs if things did not turn around. He was trying to get repair business on June 11 so that he could go "to the bank and . . . [get] more money to pay the payroll and extend it." He never suggested to employees that they cut their wages to save their jobs; his banker left him with the impression that he should liquidate. He testified that he had laid off employees in the repair shop in the past without any advance notice.

Rinsum testified that the agreement between his bank and Respondent provided for (a) a floor plan for the requisition and holding of trailers for resale, (b) an accounts receivable financing package, and (c) an installment credit line for the acquisition of equipment. The initial line of credit his bank gave to Respondent was $250,000 for trailers and either $100,000 or $150,000 for accounts receivable. The bank had a 90-day note with an interest rate that eventually floated at 2 percent above prime. He reviewed Respondent's monthly financial statements and he did see a breakdown for each department, but he neither recalled nor was he interested in how individual departments were doing. He believed it was a wise business decision to shut down the repair shop on June 11 because he could see no way for Respondent to satisfy the debts that were outstanding at that point but he "could only evaluate that by the end result . . . since he did not have information at . . . [his] disposal with which to make such a judgment at the time." The week before Mastell laid off the shop employees, he had to obtain additional credit at his bank to pay them. Mastell also had to take an advance under the existing commitment to pay the employees for their accrued vacations. He did not know whether the income the shop employees generated exceeded labor costs; but he knew that Respondent could not have continued to sustain its losses.

Contentions

On brief, the General Counsel contends that while Respondent pled, as an affirmative defense, that the shop would have closed on June 13, it chose to offer nothing more, with the exception of Respondent's banker, than testimony and evidence already discredited. Assertedly, Rinsum failed to shed any light in that, while he was of the opinion that Respondent's decision to shut down the shop on June 11 was a good business decision, he conceded that he did not recall whether labor cost exceeded income generated by the shop in the spring of 1980 and could not state how a particular department of Respondent's business was performing. It is argued by the General Counsel that "much of Rinsum's testimony buttresses the argument that in spite of its economic difficulties, Respondent intended to continue to operate." (G.C. Br. 6.) Assertedly, since Respondent failed to prove with any degree of certainty when the discriminatees would have been laid off absent the discrimination, the presumption is that the backpay specification accurately sets forth the backpay period.

Respondent, on brief, contends that when the record establishes that the employees would have been laid off "eventually" due to economic reasons, it becomes incumbent on the Board to determine when economic factors would have forced a shutdown irrespective of union animus, and limited backpay accordingly. Mastell requests that the > . . . award of back pay to the discharged employees [be limited] to the period of June 11, 1980 to June 13, 1980 and submits that any award past June 13, 1980 will be punitive in nature, will award the discharged employees more than they would have received absent the 8(a)(3) violation and will be contrary to the remand of the 8th Circuit Court of Appeals [R. Br. 16].

[3] Respondent had a $400,000 line of credit in 1979 with 90-day notes on its inventory of new and used trailers.

In the alternative, Respondent argues that employees Michael Faricy and James Gear did not make a good-faith effort to mitigate losses in that the former allegedly made no attempt to find employment in other trailer shops in the Twin City area and the latter was "offered" factory work but did not accept the employment because he did not like the hours or the location.

Analysis

In this type of proceeding the General Counsel has the burden of establishing as nearly as possible what the employees would have earned but for the unlawful conduct of the Respondent. Phelps Dodge Corp. v. NLRB, 313 U.S. 177 (1941), and NLRB v. Brown & Root, Inc., 311 F.2d 447 (8th Cir. 1963). The General Counsel has the burden of establishing a formula for the calculation of gross backpay due to employees, but in many cases it is difficult to ascertain the precise amount due and, therefore, a wide range of discretion is accorded the fashioning of such a formula provided it is reasonably designed to produce approximations and it is not arbitrary and unreasonable. Once the General Counsel has established a reasonable formula, the burden then falls on Respondent to establish facts which would negate or diminish the existence of liability. Brown & Root, Inc., supra. Board calculations based on calendar quarters have been approved. Id.

It would seem that Respondent has misread Mastell Trailer Corp. v. NLRB, supra, in asserting that "any award past June 13, 1980 . . . will be contrary to the remand of the 8th Circuit Court of Appeals." The evidence Respondent submitted herein does not speak to—as the court directed—when Respondent would have been forced to close its repair shop and parts department, in the exercise of reasonable business judgment and with appropriate concern for the welfare of its employees. The evidence speaks to when Mastell alleges he would have closed absent union animus, namely, June 13. This evidence was formerly discredited. After listening to him testify, it is my opinion that Mastell was not being truthful when he testified that he had decided on June 10 to close the shop and parts department on June 13. Mastell may have engaged in self-deception. He impressed me as being a fighter. With only 2 years of high school, he has accomplished a great deal. He did not listen to his accountant who earlier had told him to "throw in the towel." He did make some changes which included some layoffs. But he was not about to call it quits. Not until he felt betrayed was he willing to close down a portion of the business he built. Mastell was not going to close the shop and the parts department on June 13. He was attempting to find ways to avoid doing just that. And if he had not succeeded he would have found a way to prolong what may have been inevitable. Mastell impressed me as being a stubborn man who would not rely on the "experts." How long he could have kept the repair shop and the parts department open is, on this record, purely speculative. He had extended his line of credit to meet one payroll. He was also able to further extend it to cover accrued vacations. Possibly there could have been alternatives. But Mastell did not discuss alternatives with the employees. It was not indicated how far his bank would have extended his credit line to make up any differences in the income and labor costs for the shop and parts department. Respondent focuses solely on June 13. But again, Mastell's testimony regarding June 13 is not credited. His accountant did not testify herein and banker Rinsum did not provide the answer to the court's question.

In my opinion Respondent has not met its burden of demonstrating when "in the exercise of reasonable business judgment and, with appropriate concern for the welfare of its employees, [it] would have been forced to close its repair shop and parts department." (Emphasis added.)

Regarding Respondent's contentions about employees Faricy and Gear, it is my opinion that based on the evidence of record, both made good-faith efforts to find other employment during the backpay period. Gear did not receive an offer of factory work, contrary to Respondent's assertion on brief.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[4]

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN, HUNTER, AND DENNIS

On 16 May 1983 Administrative Law Judge Thomas A. Ricci issued the attached decision. The Respondent and the General Counsel filed exceptions and supporting briefs, and the Charging Party filed a brief in answer to the Respondent's exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions,[2] but not to adopt the recommended Order.

We agree with the judge that the Respondent unlawfully instituted several unilateral changes in its employees' terms and conditions of employment. We believe, however, that the judge's recommended Order lacks sufficient specificity as to the unlawful changes made and the affirmative steps that the Respondent must take to remedy those violations of the Act. We shall provide that the Respondent make the employees whole for any monetary losses they suffered as a result of the unilateral changes. Payments to employees shall be made with interest as prescribed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977). See generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

Similarly, we agree with the judge that the strike that commenced 24 May 1981 was an unfair labor practice strike and that Joyce Green was unlawfully discharged while participating in the unfair labor practice strike. Again, however, we find the judge's recommended Order to be inadequate concerning those matters. Accordingly, we shall order that the Respondent offer the strikers, on their unconditional applications to return to work, immediate and full reinstatement to their former positions or, if these positions no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority and other rights and privileges, dismissing, if necessary, persons hired on or after 24 May 1981, and to make them whole for any loss of earnings they may suffer as result of the Respondent's refusal, if any, to reinstate them in a timely fashion by paying to each of them a sum of money equal to that each would have earned as wages during the period commencing 5 days after the date on which each unconditionally offers to return to work to the date of the Respondent's offer of reinstatement, less any net earnings during such period. The Board has found that the 5-day period is a reasonable accommodation between the interests of the employees in returning to work as quickly as possible and the employer's need to effectuate that return in an orderly manner.[3] Accordingly, if the Respondent has already rejected, or later rejects, unduly delays, or ignores any unconditional offer to return to work, or attaches unlawful conditions to its offer of reinstatement, the 5-day period serves no useful purpose and backpay will commence as of the unconditional offer to return to work.[4]

Having further found, in agreement with the judge, that during the strike the Respondent terminated Joyce Green in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act, we shall order the Respondent to offer Joyce Green immediate and full reinstatement to her former position or, if that position no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to her seniority or other rights and privileges, dismissing, if necessary, persons hired on or after the date of her discharge, and to make her whole for any loss of earnings she may have suffered as a result of the discrimination practiced against her.[5]

In each instance where backpay is appropriate, such backpay and interest shall be computed in the manner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

While Member Hunter agrees that there is no basis for overruling the judge's credibility findings, he disapproves of the judge's conclusions that the Respondent's owner gave false testimony under oath.

[2] We disavow the judge's statement that "[i]n a sense the strikers were former employees . . . ." See Laidlaw Corp., 171 NLRB 1366 (1968), enfd. 414 F.2d 99 (7th Cir. 1969), cert. denied 397 U.S. 920 (1970).

In addition we find it unnecessary to rely on his discussion of the so-called "hypothetical employer" in par. 8 of the section of his decision headed "Violations of Section 8(a)(3)."

Finally, we agree with the judge that the Respondent's no-solicitation rule violated Sec. 8(a)(1), but we do not rely on T.R.W. Bearings, 257 NLRB 442 (1981), and rely instead on Beth Israel Hospital, 223 NLRB 1193 (1976), affd. 437 U.S. 483 (1978).

[3] Drug Package Co., 228 NLRB 108 (1977).

[4] Newport News Shipbuilding Co., 236 NLRB 1637 (1978), enfd. 602 F.2d 73 (4th Cir. 1979).

[5] Abilities & Goodwill, 241 NLRB 27 (1979), enf. denied on other grounds 616 F.2d 6 (1st Cir. 1979).

Member Dennis agrees with the dissent in Abilities & Goodwill that the majority in that case improvidently overruled more than 30 years of Board precedent requiring unlawfully discharged strikers to offer to return to work in order to initiate the running of backpay. Absent a majority to overrule Abilities & Goodwill, Member Dennis will apply the remedy set forth in that decision.

NLRB 289 (1950), and Florida Steel Corp., supra. Finally, we find that the Respondent's misconduct was egregious and demonstrates a general disregard for the employees' fundamental rights. Therefore, we shall issue a broad order requiring the Respondent to cease and desist from infringing "in any other manner" on employees' Section 7 rights. Hickmott Foods, 242 NLRB 1357 (1979).

Accordingly, for the foregoing reasons, we shall substitute the Order below for that recommended by the judge.[6]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Health Enterprises of America, Inc., d/b/a Canterbury Villa, Milan, Ohio, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Telling employees that they should quit their union membership.

(b) Coercively interrogating employees concerning their union activities.

(c) Telling employees the owner of the Respondent will never sign a collective-bargaining agreement with the Union.

(d) Telling employees they will regret having engaged in union activities.

(e) Telling employees that the Respondent will not bargain with the Union because it filed charges with the National Labor Relations Board.

(f) Promulgating or maintaining an unlawful no-solicitation rule.

(g) Discharging or in any other manner discriminating against its employees because of their union or other protected concerted activities.

(h) Dealing directly with its employees, or discussing terms and conditions of employment with its employees while bypassing the employees' established collective-bargaining representative.

(i) Unilaterally changing its employees' terms and conditions of employment including, but not limited to, insurance benefits, working hours, rates of pay, incentive plans, and vacation pay and eligibility standards, provided, however, that nothing in this Decision and Order shall be construed as authorizing or requiring the Respondent to withdraw or eliminate any benefits presently enjoyed by the Respondent's employees absent the express consent of the Union.

(j) Refusing to bargain in good faith with United Paper Workers International Union and its Local Union No. 571, AFL–CIO as the exclusive representative of its employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All full-time and regular part-time service and maintenance employees including laundry employees, housekeeping employees, dietary employees, nurses aides and LPN's, excluding registered nurses, therapists, professional employees, business and admitting office employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act, employed by the Respondent at its Canterbury Villa Nursing Home.

(k) In any other manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Restore all terms and conditions of employment specified in paragraph 1(i) above to the status quo as it existed before the unlawful unilateral changes were made, to the extent such changes were detrimental to the employees.

(b) Make whole any employees who may have been detrimentally affected by the changes in terms and conditions of employment specifically described in paragraph 1(i) above, with interest on any monetary losses the employees may have suffered to be computed in the manner set forth in this Decision and Order.

(c) Offer immediate and full reinstatement to Laura Baisden, Sandra Baisden, Glenda Foster, Charlotte Habeck, Joan Kuhlman, Ethel Signs, and Emily Walker to their former positions or, if those positions no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges, and make them whole for any loss of earnings they may have suffered as a result of the discrimination practiced against them in the manner set forth in this Decision and Order.

(d) Offer immediate and full reinstatement to Joyce Green to her former position or, if that position no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to her seniority or other rights and privileges, dismissing, if necessary, persons hired on or after the date of her discharge, and make her whole for any loss of earnings she may have suffered as a result of the discrimination practiced against her in the manner set forth in this Decision and Order.

(e) Remove from its files any reference to the unlawful discharges and notify the employees in writing that this has been done and that the discharges will not be used against them in any way.

(f) Offer the unfair labor practice strikers, upon their unconditional applications to return to work,

[6] We shall also correct certain omissions and other minor errors in the judge's recommended Order so as to conform the Order to our traditional practice and the specific violations found.

immediate and full reinstatement to their former positions or, if those positions no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority and other rights and privileges, dismissing, if necessary, persons hired on or after 24 May 1981, and make them whole for any loss of earnings they may have suffered in the manner set forth in this Decision and Order.

(g) Recognize and, on request, bargain in good faith with the aforesaid labor organization as the exclusive representative of the employees in the above-described appropriate unit with regard to rates of pay, hours of employment, and other terms and conditions of employment, and embody in a signed agreement any understanding reached.

(h) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(i) Post at its Milan, Ohio nursing home copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[7] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 8, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(j) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT tell employees they should quit their union membership.

WE WILL NOT coercively interrogate employees concerning their union activities.

WE WILL NOT tell employees the owner of the Company will never sign a collective-bargaining agreement with the Union.

WE WILL NOT tell employees they will regret having engaged in union activities.

WE WILL NOT tell employees that the Company will not bargain with the Union because it filed charges with the National Labor Relations Board.

WE WILL NOT promulgate or maintain an unlawful no-solicitation rule.

WE WILL NOT discharge or in other manner discriminate against our employees because of their union or other protected activities.

WE WILL NOT deal directly with our employees, or discuss terms and conditions of employment with our employees while bypassing the employees' established collective-bargaining representative.

WE WILL NOT unilaterally change our employees' terms and conditions of employment including, but not limited to, insurance benefits, working hours, rates of pay, incentive plans, and vacation pay and eligibility standards, and WE WILL NOT withdraw or eliminate any benefits presently enjoyed by our employees absent the express consent of the Union.

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain in good faith with United Paper Workers International Union and its Local Union No. 571, AFL–CIO as the exclusive representative of our employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All full-time and regular part-time service and maintenance employees including laundry employees, housekeeping employees, dietary employees, nurses aides and LPN's, excluding registered nurses, therapists, professional employees, business and admitting office employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act, employed by the Respondent at its Canterbury Villa Nursing Home.

WE WILL NOT in any other manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL restore all terms and conditions of employment to the status quo as it existed before the unilateral changes were made, to the extent such changes were detrimental to our employees.

WE WILL make whole any employees who may have been detrimentally affected by the changes in terms and conditions of employment with interest on any monetary losses our employees may have suffered.

WE WILL offer immediate and full reinstatement to Laura Baisden, Sandra Baisden, Glenda Foster, Charlotte Habeck, Joan Kuhlman, Ethel Signs, and Emily Walker to their former positions or, if those positions no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges, and make them whole for any loss of earnings they may have suffered as a result of the discrimination practiced against them, with interest.

WE WILL offer immediate and full reinstatement to Joyce Green to her former position or, if that position no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to her seniority or other rights and privileges, dismissing, if necessary, persons hired on or after her discharge and make her whole for any loss of earnings she may have suffered as a result of the discrimination practiced against her, with interest.

WE WILL notify the above-named employees that we have removed from our files, and have asked the Employer to remove from the Employer's files, any reference to their discharges and that the discharges will not be used against them in any way.

WE WILL offer the unfair labor practice strikers, upon their unconditional applications to return to work, immediate and full reinstatement to their former positions or, if those positions no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority and other rights and privileges, terminating, if necessary, persons hired on or after 24 May 1981, and make them whole for any loss of earnings they may have suffered, with interest.

WE WILL recognize, and on request, bargain with the above-named labor organization as the exclusive representative of our employees in the above-described appropriate unit with regard to rates of pay, hours of employment and other terms and conditions of employment, and embody in a signed agreement any understanding reached.

HEALTH ENTERPRISES OF AMERICA, INC., D/B/A CANTERBURY VILLA

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

THOMAS A. RICCI, Administrative Law Judge. A hearing in this proceeding was held on February 16 and 17, 1983, at Sandusky, Ohio, on complaint of the General Counsel against Health Enterprises of America, Inc., d/b/a Canterbury Villa (the Respondent or the Company). The original complaint issued on June 18, 1981, based on a charge filed on May 6, 1981, by United Paper Workers International Union and its Local Union No. 571, AFL–CIO (the Union). A second charge was filed on June 5, 1981, and a second complaint was issued on July 16, 1981, involving the same parties. The issues presented are whether, as alleged in the complaint, the Respondent unlawfully refused to bargain with the Union, and discharged a number of employees in violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act. Briefs were filed by all parties.

On the entire record, and from my observation of the witnesses, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF THE RESPONDENT

The Respondent, an Ohio corporation, operates a facility in Milan, Ohio, where it is engaged in the operation of a nursing home. Annually it derives gross revenues in excess of $100,000 from this operation and receives goods valued in excess of $2000 at this location directly from points outside the State. I find that the Respondent is an employer within the meaning of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

I find that the United Paper Workers International Union and its Local Union No. 571, AFL–CIO is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Case in Brief

The events giving rise to this case occurred at a nursing home located in Milan, Ohio, which the Respondent purchased on February 1, 1981. There were about 70 employees working there at the time, about 50 to 55 of them represented by Local 571 of the Paperworkers Union, which filed this charge. The Union had been certified as bargaining agent following a Board election the year before in 1980. Within 2 months of taking over the business, Peter Kern, the owner and president of the Company, started to change conditions of employment unilaterally, dealing directly with the employees as though the Union were not in the picture at all. He gave pay raises, changed vacation allowances, established new work rules, etc. While doing this he met a few times with union agents, ostensibly carrying on simultaneous collective bargaining. There came a time when the Union filed charges with the Board, claiming the Respondent was not bargaining in good faith. With this, the Company formally cut off all recognition of the Union, asserting that because of the charges filed, it was no longer obligated under the statute to continue recognition of the exclusive certified bargaining agent. And it continued to deal with the employees directly, still ignoring the Union's existence. It promised them benefits and advised them to stay away from the Union for at least 6 months, so that they could judge for themselves how more generous his personal treatment of them was without a union.

The first question presented is: Did the Respondent violate Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by refusing to bargain with the Union and by dealing directly with the employees and changing their conditions of employment behind the Union's back, as it were?

In May 1981 the Union decided to strike, and gave the Respondent the usual 10-day notice of such intent. The strike was set to begin at 7 a.m. on May 24. On May 23 the Union decided otherwise, and chose to continue bargaining instead. After the 7 a.m. shift reported to work on May 24 seven of the employees were summarily discharged. Within a matter of an hour or so, the Union again switched position and started the strike, and the picketing, that very day.

The second major issue presented is: Were the seven employees discharged because of the union activities—in violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act, or were they released for just cause, as the Respondent contends? Most of the employees struck, at least 40 of them. The picketing went on for several months. If either of the first two questions is answered affirmatively in favor of the complaint—allegations of refusal to bargain and in fact illegal discharge of seven employees—it follows that it was an unfair labor practice strike which followed. In that event, each and every one of the strikers has a statutory right to be returned to work upon unconditional application.

A final major allegation of the complaint is that the Respondent discharged 40 of the strikers after the strike started. As to that, see below.

B. Violations of Section 8(a)(5)

That Kern, the owner of the business, was adamantly opposed to having a union represent the employees in this place is the clearest reality shown on this record. He admitted the fact a number of times verbatim, both to the employees when he gathered them apart from the Union, and at the hearing while testifying. It matters not that he believed a union is a bad thing in nursing homes, that the possibility of strike could endanger the well-being of the patients. The law is clear, and he simply cast it aside. The Respondent took over the very same business of the predecessor, the same full complement of employees, the same building and equipment, the same supervisory staff, etc. The duty to bargain with the established certified union could not be questioned. NLRB v. Burns Security Service, 406 U.S. 272 (1972).

Two months after he arrived, about April, Kern announced to the employees, without a word to the Union, that he was changing the health and life insurance policy then in effect. The new policy became available to more employees than in the past. On May 3 he also changed the work schedule, ordering the day shift to work 7-1/2 hours a day instead of the old 7 hours. On April 24 he called all the employees to a meeting where he addressed them for perhaps an hour. His initial message to them that day was that he had no intention of having anything at all to do with the Union, that Robert Moore, the Union's business representative, with whom he had been talking, was no longer welcome, and that he had written a letter to the Union telling them that. He also distributed to the employees that day a new policy handbook to take the place of one which had governed conditions of employment under his predecessor. It made a number of changes in their benefits—such as, among others, with respect to a grievance procedure, holiday and vacation benefits, a discipline system, a no-solicitation rule, etc. There is little need to quote the various employees who were present and who testified about what he said that day, for Kern's own words suffice to prove the unfair labor practices. For example:

> Q. Did you ask the employees to give you six months time within which to see what you could do with the nursing home and to help them, and if at the end of that time they were still dissatisfied, they could have their union?
> A. Yes, I did tell them that . . . I told them that we didn't normally conduct ourselves in the way that they had been treated and, yes, that, you know, within 6 months, we will let them make their decision.

This was the employer telling his employees they could do better dealing with him directly than through the Union of their choice, promising to improve the terms of employment within 6 months to the point where they themselves would quit the Union. But they had already chosen to be represented by the Union. If ever there was a clear violation of Section 8(a)(5) of this statute this was it, without need for citing precedent!

In early May, Kern held a number of small group meetings with the employees, talked to three or four at a time in his office, privately. Again he explained the changes he had made and the way he thought it would all benefit them. Asked did he tell them, as some of the employees testified at the hearing, that he would never sign a union contract, Kern denied it. Then came the following:

> Q. Directing your attention again to these small group meetings, isn't it true that you told the employees that were gathered in small groups that these proposals were only for the employees that would stay on and not for those who would go on strike?
> A. No. I didn't tell them that. I said that these wages and policies were going into effect. If they went on strike, they obviously wouldn't be there to participate in them. If they stayed that's what was going on.
> . . . .
> Q. Did you tell the people that they could strike and get nothing or accept what you were offering and not strike and drop the Union?
> A. No. What I told them, again, is that as of May 1st or June 1st or whatever date this document went up on the board, that it was going to be the rates of pay and benefits, etc. If they went on strike, they wouldn't physically be there to get a paycheck.
> Q. Did you tell the employees—did you ask the employees for a chance and tell them that this was hard to get rid of a union once they had it and if they weren't successful, they could try again and get one?
> A. Yes, I believe I said something like that.

In light of the foregoing testimony from Kern himself, of course, I credit the following testimony of the employees. Joyce Green spoke of the April 24 mass meeting of employees. "He said that he wanted to know what the Paperworkers was doing in a health facility. He would not sit down and negotiate with Robert Moore because we had filed an unfair labor practice charge against him. He said he wanted no third party and he still held the ballgame." "He wanted us to sit down and listen. We told him that we were not there to bargain with him and any great offers that he had to take them to the bargaining table. He said I'm not here to bargain. This is an offer. If you stay and you don't strike, that is what you get. This is for the employees who will stay. We told him we were for the Union and it didn't seemed to make any difference . . . I told him there is nothing more than a bribe. This is better than what we asked for at the table. He kept going back and forth and he said, you like the word, Joyce? I said, yes, I do. He said, let's call it a mass bribe for conversation's sake, so that's what he did . . . He said he would never put his name on a contract. He said he had the money, time and ability to hold us off for four years." On May 8 Green was called to the office for a small group meeting, four employees sitting with Kern. "How did the meeting start out? Did Mr. Kern make a long speech? A. No. He said to discuss the policies that he implemented into the facility . . . . He asked if anybody would like to know what he would offer without the union to just give him a phone number."

In April and into early May, Landis was the nursing home administrator, an admitted supervisor. About May 1 she told Green: "Why don't you quit . . . the union." When Green said she would not, Landis came back with "you will not win and you can't win, you are going to hurt a lot of people doing this."

Linda Brown recalled Kern saying at the April 24 meeting "to give him a chance, to not have the union, but give him six months and at the end of six months if you don't like what he said or what he gave us, then we could have our union back. He would allow it. He did make a comment before all this. He said he was probably hanging himself or crucifying himself for making this statement, but he was going to state it anyway." As to her attendance at one of the small group meetings, Brown said Kern "brought out about benefits at other homes, and he would—he would get the same things, but he didn't want to deal with a union and he talked about going to Florida."

Shirley Holmes, present with Joyce at one of the small meetings, testified that when Joyce asked was the raise being offered as a bribe, Kern said: "If you want it to be a bribe, call it a massive bribe . . . . He kept on saying, you take this. Drop the union. Get rid of the union. You accept this. Don't strike."

From Laura Baisden's testimony about a May 5 talk with Administrator Landis: "She stopped me and asked me why—she said, I wanted to talk to you for a minute, but this was very confidential. I don't want it to go no further. She said, I want to ask you why are you girls starting a union in here? I didn't answer at that moment, and she said let me ask you a question: If your grandparents was in here, would you start a union? I said, well, I said it wasn't, like, it wasn't up to me to do anything, because I wasn't supposed to, and she said if you do, that you'll be sorry of it, and that you'll regret it."

By its entire course of conduct in dealing directly with the employees in total disregard of their chosen bargaining agent the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act most flagrantly. Medo Photo Supply Corp., 321 U.S. 678 (1944). I also find that by unilaterally changing the scheduled hours of work, the established health and life insurance benefits,[1] the policy handbook, the vacation benefits previously enjoyed by all the employees, and by giving raises, all without giving the Union an opportunity to bargain on all these subjects, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act. I also find that by deliberately refusing to recognize the Union as bargaining agent because it had filed charges of unfair labor practices with the Board, the Respondent again violated Section 8(a)(5). Equitable Life Insurance Co., 133 NLRB 1675 (1961).

I also find that by Kern's statement to the employees that he would not recognize the Union because it had filed charges against the Respondent with the National Labor Relations Board, by his statement that he would never sign a contract with the Union, by his statement to employees that they should refrain from continued adherence to the Union while he satisfied their economic demands directly, by Administrator Landis' statement that employees should quit the Union and that their union activity would hurt the employees instead, and by her interrogation of employees as to why they wished to be represented by the Union, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

The new rules announced by the Company in the revised policy handbook contain the following no-solicitation rule:

> No person is permitted to solicit for any purpose on the grounds or within the building of this facility, unless prior approval is obtained from the Administrator.

I find that by the announcement and enforcement of this no-solicitation rule the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. T.R.W. Bearings, Inc., 257 NLRB 442 (1981). Cf. also Gillette's, 226 NLRB 819 (1976).

C. Violations of Section 8(a)(3)

As already stated, the Union changed its strategy and decided not to strike on May 24. That morning, the day shift, scheduled to start at 7 a.m., reported for work as usual. Some of the women testified about that. All said they arrived, as usual, before 7 a.m., sat in the lobby talking and some of them having coffee, as they always did, clocked in before 7 a.m., and went to their work stations at 7 a.m. At 9 or 9:30 a.m., each of these seven was called to the office and fired. Why were they discharged?

[1] Contrary to the Respondent's contention, the mere fact that the revised insurance plan then put into effect at this nursing home, which in fact changed the character of the insurance benefit enjoyed by the employees, conformed with the insurance then in effect at its other nursing homes, is not a sufficient defense to this element of the complaint here. The duty to bargain with a certified bargaining agent embraces all conditions of employment involving the employees in that appropriate unit. Here the bargaining unit is not disputed. It is as follows:

> All full-time and regular part-time service and maintenance employees including laundry employees, housekeeping employees, dietary employees, nursing aides and LPN's excluding registered nurses, therapists, professional employees, business and admitting office employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act, employed by the Respondent at its Canterbury Villa Nursing Home.

It is an old principle of Board law that when an employer is charged with discharging a person for an illegal reason, and the affirmative reason advanced by the employer is false, the inference that the true reason was an improper one is greatly strengthened. Shattuck Denn Mining Corp. v. NLRB, 362 F.2d 466 (9th Cir. 1966), enfg. 151 NLRB 1329 (1965).[2] The facts of this case present exactly such a situation. Kern testified that he decided to discharge these ladies because they had "falsified" their timecards that morning. Again and again he repeated the statement at the hearing. And each woman was given a notice, prepared before they were called to the office, reading: "Falsification of timecard." Kern explained this on the ground that the policy book provided that the employees were not to clock in more than 5 minutes earlier than their starting time; in this instance it would have been 6:55 a.m. The timecards in this place are punched by a clock, and there is therefore no way the recorded time could be false. More important, Kern admitted that no matter exactly when the employee punches her card, she is only paid for the scheduled hours—from 7 a.m. to 3 p.m. or to 3:30 p.m. The word "false," therefore, was a pure fiction of the imagination.

But what completely destroyed Kern's credibility in this entire case is that the cards of four of the seven women show they punched in at exactly 6:56 a.m.! Kern even said he looked at the cards before writing the discharge slips. His antiunion feeling may have carried him away, but that he was giving false testimony under oath in this case is an absolute fact. This, to say nothing of the fact the clocking-in rule which Kern now professes to have enforced was unilaterally and therefore illegally established in the first place. Latex Industries, 252 NLRB 855 (1980).

There are other grounds for not believing Kern as to why he discharged these women, but in the light of the first fact, there is little reason for belaboring the matter. Three of the ladies did clock in earlier, one at 6:44 a.m. and two at 6:45 a.m. It was stipulated that in the past others had also clocked in more the 5 minutes before starting time, a number of times, but there is no evidence in the least indicating anyone had been criticized before for that fact. As he rambled along in his self-exculpatory testimony, Kern merged two asserted offenses by the girls into one. He said that sitting in the lobby waiting for 7 o'clock, and talking loudly among themselves, they did not move on to the work stations on time, that they deliberately stayed there 10 to 15 minutes beyond 7 o'clock. With that assertion, he explained the use of the word "falsification" out of his mouth as meaning "falsification in the sense they weren't working; expecting to be paid, but not working." It will not do, for the use of the word falsification in the discharge slips given to the girls is tied directly to the "timecards," not the sitting idly while waiting. Such attempts at double-talking serves all the more to completely discredit the Respondent's principal witness.

Kern's second asserted reason for the discharges is that the seven women were told by a supervisor to go to work after 7 o'clock and ignored him. He testified that from his office, next to the lobby, he saw the women just sitting and talking among themselves after 7 a.m., and sent his assistant, Richard Macaluso, to tell them to get work. Macaluso, the administrator of the home who had been hired 2 weeks earlier in this place, said that about 7:10 a.m. he went out and "asked them if they were planning on going to work, and if they were, I would like them to report to their stations," but that all that happened was "a lot of chitchat and laughing about it." Kern added that about 7:15 a.m. he went out and told the girls to get to work, and that they then did.

All seven of the women involved testified that as they gathered at various times before 7 a.m., they only did what they had always done—had coffee if there was enough time, talked among themselves, and went to their stations directly at 7 o'clock. Each one of them denied either Macaluso or Kern came out of the office to order them to go to work. Several of them did recall Kern putting his head out of the office door to tell them to be more quiet. They explained there was much to do in the lobby at that time because many women were arriving, with valises and things, who had never worked there before. These outsiders had been hired in expectation of the announced strike and formed a complete complement of replacements in advance of the day. Considering the situation in its entirety, I credit these women.

The question remains: Why were these women discharged? After 7 o'clock, Kern realized that, with the anticipated strike replacements having arrived, he was double-staffed on the day shift. He said as much. Having brought some of his employees from other homes he owns, and having hired some new replacements, it can be presumed he had reason to believe they would not be enthusiastic unioneers. After all, as opposed to any union as Kern admitted he was, he must be expected to have taken such precautions when faced with a strike situation. The inference must be that he decided to get rid of the old people who had at least threatened strike and whom he could do without at the moment. He gave no other reason for sending them home.

Had this been an employer who kept his hands off the employee's right to be represented by a union, who had not committed such clear unfair labor practices before that date, who in all other respects complied with the law of the land, the question raised by these seven discharges might appear in a different light. The operator of a nursing home has a responsibility to see that the patients are cared for. That is why the law calls for a 10-day strike notice, so that he can take the requisite precautions to see that the patients are looked after. May he, in order to achieve that perfectly proper objective, hire replacements in advance of the announced strike, even promising them permanent employment, and insist on keeping them when the intended strikers change their minds at the last, critical moment?

[2] As stated in 362 F.2d at 470:

> Actual motive, a state of mind, being the question, it is seldom that direct evidence will be available that is not also self-serving. In such cases, the self-serving declaration is not conclusive; the trier of fact may infer motive from the total circumstances proved. Otherwise no person accused of unlawful motive who took the stand and testified to a lawful motive could be brought to book. Nor is the trier of fact—here the trial examiner—required to be any more naif than is a judge. If he finds that the stated motive for a discharge is false, he certainly can infer that there is another motive. More than that, he can infer that the motive is one that the employer desires to conceal—an unlawful motive—at least where, as in this case, the surrounding facts tend to reinforce that inference.

I do not reach that question in this case, and decision here is not intended to rule against that hypothetical employer. Kern did not give that as his reason when he discharged the ladies. He did not even advance it at the hearing. Moreover, his revealed animosity towards any form of union activity strongly strengthens the conclusion, which I reach, that he seized on the immediate situation to get rid of some of the employees who had refused to heed his advice and delay any union activity for at least 6 months.

I find that by discharging Laura Baisden, Sandra Baisden, Glenda Foster, Charlotte Habeck, Joan Kuhlman, Ethel Signs, and Emily Walker at that moment the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act as alleged in the complaint.

And finally I find that the strike which commenced on May 24, 1981, was an unfair labor practice strike engaged in by the employees in protest of the unfair labor practices committed by the Respondent.

D. The Alleged Discharge of All the Strikers

As stated above, the Union set the time for the strike to start at 7 a.m., and the decision not to strike, made the night before, was not communicated to the Company. In preparation for the strike the Company not only hired a full complement of replacements, but also, not knowing what would happen, hired guards to look after the premises. When the morning shift came to work, to the Company's surprise, they all started to work. While seven of these were later fired, others remained, and continued to work.

When the seven were discharged, about 9 o'clock, they all went to the home of Joyce Green, where other employees were gathered. It was there, about 9:30 or 10 o'clock, in consultation with the union representative, that the decision was made to begin the strike. The entire group then went back to the nursing home, and started picketing. At that moment, some of the early morning shift employees walked off the job, but some of them, old employees, remained at work. The picketing continued for a number of months. Most of the employees joined the strike, but the record does show quite clearly that some, a few at least, remained at work, in addition to the few of the morning shift who came at 7 a.m. and stayed.

The second complaint, issued on July 16, 1981, alleges, without detail, that that day—on May 24—the Respondent discharged 40 named employees. Considering the record as a whole, I take this to mean every one of the employees who decided that day to strike. Neither of the charges, filed long before that complaint was issued, says anything about the entire group being anything but employees who chose to withhold their services. Neither the Union, which filed the charges, nor the employees, thought they had been discharged instead. There is no evidence to prove that all these people were fired, and I shall therefore dismiss this blunderbuss allegation.

The entire case in support of this part of the complaint centers on a letter Kern wrote to the Union 3 days after the strike started. He testified, and no one contradicted him on this point, that after the strike began a Purolater Company truck making delivery to the nursing home had been prevented from entering the home by the picket line. That truck was delivering payroll information from another office of this multiestablished company. Kern wrote to the Union thereafter that, because of this difficulty of the delivery being made to the home, there would be a delay in preparing paychecks, and that employees who still had pay coming to them would receive it in the mail, and should not come to the nursing home to get their checks. In this letter Kern referred to the strikers as "former staff members"; he wrote "Any former employees attempting to enter the facility personally to secure their checks will be immediately requested to leave the facility." Does this phrase, used by Kern in referring to the strikers at that moment, amount to proof that he then and there discharged them all in violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the statute? I think not.

In a sense the strikers were former employees, because they had voluntarily quit work, and if Kern told them then to stay out of the place, he had every right to do so. Since when do strikers have a right to enter the struck place of business? Had Kern been better versed in the intricacies of Board law, he would have known that strikers of any kind, economic or unfair labor practice strikers, have inchoate reinstatement rights if ever they choose to abandon their strike. But to hold that by such a passing phrase, perfectly understandable in the circumstances of the moment, is tantamount to actual discharge, is a play on words.

When Green, the employee president of the local union, heard of the discharge of the seven that morning, she tried to get Kern on the telephone to discuss that matter, but Kern refused to talk to her, so she went to the Home to talk to him about it, but the guard on duty refused to let her in. She was not reporting to work on her regular shift, and certainly there is no claim she intended to come in to work at all. How does the fact the owner did not want to talk to her that day help prove a violation of Section 8(a)(3)? Moreover, the Union's business agent also appeared at the jobsite after the picket line was up. He quoted the guard as saying "my duties are to keep peace here . . . he didn't want to have any problems with the females that were on picket duty in front of the Villa?" Again, the guard was talking to the leader of the strikers, telling him and the strikers to stay out of the place. Do strikers have a right to enter the premises for any reason at all, except it be to offer to abandon the strike?

At the hearing the General Counsel came up with two timecards, one for Audie Overton and one for Shirley Burris, for May 24, 1981. They show that Overton clocked in at 6:40 a.m. and clocked out at 12:10 p.m.; and that Burris clocked in at 6:45 a.m. and out at 11:20 a.m. On each card is written the word "terminated." Neither Overton nor Burris appeared at the hearing. The indications are that they joined the strike when they clocked out on May 24, and remained strikers thereafter. Whatever became of them during the 22-month interval between the start of the strike and the day of the hearing remains unknown. Asked, at the hearing, to explain the word terminated on these two cards, Kern said he did not "remember," he did not know, and added he "imagined" it must have been because they improperly left their duty stations during their shifts, "not finishing out their work day."

I am unable to find a violation of the statute with respect to these two employees. An unfair labor practice is conduct by an employer vis-a-vis his employees, some action on his part that the employees at least know about, or hear about, if not actually done to them personally. There is no evidence, indeed no contention, that Overton or Burris, or any union officials, ever knew about what was written on those two cards until the time the General Counsel examined the company records in preparation for this hearing. I do not think it can be said, in terms of statutory law, that an employee is in fact discharged, unless the employee is told about it. Especially is this logic applicable when the employees voluntarily strike, and for such a long time choose to remain on strike. Unspoken evil intent in the mind of an employer is not an unfair labor practice.

One direct discharge I do find. About 10 days after the start of the strike, Green, who had not yet received a paycheck, called in and was told to bring in the key to the janitor's room, which she still had in her possession. She came and talked to Macaluso, the administrator of the Home. When she looked at the paycheck he gave her, she noticed her 15 days of paid vacation had not been included. When she told this to Macaluso, his only response was, "You're fired." She left and was never recalled.

It matters not that thereafter Green joined the picket line. She had a right to take the top management representative at the home at the moment at his word, that she had really been terminated. I find that by discharging Green the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

In the course of his many conversations with the employees, in small and in large groups, the president of the Respondent said many other things in support of his general antiunion campaign which could be said to constitute unfair labor practices under the statute. Indeed, many of them are listed in the complaints in addition to those found herein. But no useful purpose would be served by belaboring those details here now. Two years have already passed since the events, and the important thing is to remedy the improper conduct without further delay.

IV. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES ON COMMERCE

The activities of the Respondent set forth in section III, above, occurring in connection with its operations described in section I, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce.

V. THE REMEDY

The Respondent must be ordered to cease and desist from continuing to commit the unfair labor practices found herein. It must also be ordered to bargain with the Union in good faith on request, to offer unconditional reinstatement to the eight employees illegally discharged, and to make them whole for any loss of earnings they lost as a consequence, to revert to its former practice with respect to rules of conduct and employee benefits such as existed before the unlawful unilateral changes, without particular attention to restoring those benefits which the employees enjoyed and which were thus illegally taken away from them. And, of course, the Respondent must post the appropriate notices.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. By dealing directly with its employees represented by the Union while bypassing their established bargaining agent, and by unilaterally changing conditions of employment, the Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.

2. By refusing to bargain with United Paper Workers Independent Union and its Local Union No. 571, AFL-CIO, in good faith, as the representative of all employees in the appropriate bargaining unit the Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.

3. By discharging Laura Baisden, Sandra Baisden, Glenda Foster, Charlotte Habeck, Joan Kuhlman, Ethel Signs, Emily Walker, and Joyce Green, for engaging in protected union activity, the Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

4. By the foregoing conduct, and by the conduct of its management representatives in telling employees they should quit the Union, in coercively interrogating employees concerning their union activities, in telling employees the owner of the Company would never sign a collective-bargaining agreement with the Union, in telling employees they would regret having engaged in union activities, and in telling employees the Respondent would not bargain with their chosen representatives because it had filed charges with the Labor Board, the Employer has violated and is violating Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

5. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

Dayton Typographical Service, Inc. and Jack A. Hoendorf. Case 9–CA–16957

14 December 1984

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

On 4 November 1982 Administrative Law Judge Thomas E. Bracken issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions[1] and to adopt the recommended Order.

We agree with the judge's finding that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) by discharging employee Hoendorf. In so doing we have considered the Respondent's contention that Hoendorf was not engaged in concerted activity in light of the Board's recent decision in Meyers Industries, 268 NLRB 493 (1984). In Meyers the Board overruled Alleluia Cushion Co.[2] and held, inter alia, that it would require that for an employee's activity to be concerted it must "be engaged in with or on the authority of other employees, and not solely by and on behalf of the employee himself."[3]

The finding that Hoendorf was engaged in concerted activity is based on credited record evidence that four employees in the Respondent's customer service department (Hoendorf, Long, Fugate, and Runck) jointly presented certain complaints to Supervisor Southam in November 1980. Among these complaints was the three full-time salaried employees' (Hoendorf, Long, and Fugate) expressed disagreement with the Respondent's policy in assigning Saturday work without compensation. Hoendorf's complaints to Supervisor Logan (Southam's replacement) in December 1980 and January 1981 involved this same Saturday uncompensated work policy.

The Respondent's contention that Hoendorf was engaged in individual griping is based on the absence of evidence that Hoendorf was an authorized spokesman and the asserted absence of legitimate concern by the other employees. This latter assertion is predicated on the Respondent's further claim that Long and Fugate decided not to pursue the Saturday work without compensation matter after Southam told them that nobody would receive compensation unless Saturday work became a regular occurrence.

There is no affirmative evidence that Long and Fugate told the Respondent that they were no longer concerned about the Saturday work without compensation matter. Nor does the record show that the Respondent took any affirmative steps to resolve this complaint. The matter continued to be a common concern to the three employees and was recognized as such by Supervisor Logan. Thus, the judge found that in January 1981 "Logan himself plainly recognized that Hoendorf was speaking for the other full-time service employees, when he protested to Hoendorf that the decision he had to make about Saturday overtime was going to affect three other people." In the circumstances here, in which the November 1980 meeting with Supervisor Southam plainly represented concerted activity, we find that Hoendorf's December 1980 and January 1981 complaints to Supervisor Logan concerning Saturday work without compensation were a continuation of the concerted activity.

Having found that Hoendorf was engaged in protected concerted activity we turn to the reason for his discharge. The judge found that the Respondent's stated reason for Hoendorf's discharge was pretextual and that the real reason was Hoendorf's role as the principal spokesman for the service representative in demanding compensation for working on Saturdays. We agree. Accordingly, we adopt the judge's finding that Hoendorf's discharge violated Section 8(a)(1).

The judge also found that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) by interrogating employee Fugate concerning matters related to the pending unfair labor practice case without observing the necessary safeguards and by asking Fugate for a copy of his affidavit given to the Board. In so finding the judge relied on the principles set forth in Johnnie's Poultry Co.[4] and its progeny.

In its exceptions the Respondent relies mainly on the Sixth Circuit's decision in Anserphone that refused enforcement of an earlier Board decision. We

[1] In item 3 of his Conclusions of Law, the judge inadvertently named Hoendorf as the subject of the Respondent's unlawful interrogation. Consistent with his findings on this issue, we correct this Conclusion of Law to name employee Fugate as the individual involved.

[3] Meyers, supra.

[4] 146 NLRB 770 (1964). See also Kyle & Stephen, Inc., 259 NLRB 731 (1981).

In finding the violations involving Fugate Member Hunter adopts the judge's reliance on Johnnie's Poultry Co. and its progeny. Accordingly, he finds it unnecessary to pass on his colleagues' additional rationale for finding these violations.

Member Zimmerman also adopts the judge's reliance on Johnnie's Poultry Co., but he further agrees with the distinction drawn between the present case and Anserphone, Inc. v. NLRB, 632 F.2d 4 (6th Cir. 1980).

note that the court did not expressly pass on the standard applied by the Board. Instead, the court considered the circumstances as a whole and concluded that no coercion had occurred.

The circumstances in Anserphone differ from the instant case. There the court relied on affirmative evidence to show that no fear of reprisal occurred in connection with the interrogation. It cited one employee's refusal to be interviewed and found that another employee submitted a copy of his Board affidavit not out of fear but in a spirit of cooperation.

There is no such affirmative evidence of refusal to be interviewed here. Further, the fact that Fugate responded to the solicitation of his affidavit by the Respondent's counsel by asking if it was legal to give the affidavit to the Respondent is at odds with a finding that Fugate provided the affidavit in a spirit of cooperation.

It is also significant that the Respondent did not limit its interview to matters raised in the complaint, which made no mention of Fugate, but sought Fugate's affidavit which potentially covered matters outside the complaint and which would not have been available to the Respondent unless and until Fugate was called to testify at the hearing. For these reasons we find that the circumstances as a whole give rise to a finding that the interview of Fugate, including the request for his affidavit, constituted coercive interrogation and our finding of a violation conforms to the Sixth Circuit's standard.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Dayton Typographical Service, Inc., Dayton, Ohio, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

THOMAS E. BRACKEN, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried at Dayton, Ohio, May 5–6, 1982. The charge was filed by Jack A. Hoendorf on June 10, 1981,[1] and the complaint was issued July 16. The primary issue is whether the Company, the Respondent,[2] unlawfully laid off and/or discharged Hoendorf in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act.

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the briefs filed by the General Counsel and the Company, I make the following

[1] All dates are in 1981 unless otherwise indicated.

[2] The name of the Company was amended at the trial.

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The Company, an Ohio corporation, is engaged in the manufacture, processing, and nonretail sale of typesetting at its facility in Dayton, Ohio, at which it purchased and received products, goods, and materials in excess of $50,000 directly from points outside the State of Ohio, during the calendar year ending December 31, 1980. The Company admits, and I find, that it is an employer engaged in commerce and in operations affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES[3]

A. Background

The Respondent is a long-established typesetting company, having been in business for over 50 years. One of its departments, and the only one involved in this case, is the customer service department. At all times material to this case, there were four employees in this department. Jack Hoendorf had been hired in 1962, George R. Long in 1966, Paul Fugate in 1972, and Wava Runck in 1978. All but Runck were full-time employees, and none of them belonged to a union.[4] The immediate supervisor of these four employees in 1980 was William Southam. William C. Taylor was the president and chief executive officer of the Company, and his father, John N. Taylor, was chairman of the Board, and partially retired.

Hoendorf, the charging party, at the time of his hiring in 1962 started to work as a typesetter in the plant. In 1966 Hoendorf had been promoted to the position of assistant foreman in the hot metal department. Because of technological changes from hot metal type to computerized photographic composition in about 1976, Hoendorf was transferred to the phototronic department for training as a print-out reader. Hoendorf did not attain enough skill in this position and in about 1977, gave up his union affiliation, and was placed in the customer service department on a salary.

A customer service representative serves as a middlemen between the salesman who secures the printing job and the customer. After the salesman brings the printing job to the department, the service representative marks up the job for the composing department, and then sees it through the plant to completion. At times he must telephone customers to straighten out various printing matters. As President William Taylor testified, the job requires a highly skilled person with experience in the industry, as this person must deal with the Company's over 500 different styles of printed letters, which come in 19 different sizes. The nature of the business often subjected

[3] The testimony was substantially free of direct evidentiary conflict. The facts as found are based on a composite of the testimonial and documentary evidence in the record.

[4] The employees in the plant composing room where the typesetting took place were members of a union, but they are not involved in this case. However, the general foreman of this department, Curtis Couch, had constant contact with the customer service representatives as will be set forth hereafter.

the work force to slack periods of 10 days to 2 weeks. As testified to by Wava Runck without contradiction, "It's an extremely unpredictable business."

In August 1980 Tom Alexander was hired for the purpose of subsequently becoming sales manager. He worked as a trainee in various departments and in September worked in the customer service department.[5] Alexander testified that in late October or early November, while he was training as a salesman, he and the Company's Toledo salesman brought to the customer service department a large "bear" of a job, a real "toughie." He sat it down on Hoendorf's desk and Hoendorf stated that he would not do the job, that he would quit first. Alexander became upset and walked upstairs to his office. Here, after he asked the Toledo salesman, "Is this what's been going on?", Alexander testified as follows:

> And, he said, "We have constant battles with the service department as a whole," of which Jack represented, in trying to get work in the plant of difficult jobs of any work. That there was always a reason why of—they needed more of this or more of that or whatever the way of information, which could be—could be fair. But, it—there was this conflict between the sales and the service department in bringing in difficult jobs.

After Alexander cooled off, he went back to the service department, saw that Hoendorf had settled down, the two reviewed the difficult job, and the job was produced. Alexander admitted that after the job was finished he complimented Hoendorf on a job well done.

Hoendorf admitted that he had words with Alexander about the "atrocious" condition of a job Alexander had brought in the department, and had told him that he would not work on it. However, after both cooled off, Hoendorf did the job. Alexander did not reprimand him, and the first time he subsequently heard the job discussed was on the day he was terminated. Hoendorf further testified that "messy" jobs came in at least once a week.

B. The Events of November

In early November, the Company had completed a difficult job for a major customer on time. When this customer thanked the Company for doing so, Couch, the composing room foreman, stated that this had been accomplished in spite of the customer service department. The four service representatives had been at loggerheads with Couch for some time, regarding his treatment of them as inhuman and demeaning. Immediately following his caustic remark about the major job being done in spite of the service department, the four service representatives, Fugate, Hoendorf, Long, and Runck, gathered in their area and decided to take their complaints to their supervisor, Southam. Fugate told the other three employees to jot down their grievances, and he would secure a meeting with Southam.

On a following Saturday the four representatives met with Southam in his office. Fugate was the lead speaker telling their supervisor that there was constant friction between the service department and Couch, and they wanted something done about it, or they would go to the owners. The employees also complained about the physical working conditions in their department, contending that it was too crowded and outmoded.

Hoendorf brought up the problem of working on Saturdays, and was joined in this discussion by Fugate and Long. Formerly, the practice of having one employee work on Saturday had not been a problem, as Southam himself had worked them, or Wava Runck was given the assignment. Unlike the other service representatives, Runck worked a 5-1/2-hour day, and was not on salary, but received an hourly rate. Thus, when she had worked Saturdays, she had been paid at her hourly rate. However, when either of the three men worked on Saturdays, they received no additional pay for such time, or were not given a corresponding amount of time off. Southam listened to their complaint about working on Saturday without compensation, and advised that he would try to take care of the problem. Working conditions did improve substantially after the meeting, but no word was received as to their demand for compensation for Saturday work.

C. The Events of December

In mid-December Tom Alexander called a meeting of the full-time service representatives to announce a reorganization that would require some personnel changes in their department. Southam did the initial talking, and notified the employees that he was moving upstairs to be the director of typography. Alexander then made what he knew to be a very controversial announcement, by stating that Paul Logan, a former employee, had been hired to return to work in Southam's place as the service manager.[6] The announcement caught all three service representatives by surprise. Hoendorf said that he did not think he could work for Logan as he had had "a hell of a time just working with him." Fugate stated that he did not know if he could work for Logan or not, but he would take it one day at a time.

[5] Alexander testified that during this period he had a "perception" that Hoendorf watched the clock. Since Hoendorf worked until 7 p.m. and Alexander worked until 5 p.m., it is evident that Alexander could not have observed Hoendorf watching the clock so as to leave work right on the minute, or a few minutes before his scheduled time for leaving.

[6] Logan had first started to work for the Respondent in 1973, as a customer service representative. Fugate and Long had worked side-by-side with Logan during this period, but Hoendorf had not as he was still in the hot metal department. In 1975, Logan became the sales representative for the Dayton area. In March 1980 he ceased working for the Respondent to take a job out of town. Nine months later he was hired back as the customer service manager. Logan admitted that he and Hoendorf did not get along "very well" when he was the Dayton salesman. He also testified that when he took jobs to Hoendorf that he had sold, he received complaints about the status of the job, sometimes with threats that he would not do the job. In Hoendorf's opinion, Logan had been an agitator and a big mouth during their relationship. Logan also admitted that he had some "verbal misunderstanding" with Fugate when he would bring to him a job he classified as a "bucket of bolts" or "can of worms." Fugate testified that he and Logan had had many shouting matches over the work Logan brought to him in the department, and that he had a personality conflict with Logan.

Following that meeting, Alexander recommended to Logan that he hold a breakfast meeting with each of the full-time customer representatives. Logan did take Hoendorf to breakfast about December 21, and here he tried to iron out their differences. Logan admitted that when he asked Hoendorf to express his concerns, Hoendorf brought up the subject of Saturday overtime, "out of the clear blue sky." Logan advised Hoendorf that he was not going to work every Saturday like Southam had done, but he would think about the problem.[7] Logan also took Fugate to breakfast, where they exchanged views in trying to straighten things out so as to benefit the Company. Logan did not take Long to breakfast, as Long's hours of work were from 2 to 10:30 p.m. Also, Logan and Long had always gotten along, and had a good working relationship.

D. The Events of Early January

Early in January, Alexander took over as sales manager, heading up the sales force, customer service department, and shipping. Logan assumed the duties of manager of the customer service department. A few days thereafter, Hoendorf and Logan had a discussion about working on Saturdays, and overtime pay. Logan's description of the meeting is more detailed than Hoendorf and is set forth as follows:

> I had a confrontation with Jack. I walked in the Service Department one morning and—it was one evening because George Long was still there. It was possibly, you know, 3:00 o'clock, and Jack, at that time, he says, "Hey", He says "You know, Saturday is coming up." He says, "What are you going to do about Saturday work?"
> And I said, "Well, Jack, I have not made that decision yet." I said, "You know", I says, "I'll let you know."
> He says, "Well, it's Saturday. You had better make a decision now."
>
> And I said, "Look, I will work this Saturday. I'll be here." You know, I said, "Don't worry about it Jack." I said, "You know, you're making a mountain out of a mole hill." I said, "I will make that decision. But, I said, you know, I don't really feel that, you know, it's a concern to discuss out here in front of George Long's presence." You know, I said, "The door is open. If you want to go in and talk."
> And at that point, he pointed his finger at me and he says, "Well, I'll tell you one thing, I'm not working Saturdays without being compensated for it."
> At that point, I said, "Jack, I'm not going to discuss this any further."
> I turned around, went back in my office and closed the door.

On cross-examination when Logan again recounted this same conversation he stated that he had also told Hoendorf the decision he had to make on Saturday overtime was "going to affect those other people," and that "It's not an item to discuss right out here in front of Long."

Hoendorf also testified to a second conversation that he had with Logan within about the same week, about Saturday overtime. Logan, while walking through the plant, stated that he had yet to make up his mind as to which employee would work Saturday. Hoendorf replied that it was not going to be him unless he received time off, or was paid for the time. Logan thereupon replied "Well, there's no if's and's or but's about it. You're not going to get paid for it." Hoendorf then reminded Logan that he had an awful short memory, as he used to work on Saturdays, and got Mondays off.[8] Logan contended that his receiving Mondays off was different, as he had worked on Saturdays on a regular basis. As the argument progressed Logan became angry and loud, but Hoendorf maintained his position that "If you work on a Saturday, you get off on a Monday or you get paid for it." Fugate corroborated Logan's account of this meeting as he recalled Hoendorf arguing that the service representatives should not have to work Saturdays without compensation, because Logan had been compensated when he worked Saturdays. He also recalled that Logan had said that situation was different, as he had worked every Saturday. Hoendorf's and Fugate's testimony was uncontradicted and is credited.

A week or so later, towards the middle of January, Hoendorf testified that he had another conversation with Logan, as it was approaching the time when the Company normally made evaluations of its employees so as to determine which employees were going to receive a raise. Hoendorf asked Logan if he was going to evaluate the employees, or if Alexander was going to do it, so as to see if there were to be raises. Logan replied that he was not going to answer the question at that time, and Hoendorf did not "push it." Logan admitted that he remembered a conversation in which Hoendorf brought up raises and evaluations, but he could not pinpoint the time. I credit Hoendorf's uncontradicted testimony that this conversation took place toward the middle of January.

E. The Layoff of Jack Hoendorf

1. According to Hoendorf

Hoendorf testified that on the afternoon of January 19, William Taylor called him to come to the president's office. After Hoendorf arrived, William Taylor told him to sit down and then the following conversation took place:

> And he said, "I've got some bad news for you, Jack. I'm going to have to lay you off."
> And I said, "Why me?"
> And he said, "Well," he said, "Work's slow," and he said, "Your attitude leaves a lot to be desired."
> Q. Uh-huh.

[7] On rebuttal Hoendorf testified that Logan said he was not going to work any Saturdays. It is not necessary to rule on credibility in this instance, as both parties agree that the problem of Saturday overtime was discussed.

[8] Hoendorf was obviously referring to Logan's 3 years' employment with the Company as a customer service representative.

A. And—

Q. Did—

A. —"All this stink that you've been putting up about working Saturdays."

And I said, "Well, I don't think I put up any more complaint about that than the other people."

And he—his opinion was that I did put up more stink about it.

Q. Uh-huh.

A. And he said there's—he said, "We just don't have the work."

And I said, "Well", I said, "am I being laid off or fired?"

He said, "No, you're being laid off."

Hoendorf's paycheck had already been made out and on receiving it, he left.

Several hours prior to Hoendorf's layoff, Wava Runck had had a conversation with Logan, in which he had informed her that Hoendorf was to be laid off that afternoon. She then asked, "If I quit, will that save Jack's job," and was told that it would not. When she left work at 2 p.m. Logan told her that maybe the layoff was not going to happen.

2. According to Respondent

President Taylor testified that in "April, May, June of 1980," he was working on the largest single job the Respondent had ever produced, working on it himself an average of 6 hours a day. He further testified:

> On a couple of instances, I would ask for Jack's cooperation and his cooperation was not cooperative. I do remember an instance in which I asked him to come into the conference room and help me and he said it would be a lot smarter, Bill if you had one of the girls take this and—and reorder it and shuffle—and transfer some mark-up over to it. I said okay, Jack, fine. Let's get that done. I have got to get the job done.

At this time W. Taylor told himself, "I want this turkey out of here," and made up his mind "that he had to go." When asked on direct examination why he did not terminate Hoendorf at that time he testified:

> A. Well, because I wanted to reorganize the company. I knew I had a gentleman coming on staff to reorganize the company and to—in the commerrcial area, now. And, I feel as a manager or as a management technique, that I shouldn't go around and start shuffling all of these things around. I should give him the opportunity to come in and make some evaluations himself.
> And, the customer service department—the commercial customer service department, during that year of 1980,—it wasn't just Jack. Paul Fugate was going to be next if he didn't change his attitude. And, I—I came in and worked with some of those people at that time. And, I, myself, had had that confrontation kind of—I don't like doing this and whatever.
> I had a company that sales were declining. I had a company, and with that department, I felt those people were unmotivated and I didn't think it was the best thing for me to go in there and fire somebody out of the—right away.

The president further testified that in the first of the year 1981, the quarterly and annual budgets were being prepared. From these he determined that it was necessary to reduce the force in the service department. As he had already made his mind up that Hoendorf was "going to go," he had no problem deciding that it was Hoendorf who would be terminated.

W. Taylor then called Alexander to the office and told him that they both knew they wanted Hoendorf terminated, but he thought they should call Logan in and get his concurrence. When Logan arrived, he was told the Company wanted to eliminate a full-time customer service representative, and asked for his recommendation. Logan promptly responded "Hoendorf," for the reasons that he had the least departmental seniority, he would have less customer impact, and he thought Jack had a bad attitude.

W. Taylor, in accordance with company policy as to discharges, at some point that day informed his father that he was laying Hoendorf off. His father replied, "Fine, go ahead." John Taylor testified that when his son came to him, the president had told him that the reason for the layoff was because Hoendorf was not cooperating with his fellow employees.

W. Taylor thereafter had Hoendorf come to his office, where he told him he was laying him off. When Hoendorf asked why me, W. Taylor told him that, "We don't have any work down there and we had to select somebody and when we reviewed three people there of full-time personnel, you're it." When Hoendorf asked again why he had been selected, the president testified as follows:

> And, I said, "Jack, your attitude in this company has been awful for a long, long time. His response to me was—is that, "Well, I didn't have any problem working for Bill Southam."
> And, I said, "Well, perhaps you didn't have any problem with Bill Southam. But, your attitude within the company, both before Bill Southam—or when Bill Southam was your supervisor and afterwards, you have created a lot of friction in the company." I mentioned—well, that's what I said then. I said, "You have created a lot of friction in the company. There are a lot of people in this company that you have alienated, including me."
> And, he said, "Well, what do you mean?" So, I relayed a number of things that I felt that—one I had received second and third hand and some of my direct experiences with Jack, which included—I had heard that Jack confronted Paul Logan in the service department in front of other people concerning Saturday overtime. I said, "Jack, if you want to talk to him about it you don't get at him right in the middle of things, when other people are on the phone with customers and whatever. I had > heard that second or third hand—I believe Bill Southam had told me that Jack had confronted Paul Logan in the customer service department about wages and review time—"When are you going to—We want to know when we are going to get our reviews."

> And, I told him then—I said, "You're handling it the wrong way. You're—You're creating a problem in front of everybody in the—the customer service department." I mentioned to him that his relationship with Curt Couch was awful. And, I'm sorry. But, Curt Couch, in my opinion, is a very good employee for Dayton Typographic Service.

W. Taylor also told him that his incident with Tom Alexander almost cost him his job at that time. The president then gave him his check and told him that he would be carried on the Company's medical plan for several months, but not to count on coming back.

F. Post Layoff Events

On the morning following Hoendorf's termination, Wava Runck, who was the first service representative to come in each morning, asked Logan what to say to customers who asked for Hoendorf. Logan in turn discussed this with Alexander, and the sales manager advised him: "Let's tell them we're reorganizing," as he did not want to tell customers that "we're really slow." Logan then advised Runck to say that there had been a major reorganization at Dayton Typographic and that Jack Hoendorf did not fit in the reorganization, so he had been terminated.

One of several customers who inquired about Hoendorf was John Voight, who was the art director of the Valvoline Company, in Ashland, Kentucky. Following this phone conversation, Voight wrote to John Taylor in a letter dated February 16, General Counsel's Exhibit 3. In this letter Voight pointed out to the chairman of the Board that Valvoline spends about $60,000 a year for type from the Respondent. The art director stated that he was surprised at the termination of Hoendorf, as he regarded him as "one of your best service employees." Voight went on to write that:

> I have known Jack for many years and have never spoken with a more pleasant person. I felt that while talking with Jack concerning copy, that I could rest assured that he would deliver the quality material that I expected.

Voight concluded his letter by stating that he hoped the Respondent would reverse its decision as to Hoendorf.

By letter dated February 24, Chairman of the Board Taylor replied to the Valvoline letter, General Counsel's Exhibit 4. J. Taylor, after giving a brief history of Hoendorf's employment with the Company, obliquely explained to Voight why the Company had terminated Hoendorf:

> The independence that goes with free thinking is most welcome here—everyone can have their say and will be listened to but when management decided to restructure and reorganize the entire sales and service departments, he could not accept their planning. His unhappiness was well known throughout the Company. I felt that I could not ignore the recommendation of department heads and management and agreed with his leaving.

In the chairman's final paragraph he stated that he deeply regretted, and was somewhat hurt because Hoendorf had not come to his office and said goodbye.

Hoendorf received copies of both letters from Voight, and then went to see Chairman Taylor in late February or early March. After a few pleasantries were exchanged, Hoendorf asked if there were any chance of his coming back to work. The chairman advised him that any call back decision was up to W. Taylor, but did say he would give Hoendorf a good recommendation for another job.[9]

Paul Fugate testified without contradiction that "Shortly after Jack left the Company," the Respondent hired two new employees, Herman Rose and Debbie Rife. Fugate knew Rose to have long experience in type and type setting as the two men had previously worked together at the Standard Register where he had been a work-up man. He did not know Rife's background nor was it otherwise set forth in the record. As to Rose, Runck testified that "he does do customer service on the overloads since we are shorthanded," and that Rose seeks advice from the other three service representatives when he does such work.

Alexander admitted that the Company placed advertisements in the Cincinnati and Dayton newspapers for service representatives. However, he contended that Rose was hired to be a librarian, which was "a new function that we created." He further testified that during the period that Rose was learning the duties of a librarian he was given "a little bit of training in the service department so that he could help out in emergency situations." W. Taylor also admitted that Debbie Rife did some service representative work, but only as an experiment. When asked why, if the Company were overstaffed, it needed more help, the sales manager answered, "We were getting busier, sir."

G. Discussion and Conclusion

Section 7 of the Act guarantees to employees the right to "engage in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection" and Section 8(a)(1) forbids an employer "to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in Section 7." Thus, if Hoendorf's activity is of the type contemplated by Section 7, and if he was discharged for having engaged in it, then the Company violated Section 8(a)(1).

---

[9] Respondent objected to the admission of the Valvoline letter of February 24, 1981, G.C. Exh. 3, asserting that it was not a business record. That it clearly was a business record is shown not only by Chairman Taylor's swift reply to it, but also by other company action. Both letters were shown to Alexander, and to placate this substantial customer, Alexander and another company representative, Bill Shipley, were sent to Valvoline to explain Hoendorf's dismissal to Art Director Voight.

1. Concerted activity

The General Counsel contends that Hoendorf, Fugate, Long, and Runck were engaged in concerted activity in November 1980 when they jointly presented their complaints to Southam, and that when Hoendorf continued to press the complaint about overtime work on Saturday, he continued to be engaged in concerted activity and was entitled to the protection of Section 7. Respondent in its brief, vigorously denies that Hoendorf was engaged in concerted activity, and further argues that even if he were, the Respondent had no knowledge that he had engaged in such activity. Respondent contends that Hoendorf was terminated for various lawful reasons.

The record is crystal clear that the four service representatives engaged in concerted activity when they held a meeting in November with their supervisor, Southam, to expressly present their complaints. While Fugate led off in reciting their grievances to their supervisor, all employees joined in the conversation. They all wanted relief from Couch's demeaning and antagonistic treatment, they all wanted the physical condition of their office improved. Also, the three full-time employees, Hoendorf, Fugate, and Long, expressed their disagreement with the procedure then used by the Company when service employees worked on Saturdays, and made it plain to Southam that they did not want to work on Saturdays, unless they received some form of compensation for so doing.

Thereafter, Southam did secure for them some improvement as to the condition of their office. As to their feud with Couch, the record shows no run-ins with him after that November meeting. However, as November passed, they received no word whatsoever as to their complaint about working on Saturdays for no compensation.

Thus, on December 21 at Hoendorf's breakfast conference with Logan, when Hoendorf brought up the matter of Saturday overtime, he was continuing to express the group grievance that had originally been presented in November to his previous supervisor, Southam. Again, in early January, when, as Logan described it, he had a confrontation with Hoendorf in the plant, Hoendorf was continuing to express a grievance over a matter of importance to all three full-time service employees. Logan himself plainly recognized that Hoendorf was speaking for the other full-time service employees, when he protested to Hoendorf that the decision he had to make about Saturday overtime was going to affect three other people. Then, a few days later, when Logan told Hoendorf and Fugate that he had not made up his mind as to which employee would work on Saturday, the supervisor clearly recognized that he had a problem involving not one employee, but a group of employees. Hoendorf once again pressed the same argument that the service representatives had jointly made a month and a half previously, that they wanted some compensation for working on Saturdays.

Respondent in its brief states correctly there was no evidence that the employees met and elected Hoendorf as their spokesman. But such is not the test as to whether an employer is engaged in concerted activity. The brief also sets forth testimony of Long and Fugate that they did not ask or authorize Hoendorf to speak for them. However, when Wava Runck was asked if she ever authorized Hoendorf to speak for her, she replied that she had not, but to this she added, "What concerned one of us concerned all of us at this point." Certainly Runck's statement shows that she regarded Hoendorf's protests as protests of the service employees as a group.

Thus, not only did Hoendorf's repeated complaints about Saturday overtime meet the Board's criteria for concerted activity[10] but they also meet the criteria of the Sixth Circuit of the United States Court of Appeals, several of whose decisions are cited by the Respondent in its brief. The Sixth Circuit, in a case cited by Respondent, Jim Causley Pontiac v. NLRB, 620 F.2d 122 (1980), in its turn, quotes favorably one of its own decisions concerning concerted activity, NLRB v. Guernsey-Muskingum, 285 F.2d 8 (6th Cir. 1960). In this latter case, the Sixth Circuit set forth the criteria it found necessary to prove concerted activity as follows:

> [I]t is sufficient to constitute concert of action if from all of the facts and circumstances in the case a reasonable inference can be drawn that the men involved considered that they had a grievance and decided among themselves, that they would take it up with management.

Certainly the evidence is clear that Hoendorf, Fugate, Long, and Runck considered that they had grievances with the Respondent, and decided among themselves to take them up with management. They were thus engaged in concerted activity in November as was Hoendorf when he pressed their grievances about Saturday overtime in December and January.

Employer Knowledge

Respondent argues in its brief that neither W. Taylor nor Alexander had knowledge in January, when W. Taylor discharged Hoendorf, that the employees had met with Southam in November, and complained about not receiving compensation for working on Saturdays. Therefore, argues Respondent, it had no knowledge that Hoendorf ever engaged in what it apparently admits was concerted activity. This argument falls for several reasons. The first is that Southam's knowledge of Hoendorf's activities is imputed to the employer by law. Pellegrini Bros. Wines, 239 NLRB 1220 (1979); Red Line Transfer & Storage Co., 204 NLRB 116 (1973). Likewise, Logan's knowledge of Hoendorf's continued complaints about Saturday overtime December and January is imputed to the employer.

In addition, I find it incredible that Southam did not tell W. Taylor about the multiple grievances registered by the four employees in November. W. Taylor testified that Southam informed him that Hoendorf had confronted Logan about Saturday overtime 10 days before Hoendorf's layoff. W. Taylor also admitted that Southam had told him that Hoendorf confronted Logan in the customer service department about raises and evaluations. Certainly, if Southam reported to the president two confrontations of one employee with one supervisor, it strains credulity that he would not have reported the November meeting to the president, and outlined the multiple grievances presented to him by those four veteran employees. Southam was still working for the Respondent at the time of the hearing as a high supervisor, yet he was not called to testify. I therefore draw the inference that Respondent's unexplained failure to produce this witness was for the reaon that the witness' testimony would have been adverse to the Respondent. G.C. Murphy Co., 223 NLRB 604 (1976), enfd. 550 F.2d 1004 (4th Cir. 1977).

I also do not credit Alexander's testimony that it was not until late January that he learned from Logan that there was a problem about Saturday overtime pay. Alexander, by W. Taylor's own testimony, knew about it prior to Hoendorf's discharge, as Alexander discussed it with the president in a bar. As W. Taylor testified, when he asked what the problem about overtime was between Logan and Hoendorf, Alexander informed him that "Oh, that was just Jack getting at Paul."

Finally, W. Taylor's testimony as to his conversation with Hoendorf at the exit interview shows clearly that the president knew Hoendorf was engaged in concerted activity. When Hoendorf asked W. Taylor what he meant by his statement that he had a bad attitude, W. Taylor told him that he should not have confronted Logan about Saturday overtime in front of the other employees, and that his confrontations were creating a problem in front of everybody in the customer service department.

2. The General Counsel's proof

In applying the teachings of Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980), I find that the General Counsel has sustained his burden of establishing a prima facie case that Hoendorf's concerted activities motivated Respondent's decision to discharge him.

The evidence as set forth above clearly establishes that Hoendorf was engaged in concerted activities that were protected by Section 7 of the Act, from the time of the employees' meeting in November with Southam, through his December breakfast meeting with Logan, and including his several confrontations in the customer service department with Logan in January.

The record is also equally clear that the Respondent Employer had knowledge of Hoendorf's concerted activities, as Supervisors Southam and Logan knew about it, as well as Sales Manager Alexander, and also the president himself, William Taylor. Not only did Respondent, through its supervisors, have knowledge that Hoendorf was engaged in concerted activity, they also knew that he was the most vocal and aggressive spokesman of the four customer service representatives. The company officials knew that it was Hoendorf who kept alive and kept bringing up the group's November complaint, that the service department employees wanted some form of compensation for working on Saturdays. W. Taylor particularly resented Hoendorf bringing up the grievance on Saturday overtime as he showed in the exit interview when he told Hoendorf he had been wrong to bring up Saturday overtime in front of customer service employees.

The record is uncontested that Hoendorf was a competent service representative. Long, a veteran with 15 years with the Company, who with Runck was a most sincere and credible witness, testified that Hoendorf was very knowledgeable, a very good worker who made few mistakes. Runck, the other most credible witness, had 11 years of service as a service representative, 4 with the Respondent and 7 with a competitor. She testified that Hoendorf was "extremely good," that he helped her when she needed help, his technical skills were good, and he had a good rapport with the customers. Not one of Respondent's witnesses criticized Hoendorf's skills as a service representative. As to the one "messy" job on which Alexander stated that Hoendorf's attitude was bad, Hoendorf not only did this job, but was complimented by Alexander for his work.

The record also indicates that the Company had a relaxed policy as to the discharge of an employee. As Chairman of the Board Wilson wrote to Voight, only 10 nonunion employees had been discharged in the prior 50 years.

3. Respondent's reasons for the discharge

I turn now to the reasons offered by the Respondent for Hoendorf's discharge, to rebut the General Counsel's case. W. Taylor testified that it is the practice of the Respondent for the various departments to prepare a budget for the current quarter and year. When budget figures started coming in, in the first week of January 1981, it was obvious to him that there had been a tremendous swing in costs versus revenue in the customer service department. The president then determined that "Business was so bad," that it was necessary to reduce the force in the service department.[11] It was at this point that W. Taylor decided to lay Hoendorf off.

Thus, the evidence shows that Respondent's basic reason for terminating Hoendorf was because its revenues had gone down in the customer service department in the first week of the first quarter and, as forcefully stated by the president, "Business was awful."

Sales Manager Alexander supported the president's contention that business was bad by pointing out an equally bleak picture. He testified that in August the Company's markets were not only going down but dying. Then he testified that in, apparently, September, "We were down very, very badly and had been down really, for—for quite a while."

I do not find that Respondent's stated reasons for Hoendorf's discharge stand scrutiny. Although W. Taylor testified that business was so bad he had to discharge an employee, Respondent produced absolutely no records to support this contention. By the president's own testimony there were quarterly budgets and annual budgets. In addition, such an old, established corporation would have had numerous financial records such as annual statements, profit-and-loss statements, and tax records to substantiate the oral statements of W. Taylor and Alexander that business was awful. This failure of the Respondent to submit such documentary evidence causes me to believe that its financial records would not have supported its claim that revenues were down, costs were up, and business was bad.[12]

[11] W. Taylor admitted that the book department was working overtime and that Couch was looking for employees to hire in the composing room.

Respondent's running of advertisements in newspapers for service representatives following Hoendorf's discharge, and the hiring of two new employees, does not square with W. Taylor's and Alexander's claims that business was so bad it required the layoff of a service representative. While Respondent claimed that Rose was used as a librarian, he was also admittedly used for overload service representative work, as was the other newly hired employee, Rife. Alexander justified the hiring of these two new employees by stating that the Company was getting busier. However, this simply bears out Runck's testimony that the business was subject to slack periods.

It is also to be noted that the Respondent gave shifting and inconsistent reasons for Hoendorf's discharge. As Chairman Taylor testified, his son told him that the layoff was because Hoendorf would not cooperate with his fellow employees. Chairman Taylor in turn informed Art Director Voight that it was because Hoendorf was unhappy since he could not accept the Company's planning for reorganization.

The original reason that President Taylor gave Hoendorf for his discharge, because "we don't have any work down there" has been reviewed above and has been discredited. W. Taylor's further remarks to Hoendorf underpinning his basic reason, also do not stand scrutiny. As to Hoendorf's attitude, the Company's salesman from Toledo told Alexander that "We have constant battles with the service department as a whole." As to not getting along with Couch, all three other service representatives testified vehemently of their troubles with and dislike of Couch.

Finally, I find it incredible that President Taylor would wait from the spring of 1980 to January 1981 without telling Hoendorf that he did not like his attitude. According to W. Taylor, he had made his mind up in April, May, or June 1980, that he was going to let Hoendorf go, after he was uncooperative on a big job. Yet, prior to the date of discharge, he never expressed any dissatisfaction to Hoendorf, even though "sales were terrible" at the time Hoendorf was uncooperative. This failure to give any warning to Hoendorf is further evidence that the discharge was pretextual. Chicago Perforating Co., 147 NLRB 583 (1964).

From the foregoing I conclude that Respondent's stated reason for Hoendorf's discharge was a pretext, and that Respondent sought to disguise the true motive. When the asserted motive is not reasonable as I have so found herein, then that fact is evidence that the true motive for discharge is an unlawful one, which Respondent seeks to conceal.[13]

Finding that the alleged reason for Hoendorf's discharge was false, I infer that the true motive was because he was the principal spokesman for the service representatives in demanding compensation for working on Saturdays. W. Taylor himself touched on this reason at the exit interview when he told Hoendorf he had created a lot of friction in the Company. When asked what that meant, the president expressly pointed out that Hoendorf had "confronted Paul Logan in the service department in front of the other people concerning Saturday overtime." Section 7 of the Act gives Hoendorf the right to press that grievance with his supervisor. Accordingly, I find that Respondent's discharge of Hoendorf for engaging in protected concerted activity violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Farmland Soy Processing Co., 263 NLRB 237 (1982).

H. The 8(a)(1) and (4) Allegation[14]

The Facts

In the summer of 1981, after the charge was filed, Fugate was interviewed by a law student from the office of Respondent's counsel, and had given him a statement. On April 29, 1982, 5 days prior to the date of this hearing, Respondent's attorney Chester E. Finn came to the Company's conference room and met with Fugate. The attorney informed Fugate that he was representing the Company in the Hoendorf case, and that he was preparing for the trial. The attorney then reviewed with Fugate, the statement he had given to his law clerk in the previous summer. The attorney then asked Fugate if he had been interviewed by any representatives of the National Labor Relations Board. Fugate informed the attorney that he was interviewed by Schlectman of the NLRB, and that he had given her a written statement. Finn then asked Fugate if he would be willing to provide him with a copy of that statement. Fugate testified as follows:

> I asked you if it was legal. You said, "Sure." I said, "Well, is it also legal if the NLRB wants a copy of the statement I gave to the company?"
> And you said "Sure, there's nothing wrong with that."

Fugate did not have a copy of his affidavit at this April 29 meeting, and agreed to bring it in the next day, and have a copy made for Finn. On May 4, 1982, Finn again came to the plant. Here, Fugate responded to Logan's call, and took a copy of his affidavit to the office. After Finn and Fugate exchanged greetings, Fugate gave the attorney a copy of his copy of the affidavit, and the meeting then ended with no further conversation. Fugate, when asked if the attorney made any threats to him as to anything that might happen to him if he did not give a copy of his statement to Finn, replied, "Absolutely not." He further testified that he was willing to give the attorney a copy of his affidavit.

Discussion

The General Counsel contends that when the Respondent's attorney interrogated Fugate on April 29, and secured a copy of his affidavit on May 4, 1982, it violated Section 8(a)(1) and (4) of the Act, because it failed to comport with the criteria set forth in Johnnie's Poultry Co., 146 NLRB 770 (1964), in that its attorney did not assure Fugate that there would be no reprisals. Respondent, in its brief, candidly admits that no warnings were given to Fugate that there would be no reprisals against him for his actions. Respondent also correctly points out that the testimony shows that at both meetings of Fugate and Finn, the Company's attorney was pleasant and courteous at all times to Fugate.

The General Counsel basically relies on Board law as set forth in Johnnie's Poultry. In the recent case of Kyle & Stephen, 259 NLRB 731 (1981), the Board once again spelled out its long-held principles as to such interviews:

> Johnnie's Poultry requires that when an employer has legitimate cause to inquire into matters concerning an employee's Section 7 rights, such as in preparing the employer's defense in an unfair labor practice proceeding, the employer must follow specific guidelines in questioning the employee to avoid incurring 8(a)(1) liability. Among other requirements, an employer must tell the employee the purpose of the questions, assure the employee freedom from reprisal, and secure the employee's voluntary participation. These safeguards are designed to minimize the coercive impact of employer interrogation and, contrary to the Administrative Law Judge's suggestions, are applicable irrespective of the employer's intent to coerce, the extent of questioning or number of employees so interrogated, or the remoteness of the interrogation to alleged unlawful conduct.

Since the attorney did not adhere to the guideline of assuring Fugate that he would be free of reprisal, I must find that the Respondent's interrogation of Fugate by its attorney, and the attorney's request for a copy of the affidavit that Fugate had given to the Board, violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.[15]

Conclusions of Law

1. Dayton Typographical Service, Inc. is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. By discharging Jack A. Hoendorf on January 19, 1981, because of his engaging in protected concerted activities, the Company engaged in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

3. By interrogating Hoendorf concerning matters relating to a pending unfair labor practice case without observing necessary safeguards, and by asking for a copy of the affidavit he had given to the Board, the Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

Remedy

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I find it necessary to order it to cease and desist and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

The Respondent having unlawfully discharged Jack A. Hoendorf, I find it necessary to order it to offer him reinstatement and make him whole for lost earnings and other benefits, computed on a quarterly basis from date of discharge to date of proper offer of reinstatement, less any net interim earnings, in accordance with F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), plus interest as computed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977). See generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[16]

ORDER

The Respondent, Dayton Typographical Service, Inc., Dayton, Ohio, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Discharging any employees because they engaged in protected concerted activities for their mutual aid and protection.

(b) Asking its employees for copies of statements given by them to the National Labor Relations Board or interrogating them concerning any other information relating to pending unfair labor practice charges in a manner interfering with their rights guaranteed in Section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

---

[15] Respondent in its brief relies mainly on the case of Anserphone, Inc. v. NLRB, 632 F.2d 4 (6th Cir. 1980). When this case was before the Board, the Board found that the company had not observed the safeguards set forth in Johnnie's Poultry, when that employer had interrogated an employee, and asked an employee for a copy of the affidavit she had given to a Board agent. The Board thereupon found that the company had violated the Act. On appeal, the Sixth Circuit did not find the Employer's conduct to be violative of the Act, and refused the enforcement of this portion of the Board's decision. As previously stated administrative law judges are bound by decisions of the Board, until the Supreme Court reverses it. Respondent also cites the Board decision of United Merchants & Mfrs., 223 NLRB 689 (1976), as supporting its position. It is to be observed that in adopting the decision of the administrative law judge in that case, the Board noted that it did so pro forma, in the absence of exceptions to the administrative law judge's finding that interrogation in that case did not violate the Act.

[16] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

(a) Offer Jack A. Hoendorf immediate and full reinstatement to his former job or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed, and make him whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits he may have suffered as a result of the discrimination against him, in the manner set forth in the remedy section of the Decision.

(b) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(c) Expunge from its files any reference to the discharge of Jack A. Hoendorf on January 19, 1983, and notify him in writing that this has been done and that evidence of this unlawful discharge will not be used as a basis for future personnel action against him.

(d) Post at its plant in Dayton, Ohio, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[17] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 9, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

[17] If this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

WE WILL NOT ask employees for statements given by them to the National Labor Relations Board, or interrogate them concerning matters relating to any pending unfair labor practice case, without observing necessary safeguards.

WE WILL NOT discharge employees for engaging in concerted activities for their mutual aid and protection.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you in the National Labor Relations Act, as amended.

WE WILL offer Jack A. Hoendorf immediate and full reinstatement to his former job, or if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his former seniority or any privileges previously enjoyed and WE WILL make him whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits resulting from his discharge, less any net interim earnings, plus interest.

WE WILL expunge from our files any reference to the disciplinary discharge of Jack A. Hoendorf, on January 19, 1981, and WE WILL notify him that this has been done and that evidence of this unlawful discharge will not be used as a basis for future personnel actions against him.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN, HUNTER, AND DENNIS

On 29 December 1983 Administrative Law Judge William F. Jacobs issued the attached supplemental decision.[1] The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record[2] in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[3] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.[4]

A principal issue presented here is whether the Respondent made and discriminatees David and Susan Younce rejected a valid reinstatement offer, thereby tolling the Respondent's backpay obligation. Contrary to our dissenting colleague, we agree with the judge's finding that the Younces never unequivocally refused a valid offer.

Prior to their unlawful termination on 7 October 1976,[5] Susan and David Younce were employed as caretakers for the Eureka apartment complex managed by the Respondent. On 26 October the Younces received notice to quit the apartment that the Respondent had provided for them rent free. Two days later, Susan Younce filed an unfair labor practice charge against the Respondent.

Irwin Alterman, the Respondent's attorney, investigated the Younce allegations, concluded that they were meritorious, and recommended immediate settlement to the Respondent. Alterman and his client agreed to a settlement proposal for full backpay and reinstatement of the Younces to caretaker positions at a complex other than at the Eureka apartments. On the afternoon of 8 November, Alterman asked Board Agent Whiteman to relay to the Younces the Respondent's offer of reinstatement with backpay to a caretaker's job at the Respondent's Utica Green apartment complex, which was located 30–50 miles away from the Eureka complex. Whiteman then phoned Susan Younce and, according to Younce's credited testimony,[6] asked her, "If Mr. Seligman offered you your job back with backpay would you take it?" Younce replied, "No, I don't want to work there anymore. I don't even want to be around here anymore." Whiteman informed Alterman that the Younces did not want their jobs back. The Younces also apparently received a note from the Respondent asking them to report to work at the Utica Green apartment complex. They did not respond.

Meanwhile, about 5 or 6 November, Susan Younce called the Respondent and asked Scott Seligman, son of the Respondent's owner, if it would be possible for her and her family to obtain a lease and remain in the apartment. Seligman replied that there would not be any problem, but she would first have to drop the unfair labor practice charges against the Respondent. On the morning of 8 November, Susan Younce called Whiteman and told him she wanted to withdraw the charge. Whiteman advised against her doing so, but stated that, if she still wished to withdraw the charge, she would have to do it in writing. She then informed the Re-

[1] The Board's original Decision and Order is reported at 240 NLRB 110 (1979), enfd. 639 F.2d 307 (6th Cir. 1981).

[2] We shall grant the Respondent's motion to reopen the record and admit into evidence, only for purposes relating to the issue of whether the reinstatement offer communicated by Board Agent Whiteman was hypothetical in nature, copies of Whiteman's notes of phone conversations he had with the Respondent's attorney and with discriminatee Susan Younce and an internal memorandum that he wrote concerning the case.

Inasmuch as we have limited the admission of Whiteman's notes and memorandum to the issue of the reinstatement offer's nature, we shall deny the General Counsel's motion to reopen the record to introduce into evidence the affidavit of the General Counsel.

[3] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

We deny the Respondent's requests for oral argument because the record is sufficient to determine all issues presented.

[4] The judge found that the Respondent owed discriminatee Goold $1,860.50 in backpay to cover medical bills resulting from a work-connected injury. The record indicates, however, that Goold has failed to pay his medical bills. Under these circumstances, paying Goold for his medical expenses would constitute a windfall. We shall order instead that the Respondent reimburse directly BiCounty Hospital, Warren, Michigan, and Doctor John Barkay for medical services rendered Goold, thereby placing the parties in the same economic positions they would have been in had the Respondent not unlawfully discharged Goold.

We also adopt the judge's recommendation, made in response to the Respondent's motion, that an amended notice be substituted for the Board's original notice. The Respondent has apparently not yet complied with the notice requirements of the Board's original Order.

[5] All dates hereafter refer to 1976.

[6] The documents introduced into evidence pursuant to the Respondent's motion to reopen the record do not warrant reversing the judge's credibility finding that Whiteman made only a hypothetical offer of reinstatement. The same reasons stated by the judge for crediting Younce's testimony over prior affidavits apply to crediting that testimony over Whiteman's cursory notes and memorandum. In any event, Whiteman's notes, if credited, do not indicate rejection of the offer, but instead indicate that he communicated and Younce accepted the invalid offer to reinstate the discriminatees to another apartment complex.

spondent of her conversation with Whiteman and was told to contact Alterman.

On 10 November the Younces received an eviction notice. The next day, Susan Younce went to Alterman's office. The meeting started with Younce and Alterman discussing her conversations with Seligman about dropping the unfair labor practice charge in order to obtain a lease and to remain in the apartment with her family. Alterman then explained that she would have to give an affidavit about her attempts to drop the charge. He also offered to write a letter for her to the Board withdrawing the charge. Younce agreed to Alterman's requests and, at some point during the meeting, she informed Alterman that she and her husband did not want to be reinstated. Alterman composed the affidavit and the letter stating that Younce wished to withdraw the charge and had no desire to be reinstated. After reading over and making changes in the affidavit and letter, Younce signed both of them. She withdrew her charges with the Board, but a complaint later issued against the Respondent after her husband filed a charge.

The judge found that the Respondent did not make such a firm, unconditional offer of reinstatement sufficiently unequivocal as to toll backpay. He based this conclusion on the facts that: (1) the reinstatement offer received by Susan Younce from Board Agent Whiteman was hypothetical, and therefore did not provide her with the opportunity to make a considered choice whether to accept reinstatement;[7] (2) the Younces were offered similar but not equivalent jobs at the Respondent's Utica Green apartment complex, not the Eureka complex where they had worked prior to their unlawful discharge, and such offers of work at a different location and for different management are not sufficient to toll backpay;[8] and (3) the Respondent, by electing to convey its reinstatement offer through a Board agent instead of proffering it directly, is bound by any resulting confusion.[9]

We agree with the judge's findings for the reasons set forth in his decision. Because there is no credible evidence that the Respondent ever made a legitimate reinstatement offer to the Younces, it has failed to toll its backpay obligation. It is well settled that only when a proper offer is made and unequivocally rejected by the employees is the employer's backpay obligation tolled.[10]

Our dissenting colleague does not contend that the Younces ever received a valid reinstatement offer. Instead, he would depart from clear Board precedent by holding that Susan Younce's renunciation of intent to seek reinstatement or backpay in her 11 November meeting with Alterman waived the Respondent's obligation ever to make a reinstatement offer. We see no reason to make such a change in the law. As a wrongdoer, the Respondent bears the burden of remedying its unfair labor practices.[11] We impose no hardship by requiring that it meet that burden by making a clear, unequivocal, legitimate reinstatement offer even in the face of a discriminatee's apparent understanding and repudiation of the concept of reinstatement.

Moreover, we find, based on Younce's credible testimony, that the circumstances of the 11 November meeting between Younce and Alterman were such that she did not voluntarily renounce reinstatement. Younce went to Alterman under threat of immediate eviction from her apartment, a direct consequence of the Respondent's discrimination against her.[12] It is clear that Younce was intimidated by Alterman's demand at the meeting that she sign a letter and affidavit withdrawing the unfair labor practice charge if she wished to obtain a lease. Indeed, Younce credibly testified that she felt so pressured and nervous that she did not know what she was doing and that she just wanted to "get out of there." Accordingly, inasmuch as Younce's statement that she did not want to be reinstated was made under coercive circumstances, we find that it was not binding.

Inasmuch as the Respondent failed to proffer a specific offer of reinstatement at the same location to the Younces and the Younces did not voluntarily reject such a proper offer, we find that the Respondent's backpay obligations to the Younces have not been tolled.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, Seligman & Associates, Inc. and its wholly owned Division, Scott Management Company, Southfield, Michigan, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall pay Clarence Goold, [12] The dissent treats this encounter as a benign, business-like affair, arranged for "Younce's own purposes, i.e., to withdraw the charge and to obtain a lease." Indeed, Younce did desire a lease; otherwise, she and her family faced immediate eviction from the apartment house which they had occupied as a term and condition of the Respondent's employment. Simply put, Younce would not have needed a lease if the Respondent had not unlawfully discharged her. As the law of this case, the discharge was coercive. It is fallacious to suggest that the meeting to obtain a lease as a direct consequence of such coercion was itself devoid of coercion.

David Younce, and Susan Younce the sums set out in the Order as modified.

1. Insert the following paragraph between the first and second paragraphs of the Order.

"The Respondent shall reimburse BiCounty Hospital, Warren, Michigan, $1200 and Doctor John Barkay $660.50 for medical services rendered Clarence Goold for injuries suffered while in the employment of the Respondent."

2. Substitute the attached notice for that of the Board in its original Decision and Order reported at 240 NLRB 110 (1979).

MEMBER HUNTER, dissenting.

I disagree with my colleagues' adoption of the judge's reinstatement order and backpay findings with respect to Susan and David Younce. The judge found that the Respondent did not make a firm, unconditional offer of reinstatement to the Younces sufficient to toll backpay. On this basis, the judge found that the Younces' backpay period commenced on the date of their discharge, 7 October 1976, and is not yet over as they have never been offered reinstatement. Contrary to the judge and my colleagues, I would find that backpay for the Younces was tolled as of 11 November 1976 when they voluntarily rejected employment with the Respondent. In view of the Younces' clear and unequivocal rejection of employment, in my opinion, it is not necessary to determine whether the Board agent, on behalf of the Respondent, communicated a proper reinstatement offer, an inquiry pursued by the judge. Rather, I believe, it is sufficient that the record clearly shows that Susan Younce had been apprised of what reinstatement meant before she gave the rejection to the Respondent. Contrary to my colleagues in the majority, I would not require an employer in this situation to simply extend a futile offer of reinstatement literally only "for the record."

Based on uncontradicted record evidence, which the judge improperly failed to include in his factual recitation, I would find that Susan Younce, on behalf of herself and her husband, rejected employment and tolled backpay as of 11 November 1976. The record clearly shows that both Susan Younce and the Respondent's attorney Alterman testified that, in their meeting held on 11 November 1976, Susan Younce voluntarily said that she did not want her job back. Since the Younces were hired and fired as a caretaker couple, I would find that Susan Younce's rejection included her husband's job. It is obvious that Susan Younce knew the import of her rejection. In her conversation with Board Agent Whiteman on 8 November 1976, Susan Younce was given an adequate explanation as to what reinstatement entailed. As shown by the record, it was in this conversation that Susan Younce first announced that she and her husband did not want their jobs. Thus, I would permit the Respondent to rely on Susan Younce's rejection of employment for her and her husband. I find this result is further supported by the fact that the Respondent had outstanding a reinstatement offer to the Younces which the Board agent had said was communicated to and rejected by Susan Younce.

My colleagues in the majority claim that Younce's unsolicited refusal of employment with the Respondent communicated to the Respondent's attorney was made under "coercive circumstances" and, thus, should not be held binding on the Younces. I disagree. As far as the record shows, the meeting with the Respondent's attorney was conducted in accord with Younce's own purposes, i.e., to withdraw the charge and to obtain a lease. The impetus for the meeting had been Younce's own desire to obtain a lease and withdraw the pending charge. Younce apparently was experiencing difficulty withdrawing her charge on her own. Without disputing these facts, the majority has adopted a per se definition of coercion. In the majority's view, this meeting with Susan Younce automatically was coercive simply because one of the subjects discussed was a benefit lost as a result of the Younces' discharge, i.e., the use of a townhouse at the complex where the Younces worked. Under the majority's definition of coercion, any meeting between an employee and his employer to discuss the effects of an unlawful discharge, including settlement conferences between an employee and his employer to discuss any wages, benefits, or privileges lost through an unlawful discharge, is coercive irrespective of the factual circumstances surrounding such meetings. I cannot accept such a far-reaching approach.

I point out that Younce's rejection of employment was not a quick reaction on her part. The record shows that she had arrived at this decision several days earlier and had first communicated her decision in the conversation with Board Agent Whiteman. Younce's own testimony indicates that she was not "coerced" by Whiteman to reject employment; rather, to the contrary, it appears that Whiteman strongly tried to persuade her to accept employment or at least a backpay settlement but was unsuccessful in his efforts.

I also cannot agree with the majority opinion's handling of Goold's medical expenses. The judge recommended that the Respondent be ordered to pay Goold directly for his medical bills which would have been covered by the Respondent's insurance plan but for Goold's unlawful discharge. However, to date Goold has not been required to pay these medical bills which were incurred in 1976 and 1977. The Respondent has only excepted to the direct payment to Goold for these medical expenses. Due to the age of these bills, the Respondent claims that collection may be barred by the applicable state statute of limitations and Goold may never be liable for these expenses. To meet this concern, the majority orders the Respondent to directly pay the health care providers who rendered the medical services. I cannot accept my colleagues' approach as sufficient in these circumstances. Instead, I would only order the Respondent to indemnify Goold if any collection action on these bills is instituted. In this way, the Respondent is permitted to pursue its available defenses to a collection action and Goold is held harmless. This kind of remedy, in my view, is more consistent with the aim of the Board's remedial powers to make the discriminatee whole for his out-of-pocket expenses. For all the reasons stated above, I therefore dissent.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

WE WILL NOT interfere with our employees' rights under Section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act, or discourage membership in Local 79, Service Employees International Union, AFL–CIO, or any other labor organization, by discharging or otherwise discriminating against our employees in regard to hire or tenure of employment or any other term or condition of employment.

WE WILL NOT coercively interrogate or threaten our employees, or prohibit them from talking to new employees about the Union.

WE WILL NOT transfer, promote, or reclassify our employees in an attempt to gerrymander the unit in an NLRB election.

WE WILL NOT threaten to discharge our employees for testifying at an NLRB hearing.

WE WILL NOT in any other manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce our employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL offer David Younce and Susan Younce full, immediate, and unconditional reinstatement to their former jobs or, if their jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent jobs, without prejudice to their seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed; and WE WILL make them whole for any loss of pay suffered by reason of the discrimination against them, with interest.

WE WILL reimburse BiCounty Hospital and Doctor John Barkay for medical services rendered Clarence Goold as a result of a work-connected accident.

WE HAVE made Larry Davis, Ricky Davis, Charles Davis, Mark Rushing, Harold Dodson, and Madeline Dodson whole for any loss of pay suffered by reason of the discrimination against them, in accordance with the settlement agreement entered into by the parties at the backpay hearing in the instant proceeding.

WE HAVE made unconditional offers of reinstatement to Larry Davis, Ricky Davis, Charles Davis, Mark Rushing, Harold Dodson, and Madeline Dodson and these offers have been refused.

SELIGMAN & ASSOCIATES, INC. AND ITS WHOLLY OWNED DIVISION, SCOTT MANAGEMENT COMPANY

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION

WILLIAM F. JACOBS, Administrative Law Judge. This is a supplemental proceeding to determine the amount of medical compensation due Clarence Goold and the amount of backpay due David and Susan May Younce, who were found to be discriminatees, unlawfully terminated by Respondent, in a greviously held unfair labor practice hearing.[1] The instant proceeding was held before me on June 6, 7, 9, and 10, 1983, at Detroit, Michigan, based on the amended backpay specification which issued April 26, 1983, and on the amended backpay specification which issued April 26, 1983, and Respondent's answer filed May 2, 1983. All parties were afforded opportunity to participate in the hearing, to present evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, and to argue orally. Briefs were filed by the parties.

FINDINGS OF FACT

The Issues

1. Whether Clarence Goold should be compensated for the medical expenses he incurred as a result of an accident in which he was involved while an employee of Respondent, and if so in what amounts.

2. Whether David and Susan May Younce should receive backpay and if so how much. The subissues are:[2]

(a) Whether David and Susan Younce recieved and rejected a proper reinstatement offer when Seligman's counsel made the offer through Board Agent Whiteman.

(b) Whether the Younces are estopped from seeking backpay.

(c) Whether the amounts due the Younces, as reflected by the backpay specification, are correct.

---

[1] The Decision and Order of the Board pursuant to which this hearing was held is reported 240 NLRB 110 (1979), enfd. 639 F.2d 307 (6th Cir. 1981); cert. denied Oct. 5, 1981.

[2] These are also the issues raised in Respondent's brief.

(d) Whether the notice to employees which the Board has ordered posted should be revised to delete reference to reinstatement and backpay.

1. Clarence Goold

Clarence Goold, while employed by Respondent, was involved in an automobile accident on December 19, 1976. At the time of the accident he was engaged in the performance of work-connected duties. As a result of the accident Goold suffered injuries which required medical attention and hospitalization as well as attendant expenses. The total expenses incurred were $1860.50, $1200 of which was attributable to hospitalization which was undergone in April 1977, the rest of which were doctor bills for office visits between December 22, 1976, and August 11, 1977; physiotherapy undergone during the same period; injections, oral medication, and other tests, all accident connected, according to the credited testimony of Goold, supported by a doctor's bill presented at the hearing by Goold. No bill was presented for the $1200 hospitalization[3] which Goold credibly testified he had undergone in April 1977.

Goold credibly testified that while he and his wife were employed as a caretaker couple by Respondent they were covered by a medical and hospitalization plan provided by Respondent and that they had received benefits under the plan in 1976 when his wife became pregnant and all maternity costs including both hospitalization and doctor's bills were paid for through the plan even up to within 2 months of Goold's termination. It is the General Counsel's position that but for Goold's unlawful termination the hospitalization and doctor's bills suffered as a result of his December 19 automobile accident would have been paid by Respondent's insurance plan.

The burden is on the General Counsel in backpay cases to show losses suffered by a discriminatee and reflect those losses in a backpay specification. The burden is on a respondent in this type of case to prove diminution of such losses whether the diminution is the result of interim earnings, failure of the discriminatee reaonably to search for interim employment, unavailability for employment, or of other factors.[4]

In the instant proceeding the General Counsel relies principally on Goold's testimony and the supporting doctor's bill to prove Goold's claim. As noted above, I found Goold to be a credible witness and would rely on his testimony unless Respondent presented evidence to undermine that credibility or evidence to indicate a proper diminution of the total sum of his claim.

Respondent, in presenting its case, did not challenge Goold's testimony that prior to his discharge he and his wife received benefits covering her pregnancy in 1976 including payment of hospitalization and doctor's bills. Since his testimony on this matter went unrefuted, I find that Goold was, in fact, covered by a hospitalization plan prior to his discharge.

Respondent presented only one witness to testify concerning Goold's claim. This was Mary Newkirk, Respondent's assistant controller. But Newkirk was not hired until approximately 2-1/2 years after Goold's accident and discharge and so had no firsthand information concerning the existence or nonexistence of insurance coverage for caretaker couples. Newkirk was asked, in preparation for the instant proceeding, to examine certain files to determine if they contained any reference to any 1976 insurance coverage for caretaker couples. She found none. No explanation was offered as to why Respondent did not call the member of management in charge of such matters in 1976 to testify concerning the matter, nor why one or more caretaker couples employed in 1976 were not called to testify concerning insurance coverage at the time. I find Respondent's choice of Newkirk to testify[5] and its failure to call any knowledgeable witness to testify on the matter were apparent attempts to stonewall on the issue. I draw the adverse inference that if Respondent called knowledgeable management witnesses to testify, their testimony would be contrary to the interest of Respondent. I shall rely on the credible testimony of Goold[6] and find that he was covered at the time of his accident by an insurance plan paid for by Respondent and that but for his unlawful discharge the hospitalization and doctor's bills resulting from injuries sustained by him due to the accident would have been paid by Respondent.[7] Such moneys due are correctly listed in the General Counsel's amended backpay specification.[8]

2. Susan and David Younce

Susan and David Younce were unlawfully terminated by Respondent on October 7, 1976.[9] Before termination both received compensation for their work in the form of separate checks every 2 weeks plus the use for them and their three children of a townhouse located at the complex where they were employed. Following their termination the Younce family continued to occupy the same townhouse apartment which they had lived in while employed by Respondent.

On October 26, a notice to quit issued requiring the Younces to abandon their apartment. Two days later, Susan Younce filed the charge in Case 7-CA-13451 alleging the discriminatory discharge of her and her husband. Shortly after the charge was filed, Irwin Alterman, Respondent's attorney, investigated the circumstances surrounding the allegations contained in the charge and [3] According to Goold, the hospitalization was for about 10 days. The doctor's bill reflects that Goold made 27 office visits: 4 in December 1976, 8 in January, 2 in February, 1 in March, none in April during which month he was hospitalized, 3 in May, 4 in June, 3 in July and 2 in August.

[5] Newkirk testified as to the existence of a 1978 insurance plan covering salaried employees. I find this testimony irrelevant.

[6] Respondent did not avail himself of his right to subpoena either individuals or documents in connection with Goold's hospitalization or doctor's bills though the names of the hospital and doctor who treated Goold were discussed on the record.

[7] Additional arguments as to why Respondent should not be required to pay these sums, outlined in Respondent's brief, I find to be without merit.

determined that they were meritorious. He advised Respondent of his findings and recommended immediate settlement to the Younces with full backpay. His client agreed. Alterman, however, suggested that the Younces be offered caretaker positions at an apartment complex other than Eureka, the one at which they had been employed and at which they had lived prior to their discharge. He did this because it was his understanding that they had been having trouble with the resident manager at Eureka. Again, Respondent's management agreed to Alterman's suggestion.

Having received the agreement of his client, Alterman contacted Board Agent Whiteman, the individual assigned to handle the case for Region 7. By telephone, Alterman advised Whiteman that Respondent would offer the Younces their jobs back with full backpay, less interim earnings. Being more specific, he told Whiteman that the Younces would be offered a caretaker couple's position in one of Respondent's Utica apartment complexes. Utica is located 30–50 miles away from the Eureka complex where the Younces were living and working for Respondent prior to their unlawful discharge. Alterman requested that Whiteman communicate the offer to the Younces.[10] Whiteman ageed to do so.

Following[11] the discussion between Alterman and Whiteman, a telephone conversation took place between Susan Younce and Whiteman during which Whiteman asked Younce a question concerning possible reinstatement. According to the credited testimony of Younce,[12] Whiteman asked her, "If Mr. Seligman offered you your job back with backpay, would you take it?" Younce replied, "No, I don't want to work there anymore. I don't even want to be around here anymore." Whiteman rejoined, "You know you could get your backpay without taking your job back," and Younce simply said, "Fine!" Some time after this discussion, Whiteman called Alterman and advised him that the Younces did not want their jobs back.

Meanwhile, about November 5 or 6, Susan Younce, having received the notice to quit, and her husband and three children being sick with the flu, decided to contact Respondent directly. She called Scott Seligman, son of Respondent's owner, and told him of the illness in her family. She asked him if it would be possible for her and her family to obtain a lease and remain in the apartment, to get the apartment fixed up, and to stay there as rent paying tenants. Seligman replied that there would be no problem granting her request but that she would first have to drop the unfair labor practice charges which she had filed against Respondent.[13]

About November 8, Susan Younce called Whiteman and told him that she wanted to withdraw the charges. Whiteman advised her against doing so because she had a strong case. Susan explained to Whiteman that all she wanted to do was get a lease for her apartment and that Seligman had told her that, if she dropped the charges against Respondent, she could have the lease. Whiteman stated if she wanted to withdraw the charges, she would have to do so in writing.

Following her discussion with Whiteman, Susan Younce again called Seligman and told him that she had tried to drop the charges with the Board but that Whiteman would not let her because she had too strong a case. Seligman advised her to contact the Board again and have Whiteman send her a withdrawal request form to sign. He also told her to go to Alterman's office to sign a lease for her to remain in her apartment as a rent-paying tenant.

Subsequently, Seligman, or someone from his office, contacted Alterman and told him that Susan Younce was trying to drop the unfair labor practice charges but that the Board would not permit her to do so. Alterman was than asked to meet with Susan Younce and review the situation. In accordance with his client's request, Alterman made arrangements for Kathy LaFrance, the wife of Eureka's resident manager, to transport Susan Younce to his office for a meeting to discuss the situation, said meeting to take place November 11.

On November 10 an eviction notice issued against David and Susan Younce and on November 11 she was driven to Alterman's office in accordance with arrangements made earlier by Alterman. Once in Alterman's office Younce and Alterman discussed the events of the previous week, particularly discussions which had taken place between herself and Whiteman concerning her desire to drop the charge and between herself and Seligman concerning her desire to obtain a lease and remain in the apartment with her sick family.[14] Following Younce's description of events, Alterman explained that he would need an affidavit from her regarding her attempts to withdraw the charge, that he needed this for his files, and that it was necessary for her to supply an affidavit to enable her to obtain the lease. He then asked her if she would supply such an affidavit and she agreed to do so. Alterman then asked Younce what she intended to do about the written withdrawal request which Whiteman had demanded of her and offered to compose a letter for her. She agreed to this also, whereupon Alterman dictated both an affidavit and letter which were subsequently typed in draft by one of his clericals. When the drafts were ready they were presented to Younce for review. Alterman directed Younce to look over both documents and to point out any words which she did not ordinarily use. She pointed out several such words and these were changed. He then requested that Younce read through the letter to make sure it sounded as though she had composed it, that it was in her own words. She did this, after which Alterman asked her if the documents were accurate. She said they were and they were then typed in final form. Alterman then requested Younce to [10] On November 9 Alterman forwarded to Whiteman a confirming letter in which he offered reinstatement to Susan Younce to a job in Utica with backpay. Although Susan Younce was specifically named in this letter in two places, David Younce was not so named. Nor were "the Younces" named as such. The letter clearly indicates an offer to reinstate only Susan.

[11] The date is not clear from the record.

[12] Whiteman did not testify.

sign both documents. She did so and was driven home by Kathy LaFrance.

Younce credibly testified concerning this meeting in Alterman's office, "I was supposed to go there to get a lease and instead, I got these [the affidavit[15] and withdrawal letter[16]] . . . . Now I'm a little bit calm about it, but when this was taking place I was nervous and upset and I don't think I was in the right [frame of] mind to really know what I was doing. I went to [Alterman's] office for a lease and I ended up having to do all this. I felt pressured in [his] office when I wrote it for one thing, and I said, 'Yes, it is okay,' and I signed it just to get out of there." On November 12 the withdrawal of the charge in Case 7–CA–13451 was approved. The same allegations were, however, included in a charge subsequently filed by David Younce in April 1977.

The Alleged Reinstatement Offer

Respondent takes the position that the above-described set of circumstances reflects a legitimate offer of reinstatement to the Younces by means of the offer made by Alterman through Whiteman to Susan Younce. After reviewing the facts as described above, I find that Respondent did not make such a firm, unconditional offer of reinstatement, sufficiently unequivocal as to toll backpay. I arrive at this conclusion based on the following:

(1) The offer received by Susan Younce from Board Agent Whiteman was hypothetical in nature. It was delivered in the form of a question: "If Mr. Seligman offered you your job back with backpay, would you take it?" The Board has held that a hypothetical offer such as this is not a sufficient offer of reinstatement so as to toll backpay because the employee must be given sufficient time to consider an offer made in positive terms.[17] Only when a proper offer is made and is unequivocally rejected by the employer is the employee relieved of his statutory duty to reinstate.[18] In the instant case, no proper offer of reinstatement was offered to the Younces and they were therefore not bound by Susan Younce's unconsidered statement that she did not "want to work there anymore" because she had not been given sufficient opportunity to manifest an unequivocal resolve not to accept reinstatement.[19]

(2) The Younces were never offered reinstatement to the positions they held at the Eureka complex from which they were unlawfully terminated. Rather, they were offered similar, but not equivalent, jobs at Utica, a complex 30–50 miles away. The offer of a position at a different location, working for a different management, is not an offer of reinstatement sufficient to warrant the tolling of backpay. An employee who has already suffered the effects of a discriminatory discharge has no duty to assume additional hardships to reduce the employer's backpay liability.[20]

(3) Respondent chose not to deal directly with the Younces although it wrote letters directly to other discriminatees offering them their jobs back. The case law holds that an employer who chooses to offer reinstatement to discriminatorily discharged employees, through third parties rather than directly does so at his own risk and, if such indirect communication results in confusion, it is the employer who should suffer thereby, not the innocent discriminatee. This is so for two reasons. First, because but for respondent's discriminatory act the problem would never have arisen and, secondly, but for choice of agent, the confusion would never have arisen.[21]

I find, in short, that Respondent did not make, and has not made the specific, unequivocal, and unconditional offer of reinstatement necessary to toll the backpay period.[22]

The Estoppel Theory

Respondent argues that the Board and the Younces should be estopped from claiming that the offer made through Alterman via Whiteman to Susan Younce was invalid because Respondent acted reasonably and relied on the Board's agent and the Younces at the time. I have found, however, that the offer which Alterman attempted to make to Susan Younce through Whiteman, i.e., employment in Utica, was not the specific, unequivocal, and unconditional offer of reinstatement which is required in order to toll backpay. That being the case, the question of estoppel is not relevant and I recommend rejection of Respondent's theory for that reason.

The Amounts of Backpay

Respondent argues that the Younces incurred a willful loss of employment when they turned down the job at Utica, which Respondent claims is substantially equivalent employment. I have found, however, that the job in Utica never was offered to the Younces except hypothetically. Since the Utica job never was actually offered, I find no willful loss of earnings in connection with said hypothetical offer.

Respondent asserts further that the Younces did not search for substantially equivalent employment following their unlawful discharge. Respondent points out that the Younces had only intermittent, low-paying employment following their discharge "not comparable to their former positions." This is true and, if it were otherwise, if the Younces had immediately found steady, better paying jobs than they had while working for Respondent, they would not be seeking backpay through the instant process and I would not be writing this decision. However, it is Respondent who placed them in their predicament and there is no evidence in the record to show that the Younces turned down high-paying jobs in favor of the lower paying employment which they accepted. On the contrary, the record indicates through the backpay specification and additional testimony that following their unlawful discharges the Younces obtained employment with approximately 20 different employers between them and unsuccessfully sought employment with many others. The record reflects no willful loss of employment with regard to these jobs. Inasmuch as the law requires only a reasonable effort to find employment, I find that the record reflects that the Younces met that burden during the period following their discharge by Respondent.

[15] The content of the affidavit and of Younce's description of events as they pertained to the events of the previous several days differ markedly. I credit Younce's live testimony at the hearing over the content of the affidavit, primarily based on Younce's explanation of why such differences exist. The factual description of events contained in this section of the decision are based on Susan Younce's convincing and credited testimony.

[16] Where the content of Younce's live testimony differs from that of the withdrawal letter, composed by Alterman and signed by Younce, I credit Younce's live testimony.

Respondent correctly points out in its brief that during the pertinent period between 1976 and 1983 there were numerous ads in the Detroit newspapers for caretaker couples but that the Younces did not avail themselves of the opportunities presented by applying for these positions. Since they did not do so, Respondent argues that they did not make reasonable search for equivalent employment. All this is true as far as it goes. However, there is no requirement that a discriminatee consult the newspaper classified ads to seek employment. Nor is there evidence that the Younces were qualified for any of the jobs advertised nor, if qualified, would have been hired.[23]

Moreover, let us consider Respondent's argument in light of the particular circumstances of the instant case. The Younces participated in certain protected activities while employed by Respondent. Respondent not only unlawfully terminated them from engaging in these activities but undertook to dispossess them from their apartment as a part of the discriminatory retaliation against them. This was at a time when David Younce and the children were seriously ill. Susan Younce testified credibly that she did not look for a similar position at the time because she "didn't want to get involved in that." By this statement, it seems quite clear that Susan Younce meant that having been placed in the position by Respondent of being put out in the street with her family solely because she chose to engage in protected concerted activity, she was not about to make the same mistake again. I find that under the circumstances the Younces acted reasonably in seeking employment other than as a caretaker couple. Moreover, where does the Act say that once an employee is discriminatorily terminated from a particular job, that he must remain in that specific type of employment in perpetuity. Indeed he need not necessarily do so.[24] To make such a finding in the instant case would reward Respondent for its discriminatory act and punish the Younces by keeping them from exercising their freedom of choice of employment which all other individuals who are not discriminatees are free to exercise. I find that the Younces acted reasonably in searching for alternative types of employment following their unlawful discharge by Respondent.

Respondent argues that by moving out of the Detroit area Susan Younce made herself unavailable for work because she no longer had babysitters on whom she could rely while she went to work. This argument appears to beg the question since before she was unlawfully discharged she had an apartment provided free of charge at the site of her employment so that she could both mind her children, easily find babysitters, and earn a wage at the same time. Respondent is not relieved of the requirement of paying Susan Younce backpay because she did not manage to duplicate the situation ante. Moreover, a discriminatee is free to seek job opportunities in other areas than the one where the discriminatory discharge took place and still be entitled to backpay.[25]

Respondent argues that Susan Younce was periodically unavailable for work for medical reasons. Respondent relies on a National Labor Relations Board backpay form[26] which Susan Younce filled out in July 1981. On this form Younce noted that she left her job at Shield's Restaurant in February 1979 due to surgery and left her job at Dorchester Nursing Center for 2 months in 1981 also due to surgery. There being no testimony in the record to counter the documentary evidence offered by Respondent, proper deductions should be made for the periods of illness noted.[27]

Finally, Respondent claims that in the aforementioned form[28] Susan Younce admitted that she was not in the job market between November 1977 and May 1978 because during that period she lived nearly 20–25 miles from town, her car broke down, and there was no local employment. However, case law[29] indicates that loss of interim employment due to lack of transportation through no fault of the discriminatee does not amount to a willful loss of employment and is not a basis for reducing backpay. Similarly, during certain periods of time where Susan Younce had available to her only split shift work at a great distance from her home, which required a great deal of time going back and forth, and the cost of transportation and of hiring a babysitter was greater than the remuneration received for holding down that job, I find Susan Younce's decision to quit her job a reasonable one and not such as to reflect a willful loss of employment.[30] Indeed, inasmuch as she had neither transportation nor babysitting problems prior to her unlawful discharge by Respondent, I see no basis for diminishing the backpay due her to the benefit of Respondent because of personal difficulties totally ascribable to Respondent's unfair labor practices.

In short, I have found no reasonable basis for diminishing the amount of backpay due, based on Respondent's claim that the discriminatees failed to meet their obligation to seek out and hold interim employment. I do find a basis for diminishing the total amount due to the incapaciting illness of Susan Younce.

In accordance with the above reasoning I find the backpay due David and Susan Younce to be as follows:

The Notice

Inasmuch as I have found that Respondent never made a proper offer of reinstatement to David or Susan Younce, its motion to revise the notice is denied with respect to these two discriminatees. With respect to Respondent's motion to revise the notice with regard to the offer of reinstatement to Clarence Goold,[41] Larry Davis, Rickey Davis, Charles Davis, Mark Rushing, Harold Dodson, and Madeline Dodson, the motion is granted to the extent reflected in the notice attached hereto.[42]

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[43]

[31] The $180.76 biweekly pay times 26 equals $4699.76 annual wage divided by 12 equals $391.65 per month wage times $2.77 monthly period equals $1084.87 for the quarter. Since the Younces remained in their apartment throughout this period without paying rent, rental benefits are not included.

[32] The $391.65 per month wages times 3 equals $1174.95 quarterly backpay.

[33] The $1174.95 quarterly backpay plus $476.97 (3 times monthly apartment benefit, $158.99 equals $1651.92. The Younces were evicted in March according to the credited testimony of David Younce.

[34] Total net backpay due David Younce as of the end of the first quarter 1983. Backpay continues to run thereafter inasmuch as no proper offer of reinstatement has been made by Respondent to David Younce.

[35] The $108.33 monthly pay times $2.77 months.

[36] Contrary to Respondent's position, I find, for reasons stated supra, that Susan Younce did not sustain a willful loss of interim employment during this period.

[37] Ibid.

[38] Ibid.

[39] Two months out of work due to surgery.

[40] Total net backpay due Susan Younce as of the end of the first quarter 1983. Backpay continues to run thereafter inasmuch as no proper offer of reinstatement has been made.

[41] Clarence Goold is not entitled to reinstatement.

[42] Cf. Charles H. McCauley Associates, 266 NLRB 649 (1983).

[43] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

ORDER

The Respondent, Seligman & Associates, Inc., Detroit, Michigan, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns shall pay to David Younce and Susan Younce, in accordance with the above computations the sums of $22,947.37 and $4610.59, respectively.[44] Interest is to be computed in the manner prescribed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977) (see also Isis Plumbing, 138 NLRB 716 (1962).) There should be deducted from the amount due any tax withholding required by Federal and state law.

The attached notice as Appendix A has been amended to reflect that Respondent has offered reinstatement to certain discriminatees and has entered into a settlement agreement to make them whole for the losses incurred by them due to Respondent's unlawful acts. The amended notice is to be posted in lieu of the original notice under the same conditions required by the Board in its original order.[45]

Montgomery Ward & Company, Incorporated and Joseph F. Steele. Case 32–CA–2797

14 December 1984

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN, HUNTER, AND DENNIS

On 8 October 1981 Administrative Law Judge David G. Heilbrun issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed a reply brief. On 16 December 1982 the National Labor Relations Board remanded the proceeding to the judge for additional findings of fact and credibility resolutions. On 24 May 1983 the judge issued the attached supplemental decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed a brief in support of the supplemental decision.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision, the supplemental decision, and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

The judge found that the Respondent's investigatory interview of Joseph Steele on 23 May 1980[1] was conducted in accord with the principles set forth in NLRB v. J. Weingarten, 420 U.S. 251 (1975), and did not violate Section 8(a)(1). We disagree.

Many of the facts concerning the Respondent's 23 May interview of Steele were undisputed. The parties disagreed, however, on certain key issues.[2] Certain of these issues were the subject of the Board's remand order. A compilation of the credited evidence follows.

On 23 May Work Supervisor Joe Beggs took Steele, an 11-year warehouse employee of the Respondent, to one of the Respondent's offices.[3] There Security and Safety Manager Roger Peterson and Chief Investigator Melvin Lee asked Steele to sign a "Consent to Interview" form.[4] Steele signed the document. Peterson then interrogated Steele about the alleged theft of company property.

Early in the interview Steele asked that his "work supervisor" be allowed into the interview.[5] Peterson denied Steele's request, stating that he could not see anyone and that a tape recording[6] of the interview would serve as his protection.[7]

Peterson continued to interrogate Steele for more than 2 hours. During the interview, Steele was accused of stealing property from the warehouse. Steele denied the charge. As the interrogation continued, the Respondent made several references to possible police involvement. At some point the Respondent handed Steele a merchandise catalog and told him to leaf through it. As he did so, Peterson noted certain items contained on pages at which Steele hesitated. Peterson then presented Steele with the list of merchandise, stating that Steele's hesitation demonstrated that he had stolen the listed items.

Peterson totaled the costs for the listed items and told Steele that, if he admitted his guilt and paid for the items totaling $170.66, he might save his job. Steele signed a statement admitting his guilt and agreed to pay for the items. Steele was sent home. On the following workday, Steele presented the Respondent with a check for $170.66. He was then discharged. Contrary to the judge, we find the Respondent denied Steele his Weingarten rights and, consequently, violated Section 8(a)(1).

The Supreme Court's Weingarten decision sets forth several basic principles relevant to the instant case. First, Weingarten applies to investigatory interviews that an employee reasonably believes

[1] All dates refer to 1980 unless otherwise stated.

[2] Steele was the only person to testify at the hearing. The remainder of the record is documentary evidence, including Steele's pretrial affidavit and two grievance letters he submitted to the Respondent. Discrepancies between Steele's testimony and the documents required credibility resolutions.

[3] The parties substantially agree about what transpired during the interview. The dispute centers on the interpretation of the "facts" and their legal implications.

[4] The form provided:

> I agree that representatives at Montgomery Ward & Co., Inc., may interview me, commencing from the time designated below [11:37 a.m.] on matters relating to company business.
> It is fully understood that I am free to leave this interview at any time I so desire.

[5] In his original decision, the judge limited his analysis to the finding that Steele had asked to be represented by a "supervisor," within the meaning of Sec. 2(11) of the Act, and the conclusion that a request for such a person was insufficient to invoke Weingarten protections. Because we believed the Respondent's reply to Steele's request to be crucial, we remanded the case to the judge for appropriate findings.

[6] At the hearing the Respondent conceded that part of the interview was taped. Counsel for the Respondent, however, stated that the tape was lost.

[7] We would have preferred that the judge provided us a more precise statement of the Respondent's reply to Steele's request than is contained in the supplemental decision. The judge, however, did specifically find that the Respondent replied "in a general sense any device that could record and thus perpetuate spoken words would be representative of the exchange then underway and intended to be continued." In addition, the judge specifically found in his original decision, and implicitly found in the supplemental decision, that Steele's grievance letters most accurately recited the 23 May events. In each of these letters, as well as in his oral testimony and pretrial affidavit, Steele stated that his request met with a denial, the statement that he could not see anyone, and that the tape recording would serve as his protection. Accordingly, we specifically credit Steele's testimony concerning the Respondent's reply to his request.

may result in his or her discipline.[8] Such an interview occurred here. Secondly, the employee subjected to the interview must request representation. Third, when presented with a request, the employer must either grant the request, present the employee with the option of continuing the interview unrepresented or forgoing the interview altogether, or deny the request and terminate the interview. The second and third principles require examination here.

As stated above, Steele requested the presence of his "work supervisor" at the interview. The Respondent denied his request, stating that he could not see anyone and that a tape recorder would serve as his protection. The judge found that, because a supervisor is not a representative within the meaning of Weingarten, Steele's request was "sterile" and insufficient to invoke the Weingarten protections. The judge erred in analyzing the efficacy of Steele's request without reference to the Respondent's reply.

In determining whether an employee's request is sufficient to invoke Weingarten protections, the Board has held generally that the request must be sufficient to put the employer on notice of the employee's desire for representation. Southwestern Bell Telephone Co., 227 NLRB 1223 (1977). The Board has also held, however, that when an employee requests a representative who is unavailable, the employer can deny the request and is not required to postpone the interview, secure an alternative representative, or otherwise take steps to accommodate the employee's specific request. The Board has held that in such circumstances the employee has the right and, indeed, the obligation to request an alternative representative in order to invoke the Weingarten protections. Coca-Cola Bottling Co. of Los Angeles, 227 NLRB 1276 (1977).

Applying these concepts, we assume for purposes of this decision that the person Steele requested as a representative was a statutory supervisor and ineligible to serve as a Weingarten representative. Nevertheless, we find that Steele's request put the Respondent on notice that he desired representation. That the Respondent knew of Steele's desire for representation is reflected by the response that Steele could see no one and that the recording would serve as his representative.[9] The Respondent's reply was preemptive and effectively prohibited Steele from making a further request for representation. Accordingly, Steele was precluded from exercising an employee right, recognized in Coca-Cola, to request an alternative representative after the employer lawfully denies an initial request for a particular representative. In effect, the Respondent told Steele that no matter who he requested as a representative, he would have to be content with a tape recording of the interview. In short, we find that Steele's request, in light of the Respondent's preemptive denial, was sufficient to invoke the Weingarten protections.

The Respondent failed to exercise any of the legitimate options available to it after denying Steele's request for representation. Instead, the Respondent subjected Steele to a 2-hour interrogation replete with threats of police involvement and job loss that trained security officers conducted using sophisticated interrogation techniques.[10] In the interview, the Respondent succeeded in obtaining a signed "confession" and Steele's agreement to pay for allegedly stolen items, apparently in exchange for an implied promise to consider letting Steele keep his job. With the "confession" in hand, the Respondent terminated Steele after accepting his payment. Thus, the Respondent blatantly violated the Weingarten protections.

THE REMEDY

In Taracorp, Inc., 273 NLRB 221 (1984), the Board established the appropriate remedial scheme for violations of Section 8(a)(1) arising out of unlawful Weingarten interviews. In that decision, the Board held that a make-whole remedy is inappropriate and that the proper remedy is that normally prescribed for violations of Section 8(a)(1). Accordingly, we shall order the Respondent to cease and desist from the activity found unlawful herein and take certain affirmative actions designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

[8] Member Hunter disassociates himself from any implication that unrepresented employees enjoy Weingarten rights. Member Hunter notes that the employees in question in Weingarten were part of a unit represented by a union. For the reasons set forth in his concurring and dissenting position in Materials Research Corp., 262 NLRB 1010, 1021 (1982). Member Hunter would not expand these rights to cover unrepresented employees. In the present case, Member Hunter agrees that employee Steele is entitled to the Weingarten protections since at the time of the investigatory interview, Steele was a member of a bargaining unit represented by a union.

[9] The Board has held on several occasions that it is not the prerogative of the employer to determine whether an employee needs representation at a Weingarten interview. See Lennox Industries, 244 NLRB 607, 608 (1979), and cases cited therein at fn. 6.

[10] In his supplemental decision, the judge sought to establish that Steele was not actually coerced during the interview. The absence of actual coercion is wholly irrelevant in the context of Weingarten. Accordingly, we do not find it necessary to pass on the judge's finding that the interview was noncoercive. We do, however, specifically disavow any implication in the supplemental decision that Steele's signing the "Consent to Interview" form waived his Weingarten rights or otherwise indicated that Steele participated in the interview voluntarily. See Montgomery Ward & Co., 254 NLRB 826, 831 (1981).

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Montgomery Ward & Company, Incorporated, San Leandro, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Requiring that employees participate in interviews or meetings when the employees have reasonable grounds to believe that the matters to be discussed may result in their being disciplined and where representation at those interviews or meetings has been denied.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Post at its San Leandro, California facility copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[11] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 32, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(b) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

[11] If this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT require that employees participate in interviews or meetings when the employees have reasonable grounds to believe that the matters to be discussed may result in their being disciplined and where representation at those interviews or meetings has been denied.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

MONTGOMERY WARD & COMPANY, INCORPORATED

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

DAVID G. HEILBRUN, Administrative Law Judge. This case was heard at Oakland, California, on July 23, 1981, based on a complaint alleging that Montgomery Ward & Company, Incorporated (Respondent) violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by denying the request of Joseph F. Steele for "the presence of a representative" during an investigatory interview conducted May 23, 1980, as to which there was reasonable cause to believe that disciplinary action against Steele would result, and thereafter on May 29, 1980, discharging him in consequence.

On the entire record, my observation of the only witness called, and consideration of posthearing briefs, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT AND RESULTANT CONCLUSION OF LAW

Steele was employed as a warehousemen by Respondent for 11 years, and was a member of the bargaining unit represented by Warehouse, Mail Order and Retail Employees Union, Local No. 853, affiliated with International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America.[1] In late morning of May 23, 1980, his immediate supervisor Joe Beggs advised Steele to go with him to an office about 300 feet or more from his normal work place.[2] During the approximate course of 5 minutes while walking there Steele repeatedly asked Beggs why he was being brought in and who the "Mr. Sweet" was that he was expected to see. The question was begged off on the basis of Beggs lacking helpful knowledge. On arrival at the office Steele was presented to Security and Safety Manager Roger Peterson and Chief Investigator Malvin Lee, the former of whom proceeded to interrogate Steele about warehouse thievery. This followed the initial act of obtaining Steele's signature on a "Consent to Interview" document reading:

> I agree that representatives at Montgomery Ward & Co., Inc., may interview me, commencing from the [1] Respondent operates retail department stores nationally and in the course and conduct of its business operations derives gross revenues in excess of $500,000. Its office and place of business in San Leandro, California, is the only facility here involved, and as to this location Respondent annually purchases and receives goods or services valued in excess of $5000 which originated outside California. On these admitted facts I find that Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Sec. 2(6) and (7) of the Act, and otherwise that Teamsters Local 853, named more fully above, is a labor organization within the meaning of Sec. 2(5) of the Act.

[2] All dates and named months hereafter are in 1980, unless shown otherwise.

> time designated below [11:37 a.m.] on matters relating to company business.
> It is fully understood that I am free to leave this interview at any time I so desire.

The interview lasted nearly 2 hours with repeated accusations of Steele's having stolen things, and his at first resolutely denying it. Ultimately, the merchandise catalogue was handed to Steele with a request that he leaf through it. He did so and on pausing at certain pages Peterson aggressively insinuated that this signified guilt as to items on such a particular page. Slowly, Steele passively conceded that his pauses did not associate to stolen items, though secretly repudiating it in his own mind. A short list of apparel and consumer goods was then prepared with attendant dollar value totaling to $170.66, and Steele signed it below an introductory statement admitting to appropriation of what was marked. A second document was signed 15 minutes later in which Steel printed out his supposed actions in more detail, stating remorse and a desire to make restitution. He was thereupon suspended by Peterson and, on return to the premises on May 29, he paid Respondent $170.66 and was promptly terminated on the basis of a management decision which Peterson said was not made by him.

Steele testified to various matters that superimpose on this chronolgy. He recalled that when the episode commenced Peterson elaborated on the "Consent to Interview" by saying that it authorized use of a tape recorder which would be Steele's "protection." In fact, the interview was not taped. Additionally, Steel twice tried to leave during the interview, but on both occasions was dissuaded when Peterson stated that to do so would lead to police involvement and possible arrest. Steele testified that he thrice asked "to have somebody present at the interview," but this approach was consistently denied by Peterson, who kept alluding to a tape recording as Steele's "protection and my representative."

Following his termination Steele caused certain documents to be sent to Respondent. A grievance statement dated June 5 set forth Steele's version of background as including that the interview experience was emotionally distressing to him, and caused him to ask "if I could see one (1) of my work supervisors, to find out what was going on." In a later document dated July 1, rebuttting an employer grievance response, Steele emphasized how he had "asked (more than once) to see one of my supervisors in order to find out what was going on." In this document Steele added that to him his request had meant seeing a "shop steward." Steele's steward then was Glen Erspamer, a person he had helped win office in the Local Union by his vote. Other than this Steele had not participated in union affairs during the 11 years of his membership, nor was he even acquainted with any business agent.

This case invokes NLRB v. J. Weingarten, 420 U.S. 251 (1975). Of its progeny Southwestern Bell Telephone Co., 227 NLRB 1223 (1977), is most nearly in point where an employee request "to have someone there that could explain to me what was happening" evoked a supervisory response that "if the Union were called in it would be out of their hands and there would be nothing they could do to protect the employees' jobs." In such context I find from probative evidence that Steele did not make an effective request for representation within the doctrine or intendment of Weingarten. I believe the testimony of Steele is so unreliable as to be valueless. He carried an unpersuasive demeanor while testifying, and on a more objective basis was evasive and contradictory in what he advanced from the witness stand. His offerings may be characterized as "generally confused," a condition expressly noted by the Board in approving rejection of uncontradicted testimony merely on the basis of demeanor observation. Plasterers Local 32 (McCrory & Co.), 223 NLRB 486 (1976). See also Teamsters Local 959 (Northland Maintenance), 248 NLRB 693 (1980). I believe Steele's testimony was utterly contrived, a conclusion made even more compelling on noting the admission that he was made aware of entitlement to a vague "someone" at the interview only after it was over when "people came up and told me."

The truth about Steele's critical utterances is found exclusively in documentation originating from him shortly after the episode. Such nearly contemporaneous writings are properly a source of fact, particularly when oral testimony is discreditable and the prior signed or adopted statements containing a substantially different version were made in spontaneity and candor. See Snaider Syrup Corp., 220 NLRB 238 (1975); Cf. Kern's Bakeries, 227 NLRB 1329 (1977). Further, I reject Steele's hyperbolized claim of harboring fear and intimidation during the interview, noting that no objective showing was made about such being inculcated and that by Steele's own description the "shop steward" routinely intervened during interrogations of employees Miles, Sanders, and Lyons.

I thus find Steele's only request for guidance or assistance was that Beggs, his "work supervisor," appear and participate in the interview. This specifically contrasts with Southwestern Bell, in which an unartfully voiced request for representation was parried with express supervisory reference to whether it was tactically wise to involve "the Union" in an institutional sense.[3] The focus on Beggs meant a sterile request under Weingarten, for its carefully structured precepts contemplate only that pertinent representation by a labor organization or its

[3] The General Counsel argues Anchortank, Inc., 239 NLRB 430 (1978), and Crown Zellerbach, Inc., 239 NLRB 1124 (1978), in asserting that Weingarten rights are to be liberally construed in the "lone employee" situation. Both cases are distinguishable. The context of Anchortank was that material events occurred prior to a union's certification, thus leaving employees without a statutory representative at the significant point in time. This was found not to impair an employee's right to "some measure of protection when faced with a confrontation with the employer which might result in adverse action." Having divined this "primary concern" in Weingarten, the Board held in Anchortank that a valid request in fulfillment of Sec. 7 rights could involve either a representative of the union not as yet certified "or simply that of [a] fellow employee." The course of this rationale makes ineffectual. Crown Zellerbach is similarly unavailing, for there the issue was simply how to dovetail Weingarten rights with the new representative status of a freshly certified union, as to which the parties had "no customary practice or procedure . . . relating to discipline of employees." In such a case the utilization of a principal advocate for the just-successful union was confirmed, and the General Counsel's rather esoteric argument that the interviewed employee's knowing assent to witnessing by this competent fellow employee of rank-and-file persuasion still failed to fulfill Weingarten was rejected.

counterpart might contribute to the fulfillment of rights under Section 7 of the Act.[4] Accordingly, I render a conclusion of law that Respondent has not violated the Act as alleged, and issue the following recommended

[Recommended Order for dismissal omitted from publication.]

[4] Respondent's decision not to call Peterson as a witness is immaterial when a prima facie case has not been made out. Further, my holding makes it unnecessary to reach the alternative theory of waiver which was briefed by both parties. This theory associates with use of the Consent to Interview form, a technique also found in Montgomery Ward & Co., 254 NLRB 826 (1981). In view of the immateriality, no treatment is required of Montgomery Ward, supra.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION

DAVID G. HEILBRUN, Administrative Law Judge. On December 16, 1982, the Board issued its Order remanding this matter "for the purpose of preparing and issuing a Supplemental Decision setting forth findings of fact and resolutions of credibility concerning Respondent's statements including the precise nature of Respondent's denial of Joseph F. Steele's request that his work supervisor be allowed to be present to assist him during the interview of Steele conducted by Respondent on May 23, 1980." The Board pointed to subsumed questions, which it termed "unclear . . . and potentially crucial," of "whether Steele was coerced into continuing with the interview after his request for aid was denied and what response was given to Steele, if any, beyond denial of his request that a work supervisor be present." Methodology used in reaching further determinations pursuant to the Order chiefly includes review and comparison of documentary evidence, further scrutiny of testimony as given by sole witness Steele, and reflection on the demeanor characteristics exhibited as he testified on July 23, 1981, in terms of any overall semblance of plausibility. This approach has, in turn, been associated to the several lines of analysis set forth in the Board's Order. Thus, an integration was formulated to render the new findings of fact and conclusions of law that are now required to support a further recommended Order.

In more closely accessing the particulars of Steele's concededly investigatory interview, it is first noteworthy that the grievance letter dated June 5, 1980 (appended to a grievance form dated June 6, 1980), was the first spontaneous description by Steele of what he had experienced 2 weeks earlier. This letter was the work of an unnamed friend, who exhibited considerable skill in written composition. On its face the letter is suitably organized, contains a thrust beyond merely stating the contractually based grievance, and has an impressive rhetorical quality. It is also true that a detailed version of the investigatory interview is set forth, and Steele both had expressly adopted it at the time and reaffirmed it when he testified.

With respect to the questions about which the Board solicits more precise factual findings, the first is whether coercion was present as the investigatory interview unfolded. Here Steele's adopted grievance letter of June 5, 1980, traces his original entry to the room in which the episode occurred and the approximate 1-1/2-hour period to follow. However, it is immediately evident that a description akin to what my first decision termed "hyperbolized" perceptions is offered as reality of the situation. Thus, this "Grievance Background" commences with a reference to the "confront[ation]" by two or three men; however, Steele's testimony on such points reveals no recollection that Chief Investigator Lee ever spoke at all during the entire interview, and that a third man did not appear until a later point when the merchandise catalogue was brought into the process. As to taping of the investigatory interview, an evidentiary point that balances Respondent's counsel's stating how "at least a part of the interview" was recorded is Steele's recollection that to his own knowledge the tape recorder was not turned on and operating.[1]

The continued description is of a flood of accusations[2] and Steele's growing distress as he experienced feelings of restriction and fear of police involvement. A further direct reference in the grievance letter of June 5, 1980, is to Steele's spoken request for his work supervisor[3] and the response by the interrogator that he could not see "anyone," with the additional comment that the tape recorder would serve as his representative. Given that Supervisor Beggs had civilly escorted Steele to the interview room,[4] that Steele could not name a second union steward for his work location, that his signed "response" (dated July 1, 1980) to the Employer's "grievance rebuttal" alludes to asking for "one of my supervisors . . . more then [sic] once," and that he termed his desire as that of wishing to have the interview process softened with a "friendly face," I find that Steele clearly and repeatedly termed his request for assistance as to be that of a supervisor and from this Respondent's representatives routinely rejected this as an inappropriate intrusion on the security function by saying that nobody of that capacity was to complicate the interview, and that in a general sense any device that could record and thus per-

[1] This assertion is one of several in which Steele's veracity is in doubt, for his investigatory affidavit plainly refers to the tape having been "turned on."

[2] The exact reference is to "rapid fire questions from all directions"; however, this overwise disturbing scenario is at total odds with Lee's being shown as making no utterances at all and the absence of any reference to remarks by the third unknown person.

[3] This is the most salient point as to which Steele is discredited, for his contradictory testimony was not satisfactorily explained nor did his demeanor when denying that a work supervisor had been requested by him display an interest in truth on the point.

[4] No finding is extant of whether Beggs is a supervisor within the meaning of Sec. 2(11) of the Act or, as the Board pointed out could be the case, merely a "regular employee [carrying] such a title." While there is little which is indicative of Beggs' actual functioning, what is known is that as a subordinate Steele was paid an $8.59 hourly rate as a receiving clerk plus generally working 3 hours weekly overtime, that Beggs authoritatively left his work area to walk an employee on what amounted to an approximate 10-minute passage of time for his own round trip, and that Steele showed some apprehension over whether or not he was being called in because of "mistakes I may have made as a new employee in the Receiving Department." Such indications are that Beggs actually responsibly directed others in a manner more than routine, and requiring use of independent judgment in such fulfillment. The Board's experience with this Employer shows it to be sufficiently structured that, when all involved persons allude to a "work supervisor" in this type of facility, the incumbent is by all odds a statutory supervisor. On this basis I now find Beggs to have possessed that status at material times. Cf. Montgomery Ward & Co., 217 NLRB 165, 166 (1975).

petuate spoken words would be representative of the exchange then underway and intended to be continued.

I find that no coercion was present in regard to Steele's continuation with the interview, in part because at its very outset he signed a statement which plainly affirmed his understanding of being truly able "to leave . . . at any time."[5] Steele's grievance rebuttal response dated July 1, 1980, seeks to neutralize the significance of this understanding in its point No. 6; however, none of the five subpoints does more than reiterate what a summoned employee would ordinarily expect. On the question of police involvement, the last assertion of such point No. 6 refers to police notification, but without any showing that it was more than routine reference whenever theft is the subject matter of discussion. This is another example of inconsistency in Steele as a source of facts, for his earlier grievance letter of June 5, 1980, and his investigatory affidavit both state that he was told of potentially being "take[n]" to the police.[6]

In sum, I find that Steele experienced a firm, appropriate coaxing out of guilt, that the consequences of his apparent conduct were referred to only in a balanced manner, and that his contention after the episode ended that he had really felt rooted in place throughout and unable to exercise the simple free will of walking from the room is but a contrived afterthought which was fostered out of an unworthy attempt to avoid the plain consequences of his acts. I am satisfied that these disordered thoughts arose later on May 23, 1980, when Steele was visited at home by two fellow employees, and the entire matter of a sweeping security crackdown based on implications the day before was discussed among these three persons in a context laden with surmise, chagrin, and a grasping for exoneration.

The Board's remand also alluded to the "legal" issue of Respondent's being put on notice of an employee's desire for representation, with Columbus Foundries, 229 NLRB 34 (1977), and Illinois Bell Telephone Co., 251 NLRB 932 (1980), cited as among the progeny of Weingarten. In Columbus Foundries the individual seeking to intervene during an investigatory interview was a union committeeman, while in Illinois Bell a fellow employee of the interviewee was turned away even though the actual union steward had instructed that such a person be called on if necessary when, as was the case, there was no access to this same union steward because of differing work shifts. On these bases I consider both Columbus Foundries and Illinois Bell distinguishable and without relevance to the issue of what puts an employer on meaningful notice that appropriate representation is desired before an employee submits to an investigatory interview. With the facts here being that Steele's only request was for a work supervisor, the fuller credibility resolution above has no impact on such collateral "legal" issue.

Accordingly, I reaffirm my earlier conclusion of law that Respondent has not violated the Act as alleged, and again recommend that the Board dismiss the complaint in its entirety.

[5] An identical "Consent to Interview" document was involved in Montgomery Ward & Co., 254 NLRB 826 (1981), and there analyzed only in terms of whether it constituted a waiver of Weingarten rights. Of three interviewees which that case treated, all of whom signed the writing before individual interview with auto service center security and safety personnel, one (Kamin) made no request for representation whatsoever, yet proceeded to list $1300 in cash and merchandise as his response to the management official's request for details of what he was "responsible for stealing." Further, when the process was over and admitted to in a signed statement, the employee implicated another individual on being asked about his knowledge of any additional engagement in theft. The implicated person, along with another, both made clear and unequivocal requests for union representation subsequent to signing the Consents to Interview there, and the coercive circumstances found to have existed during these respective interviews did not in any manner relate to this document itself.

[6] Steele's oral testimony varies still more in its reference to "police action and stuff like that," which is the explanation in terms other than his being taken to the police. I note that the final documents signed by Steele when the interview terminated emphasized how "possible prosecution" was not precluded or limited, and believe from this that a definite susceptibility toward suggestiveness has clouded Steele's ability to truly recall just what was said to him on the point. These circumstances emphatically contrast with a person undergoing interview being told that police would be "waiting [at] home" should he leave, or countering the plain request for a union representative to assist by saying that instead the police would be called. Montgomery Ward, supra at 829–830.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND DENNIS

On 5 April 1983 Administrative Law Judge James L. Rose issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed a brief in response to the Respondent's exceptions.[1]

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions, and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.

The issues in this case arose in the wake of a 2 September to 27 November 1981[3] economic strike by the Respondent's production and maintenance employees. The Respondent refused to reinstate former strikers Danny Anders, Larry Phipps, and Virgil Roberts because each of them had allegedly engaged in serious misconduct during the strike. The complaint alleged, and the judge found, that the refusals to reinstate violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act. For reasons stated below, we find that the Respondent violated the Act only by its refusal to recall Phipps.

1. Danny Anders

On 16 October Supervisor Combs reported to Edward Burcham, the Respondent's president, that paint and etching acid had been spilled on Combs' car the night before. Later that month, Combs told Burcham that charges had been filed with the sheriff's department accusing Anders of participating in the vandalizing of Combs' car. He also reported that the sheriff's department was investigating the charges and had issued an arrest warrant for Anders. The Respondent relied on the foregoing in refusing to reinstate Anders when the strike ended. The case involving Anders was subsequently nol prossed and he returned to work on 18 January 1982.

Another incident took place during the strike which the judge found comparable to that involving Anders. Specifically, striking employee David Mosier charged nonstriking employee Georgia Sexton with trying to hit him with her car. Burcham was aware of the incident, Sexton having explained to him that she was only parking her car and not attempting to run Mosier over. No arrest warrant was issued for Sexton and the charges against her were dismissed. The Respondent took no disciplinary action against her.

The judge found that the Respondent had an "honest belief" that Anders had participated in vandalizing Combs' car. The judge also found, however, that the Respondent had similar cause to believe that Sexton had attempted to hit Mosier with her car. The judge concluded that although the Respondent's "honest belief" that Anders had participated in vandalism would have justified his suspension or discharge, the Respondent's failure to penalize Sexton for similar conduct demonstrated disparate disciplinary treatment between striker and nonstriker. Consequently, the refusal to reinstate Anders was discriminatory conduct in violation of Section 8(a)(3). The judge used the same disparate treatment rationale in partial support of his 8(a)(3) findings with respect to alleged discriminatees Phipps and Roberts.

We agree with the judge that the Respondent had an "honest belief" in Anders' participation in the vandalization of Combs' car at the time it refused to reinstate Anders and such misconduct excedes the protections of the Act. See Clear Pine Mouldings, 268 NLRB 1044 (1984). Contrary to the judge, however, we find no disparate treatment or condonation of Sexton's alleged misconduct. At the time the strike ended, Burcham knew that charges had been filed against Anders for participating in the vandalization of Combs' car, an arrest warrant had been issued, and Combs' car in fact had been damaged. Burcham had no corresponding knowledge with respect to the charges filed against Sexton. Mosier had not been injured, no arrest warrant had been issued for Sexton, and Burcham had Sexton's countervailing explanation for the incident. In sum, Burcham had less conflicting and more convincing evidence of Anders' culpability for the offense charged. This distinction in the known circumstances of each incident justified the Respondent's failure to discipline Sexton.

In light of the foregoing, we find that the General Counsel has not proved that the Respondent employed disparate treatment with respect to the alleged misconduct of striker Anders. Accordingly,

[1] We deny the General Counsel's motion to strike the Respondent's exceptions 4 and 5.

[2] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[3] All dates are in 1981 unless otherwise stated.

we find that the Respondent lawfully refused to reinstate Anders on 27 November. Furthermore, having found error in the judge's disparate treatment rationale, we must examine the validity of other grounds stated by the judge for finding unlawful the refusal to recall Phipps and Roberts.

2. Larry Phipps

During the morning of 16 November, firecrackers were exploding in and about the plant. Edward Burcham, the Respondent's president, observed Phipps and Fred Privette, a nonemployee picket, standing close to the front door of the plant. Burcham saw Phipps, with a cigarette in one hand, make a motion with the other. Burcham then heard a firecracker explode and saw paper and smoke close to Phipps' feet.

The judge credited the testimony of Privette and another eyewitness that Phipps did not throw the firecracker. He noted that Burcham did not testify that he saw Phipps throw a firecracker and observed that it was unlikely that if Phipps had thrown one it would have fallen at his feet. Because the Respondent's belief that Phipps had engaged in misconduct was mistaken, albeit in good faith held, we find that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by failing to reinstate him.[4]

3. Virgil Roberts

On 16 November, Supervisor Gregory Bartlett was looking through a second story window of the plant and saw Roberts, who was standing close to the front door of the plant, light a bottle rocket[5] and bend over. When Bartlett reached the first floor seconds later, he saw debris and smoke.

The judge found that Roberts had thrown a bottle rocket through the front door. He also found, however, that there was no evidence that the rocket had caused any damage to company property or to any person. Citing Seminole Asphalt Refining, 207 NLRB 167 (1973), enf. denied in pertinent part 497 F.2d 247 (5th Cir. 1974), the judge concluded that Robert's misconduct was not serious enough to preclude reinstatement. We disagree.

In Seminole Asphalt, the Board reversed the administrative law judge and ordered the respondent to reinstate two employees who had flung a cherry bomb onto plant premises during an unfair labor practice strike. The Board found that the cherry bomb had not damaged person or property and concluded that such misconduct when considered against the Respondent's unfair labor practices, particularly the discriminatory layoff that provoked the strike, was not so flagrant as to disqualify the alleged discriminatees for reinstatement. Unlike Seminole Asphalt, there is no allegation that the Respondent in this case committed any unfair labor practices.[6] The strike was an economic one. In addition, the bottle rocket was flung into the plant during manufacturing operations. At the time the rocket exploded, the Respondent's employees were handling mirrors and glass products. Even a slight explosion could have caused significant damage and disruption. That this did not occur was fortunate, but not dispositive of the reinstatement question. The potential for bodily injury and property damage was present.[7] Accordingly, we find that the Respondent lawfully refused to reinstate Roberts.[8]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, New Galax Mirror Corporation, Galax, Virginia, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Substitute the following for paragraphs 2(a) and (b).

"(a) Offer Larry Phipps immediate and full reinstatement to his former job or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed and make him whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits resulting from his discharge, less any net interim earnings, plus interest.

"(b) Remove from its files any reference to the unlawful discharge of Larry Phipps and notify him in writing that this has been done and that evidence of the unlawful discharge will not be used against him in any way."

2. Substitute the attached notice for that of the administrative law judge.

---

[4] Rubin Bros. Footwear, 99 NLRB 610 (1952). We express no opinion about whether Phipps would have been disqualified from reinstatement had he engaged in the alleged conduct.

[5] A bottle rocket is a firecracker launched from a bottle.

[6] In any event, Chairman Dotson and Member Hunter note their view, set forth in Clear Pine Mouldings, supra, that the Board should not balance an employer's unfair labor practices against a striker's misconduct in deciding the striker's entitlement to reinstatement.

[7] "The test of coercion and intimidation is not whether the misconduct proves effective. The test is whether the misconduct is such that, under the circumstances existing, it may reasonably tend to coerce or intimidate . . . ." Operating Engineers Local 542 v. NLRB, 328 F.2d 850, 852–853 (3d Cir. 1964).

[8] For the reasons stated by the judge in his decision, Member Zimmerman would find that Roberts' alleged misconduct was not serious enough to disqualify him from reinstatement.

NEW GALAX MIRROR CORPORATION

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JAMES L. ROSE, Administrative Law Judge. This matter was tried before me on January 12 and 13, 1983, at Galax, Virginia, on the General Counsel's complaint which alleged that the Respondent suspended, then discharged, three economic strikers in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 151 et seq.

The Respondent generally denied it committed any unfair labor practices, and affirmatively alleges that Larry Phipps and Virgil Roberts were terminated because "of their violent strike misconduct." The Respondent further contends it had a good-faith belief that Danny Anders was guilty of the strike-related misconduct but, on learning that such misconduct could not be established, subsequently reinstated him.

On the record as a whole, including my observation of the witnesses, briefs, and arguments of counsel, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT AND CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

I. JURISDICTION

The Respondent is engaged in the manufacture of mirrors and fabrication of glass. It annually receives directly from points outside the State of Virginia goods, products, and materials valued in excess of $50,000. It annually ships directly to points outside the State of Virginia finished products valued in excess of $50,000. The Respondent admits, and I find, that it is an employer engaged in interstate commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The Charging Party, United Furniture Workers of America, AFL–CIO (the Union) is admitted to be, and I find is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Facts

On April 2, 1981,[1] the Union was certified as the bargaining representative for a unit of the Respondent's production and maintenance employees. Thereafter, apparently, the parties entered into negotiations but were unable to reach agreement on a contract. On September 2, a strike was called with about 50 to 55 of the unit employees participating. On November 27, the strike ended with the Union making an unconditional offer to the Respondent for the employees to return to work. The Respondent reinstated all the strikers except Larry Phipps, Virgil Roberts, and Danny Anders. Anders was recalled about January 18, 1982.

Involved in this case is the alleged vandalism of a supervisor's automobile on October 15; the setting off of firecrackers and bottle rockets on November 16, some of which exploded inside the plant; and on an unknown date, the alleged attempt of a nonstriking employee to hit a striker with her car when entering the plant parking area.

As indicated above, the Respondent contends it did not recall Anders because Edward Burcham, Respondent's president, had reason to believe he was one of the individuals who participated in vandalizing a supervisor's automobile on October 15; and Phipps and Virgil Roberts were not reinstated because they had been observed lighting a firecracker and/or a bottle rocket on November 16. Burcham testified to these events.

He also testified learning that striker David Mosier had charged Georgia Sexton (an employee hired during the strike) with trying to hit him with her car on her way to work one morning. Sexton was not suspended because, "I did not consider that the charge against her as jeopardizing the company running its business, or the safety of employees." Although stating that Sexton mentioned this event to him on the day it occurred, Burcham did not say whether she admitted or denied it. Nor is it known whether this conversation was before or after Mosier made his complaint to the police.

B. Analysis and Concluding Findings

In Rubin Bros. Footwear,[2] the Board established how the burden of proof would be allocated in cases where an employer discharges or refuses to reinstate a striking employee because of alleged misconduct.[3] In essence, the General Counsel has an initial burden of showing that the discharge of the employee arose out of his having engaged in protected activity (e.g., strike) at which time the burden shifts to the Respondent to show that it had an "honest belief" that the individual had engaged in misconduct. The burden then shifts back to the General Counsel to prove that the employee did not in fact engage in the misconduct. Finally, if proven, the particular act of impropriety must be evaluated to determine whether the employee's protected rights should be subordinated "in order to vindicate the broader interests of society as a whole."[4]

In determining whether a strike's conduct is so serious as to warrant discharge, or denial of reinstatement once the strike is concluded, all the circumstances must be considered. The evaluation begins with noting that strikers, because of the nature of strikes, many times do things which, while not to be condoned, nevertheless cannot be considered sufficient to justify denying them protection of the Act.[5] Further, as the Board has said, "Each striker's eligibility for reinstatement must be judged solely on incidents in which the striker in question is alleged to have participated. Unauthorized acts of violence on the part of individual strikers are not chargeable to other union members in the absence of proof that identifies them as participating in such violence."[6]

In distinguishing between "a trivial rough incident or a moment of animal exhuberance"[7] and one sufficiently egregious so as to deny an employee the continued protection of the Act, the Board distinguishes basically between acts of annoyance as opposed to actual physical violence on people or property. Thus inserting 22 nails point up in an expansion crack of a roadway leading to the plant gate was found to be sufficient to deny reinstatement,[8] as was threatening a nonstriker while actually physically assaulting another which gave credibility and immediacy to the threat.[9] On the other hand, just abusive language directed to nonstrikers is not sufficient to deny reinstatement,[10] nor is throwing gravel or eggs[11] nor even is a threat of arson on a nonstriker's historic home.[12]

In short, passive behavior of strikers is not required; however, there is a limit to permissible activity. That limit is acts of physical violence upon people or property. And even though termination of a striker may be prompted by an honest belief that he engaged in misconduct, such does not relieve the Respondent from liability if the act of misconduct is disproven or shown not to be serious.[13] Finally, irrespective of whether a particular proven act of misconduct might be sufficiently egregious, an employer is not permitted to have different rules of behavior for strikers and nonstrikers. Different treatment of strikers and nonstrikers is discriminatory and "inherently destructive" of employee rights.[14] Thus where both strikers and nonstrikers participated in rock throwing, the employer was found to have unlawfully discharged a striker when it did not discipline or discharge the nonstrikers who engaged in the same activity.[15]

At issue here then is whether the Respondent had an honest belief that Anders, Phipps, and Roberts engaged in, respectively, vandilizing a supervisor's car and setting off firecrackers; whether the Respondent's honest belief has been rebutted by facts showing that Anders, Phipps, or Roberts did not do so; whether the acts they engaged in were sufficiently egregious to deny them continued protection of the Act; and whether similar acts of misconduct by nonstrikers were condoned, thus establishing discriminatory treatment of strikers.

1. Danny Anders

Burcham testified that on October 16 one of his supervisors, Clarion Combs, told him that the night before someone had put paint and etching acid on Combs' car. Thereafter, in late October, Burcham was told by Combs that the sheriff's department was investigating Anders with regard to that matter and that a warrant for his arrest had been issued. Anders was accused of having been the driver—letting off and later picking up those who actually painted the windshield. Burcham testified then that since the charges placed against Anders "was a direct threat to the continuing operation of the business," when the Union made the unconditional offer for employees to return to work, he decided that Anders should not be allowed to return.

The case against Anders was set to be tried on January 18 but a few days prior to that Burcham was informed "that the case had come up in court and that the case had been ruled nol prosse [sic] and so for this reason a decision had to be made on Danny Anders, and he was allowed to return to work, and he did return to work on January 18."

Since I conclude the conduct proven is insignificant without consideration of any unfair labor practices the Respondent may have committed before the strike, I need not decide this issue.

Jerry Davis, a deputy sheriff at the time, testified that he investigated the incident with regard to the Combs car. He filed the charge against Anders; however, after he quit the sheriff's department there had been no followup investigation, and the case was not prosecuted.

Although Anders was present during the course of this testimony, he was not called by the General Counsel. Thus the Respondent's evidence with regard to this matter was unrebutted, including a statement given by Anders to the effect that he did drop off and later pick up two individuals in the late evening of October 15.

The first question is whether Burcham had an honest belief that Anders in fact had participated in an act of vandalism on a supervisor's car. I believe he did, based on the information he received. This belief was corroborated by the testimony of Davis, and has not been rebutted. Since the Respondent does not have the burden of proving participation in the act, but only of showing an honest belief of involvement, and since property damage is an egregious act of misconduct, I conclude that the Respondent would have been justified in discharging or suspending Anders.

However, it is clear that Burcham treated Anders differently than he treated nonstriking employee Sexton, who it was alleged, attempted to hit a striker with her automobile. If anything, the allegation against Sexton was more serious than that against Anders inasmuch as it involved potential physical injury. Although the evidence with regard to the Sexton matter is sketchy, from the record it is apparent that Burcham did not consider the allegation against Sexton to be of significance primarily because her act was directed against strikers and not against individuals who were continuing to work, supervisors, or company property. As to Sexton, he testified, "it happened outside the work area, and I did not compare it with what Danny Anders was charged with." The charge against Anders, he felt, "was a direct threat against the company operating its business, since it was directed at a supervisor and other employees that were working during the time of the strike." There is no evidence that Burcham attempted to verify or refute Mosier's claim.

From Burcham's testimony it is apparent that the same general type of activity believed to have been engaged in by Anders was of no concern to him when engaged in by a nonstriker. Thus, at a minimum, the act allegedly engaged in by a nonstriker was condoned.

I conclude that the refusal to reinstate Anders was discriminatory in that the Respondent treated him differently than it treated a nonstriker for substantially the same type of misconduct. The Respondent offered no justification for treating the strikers and nonstrikers differently. Accordingly, I conclude that by refusing to reinstate Anders under the circumstances of this case, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

2. Jerry Phipps

Burcham testified that for about 1-1/2 hours on the morning of November 16 firecrackers were exploded both outside the plant and inside. At one point Burcham was involved in a discussion with the driver of a linen truck on the East Grayson Street side of the plant. At that time he observed Phipps and Fred Privette, member of the Union but an employee of another company, standing near the front door of the plant. Burcham testified he observed Phipps with a cigarette in his hand (which Phipps admits was probable) and he saw Phipps make a moving motion with his hand. Burcham then heard a firecracker explode and saw paper and smoke at Phipps' feet. Although he did not see Phipps light the firecracker, he nevertheless concluded that Phipps did so. Burcham had Phipps charged with the crime of "discharging firecrackers in the City of Galax." Phipps denied having lit the firecracker in question or indeed any firecracker on November 16.

Vera Copeland, a witness for the General Counsel, stated that she saw a bottle rocket go through Privette's legs and explode just in front of Phipps. Privette testified to this same general effect. And this was the reason Phipps was terminated.[16]

The overwhelming, and I think generally credible, testimony in this matter is that Phipps did not light the firecracker or bottle rocket which Burcham assumed that he had. And I make this finding notwithstanding that a state court may have concluded the contrary. The testimony of an eyewitness, and Phipps' credible denial, are more persuasive than the conclusion reached by Burcham based on circumstantial evidence. Indeed, it seems unlikely that Phipps would have lit a firecracker and dropped it at his own feet.

Though Burcham's observation may have been sufficient to establish an "honest belief," I conclude the General Counsel has rebutted it.

Beyond that I do not believe that just setting off a firecracker is sufficiently serious to justify denying one the protection of the Act. While Burcham testified that there were many firecrackers going off some of which went inside the plant, thus jeopardizing the safety of employees and disrupting the business operation, even if Phipps set off one firecracker outside the plant, the explosions inside could not be imputed to him.[17]

Finally, as with Anders, I conclude that by refusing Phipps reinstatement, the Respondent treated him disparately from nonstriker Sexton. For these reasons, I conclude that by refusing to reinstate Phipps, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

3. Virgil Roberts

Gregory Bartlett, a supervisor for the Respondent, testified that on the morning of November 16, about 10

[16] Burcham also testified it was reported to him that Phipps threw an egg at Rodney Brown and called Brown a "nigger." Phipps denied having done either, a denial not rebutted by the Respondent. Even so, such matters are generally considered insignificant. In any event, it was the firecracker incident on which Burcham relied to justify his refusal to reinstate Phipps.

[17] American Cyanamid Co., supra.

bottle rockets were exploded inside the plant on the Oldtowne Street side where he was working. He further testified that out a second floor window he saw Virgil Roberts light a bottle rocket, while standing about 3 feet from a door to the plant, and then bend over. Bartlett further testified that a few seconds following this observation he heard an explosion. When he got to the first floor he saw debris and smoke.

Bartlett reported this to Burcham and also made out a charge against Roberts for having discharged fireworkers inside the city limits of Galax. As with Phipps, Roberts was tried in the General District Court with an appeal to the circuit court. He was found guilty as charged.

Roberts denied that he lit the bottle rocket as did his father and brother. Both testified that they were on the Oldtowne side of the building about the time in question and both testified that they only heard one explosion that morning and Roberts was not responsible for it.

Carrie Luffoon, also a witness for the General Counsel, testified that she heard one explosion on the Oldtowne side of the building that morning. On hearing it, she turned and saw Roberts about 3 or 4 feet from the plant entrance. She said that she did not think he could have lit the bottle rocket or firecracker. This testimony is substantially at variance with that of Robert's brother and father, both of whom placed him at the corner of the street about 40 to 50 feet from the door.

Given Bartlett's generally credible testimony that he in fact observed Roberts lighting a bottle rocket along with Luffoon's placement of Roberts near the vicinity of the door I conclude that in fact Roberts did light a bottle rocket on the morning of November 16. I discredit his testimony and that of his brother and his father to the extent that such testimony suggests he did not participate in this event.

Nevertheless, I conclude that lighting a bottle rocket, even if it went into the plant, was not a sufficient act of misconduct so as to justify the Respondent in terminating Roberts. There is no evidence of damage to company property or to any person. Indeed, there is no evidence that the firecrackers and bottle rockets were sufficiently powerful to do more than fizz and make a noise. The one which went off at Phipps' feet caused him no harm. Thus, I do not believe that causing a firecracker or bottle rocket to explode on company property was sufficiently egregious to cause an employee to lose the protective mantle of the Act.[18]

No doubt when firecrackers of this type go off they are unsettling. But this does not mean that such activity rises to the level of misconduct which can cost an individual his job.

I find that the Respondent had reasonable cause to believe that Roberts in fact had lit a bottle rocket which was exploded in the plant; and the General Counsel did not carry his burden of rebutting this belief. Nevertheless, I conclude that setting off a bottle rocket was not sufficiently serious to justify the Respondent discharging him.

Further, as with Anders and Phipps, I conclude that the Respondent, having condoned misconduct on the part of a nonstriker, discriminated against Roberts because he was a striker. For these reasons the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

IV. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES ON COMMERCE

The activities of the Respondent set forth above, occurring in connection with its business, have close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow thereof within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

V. THE REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent unlawfully refused to reinstate Danny Anders until January 18, 1982, and discharged Virgil Roberts and Larry Phipps, I shall recommend that it cease and desist therefrom, and take certain affirmative action including offering Phipps and Roberts immediate and full reinstatement to their jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions of employment without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and benefits, and make them and Danny Anders whole for any loss of wages or other benefits they may have suffered as a result of the discrimination against them in acordance with the formula set forth in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest as provided for in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[19]

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[20]

ORDER

The Respondent, New Galax Mirror Corporation, Galax, Virginia, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

In citing this case, counsel for the General Counsel stated that the cherry bombs had been thrown "into the employer's plant." Counsel for the Respondent, in a postbrief letter (objected to by counsel for the General Counsel) contested this reading of the case, stating "no fireworks were thrown into the interior of a plant." Apparently counsel is arguing that "plant premises" in the decision refers to the land and "plant" in the General Counsel's brief means the building. Even if such a distinction is appropriate such does not render Seminole Asphalt inapposite. The cherry bombs were thrown onto company property where employees had occasion to be during the course of their work.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action deemed necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer immediate and unconditional reinstatement to Virgil Roberts and Larry Phipps to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions of employment and make them and Danny Anders whole for any losses they may have suffered as a result of the discrimination against them in accordance with the remedy section set forth above.

(b) Remove from its files any reference to the unlawful discharges of Danny Anders, Larry Phipps, and Virgil Roberts on November 27, 1981, and notify them in writing that this has been done and that the discharges will not be used against them in any way.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at its Galax, Virginia facility copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[21] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 5, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

14 December 1984

DECISION ON REVIEW AND DIRECTION

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

Upon a petition filed under Section 9(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, a hearing was held before a hearing officer of the National Labor Relations Board. On 3 April 1984, the Acting Regional Director for Region 22 issued a Decision and Direction of Election in which he found appropriate the petitioned-for bargaining unit consisting exclusively of warehouse employees employed by the Employer at its Edison, New Jersey facility. Thereafter, in accordance with Section 102.67 of the National Labor Relations Board Rules and Regulations, a stay of election and a request for review of the Acting Regional Director's Decision and Direction of Election was filed by the Employer, contending that the Acting Regional Director departed from officially reported Board precedent by refusing to find that the employees working in the Employer's warehouse, order processing, and merchandising areas constitute the smallest appropriate unit for representation purposes.

On 1 May 1984, the National Labor Relations Board granted the motion to stay the election as well as the request for review as to the appropriateness of the unit.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the entire record in this case, including the brief of the Employer, and makes the following findings.

The Employer is engaged in the mail order and retail sale of giftware, fashions, and jewelry. The one-story facility is divided into three geographical work areas, designated for purposes of the hearing as areas A, B, and C. Area A contains the order processing and customer service employees, area B the warehouse employees, and area C the merchandising and accounting employees. Approximately 38 employees work at the facility. The Petitioner has requested a unit of 13 warehouse employees at the Employer's Edison facility.

The Employer contends that the smallest appropriate unit would consist of employees working in all three areas. Because of the functional integration of the Employer's business, the Employer argues that an employee performing a job in one area necessarily assists employees in other areas in the performance of their respective functions.

In determining whether the requisite community of interest is present among the proposed unit of employees, the Board considers whether there is uniform control of labor relations; interchange of jobs; similarity of skills; common conditions of employment; common supervision; operational integration; bargaining history; and geographical proximity.[1] Where at least some of these criteria are met, a unit which encompasses all employees at one location may be found appropriate.

All the employees here work in the same building. Although there is open access between areas A and C, the warehouse area is separated by a wall and a hallway. Access from area B to areas A and C is through a doorway or through the lunchroom. All employees punch the same timeclock and have the same hours of work, share a common bulletin board and lunchroom, and are paid biweekly on an hourly basis. Uniform wage levels are set throughout the Company. All employees enjoy the same holidays, vacation and sick day benefits, pension, insurances, and company discount policy. They are all subject to the same rules of conduct and disciplinary procedures. Moreover, the Employer has stated in its company handbook that it expects each of its employees to be versatile enough "to perform a variety of jobs, from administrative to light physical in nature."

Orders come in by mail or by telephone. A warehouse employee brings all mail orders to area A, the order processing area, where they are stamped with a number and separated according to the method of payment involved. Certain accounting and inventory information is recorded before an order processing employee prepares a picking ticket which the warehouse employees use to pick and ship a customer's order. The warehouse supervisor or his designee picks up the picking tickets and takes them to the warehouse. Employees there retrieve the merchandise. If questions arise about a particular order, the employee in area B would go back to an employee in area A for clarification. After the merchandise is picked, it is taken to warehouse packers who pack and ship the order. An area C employee, Dawn Smith, actually picks special orders from Area B. At the end of the day a warehouse employee takes these picking tickets to the file room in area B.

Area B employees also receive merchandise from suppliers. Diane Lebovitz, merchandise manager for area C, regularly gives instructions to area B employees working in merchandise receiving, telling them what to receive and what to reject and when to open packages. The suppliers' merchandise forms are given to the area C supervisor who gives them to Cheryl Bonbar, a clerk, who compares them with back orders and makes a list of which back orders can be filled. The clerk then takes this list to Georgiana Booth, an employee in area A, who decides how many back orders can be released. Booth then gives these back orders to the clerk or Lebovitz who takes them to the warehouse supervisor for picking.

Kevin Kulpa, an area B employee, does work for just about every area in the Company. He picks up some deliveries for the merchandising department, area C. He also works for the order processing department, area A, to deliver purchase orders. He handles inside mail from each one of the divisions within the Company, as well as handling the bank deposits for the accounting department.

Dawn Smith, an area C employee, is shared with area B. She regularly picks orders in the warehouse and handles special orders and defects. Lois Accomando, primarily an area C order processing employee, works in area C in merchandise assembly and as a fashion packer. She also works in merchandising, area A, preparing item lists.

As many as nine order processing employees have gone to area B to work for varying lengths of time. At least one area B employee was sent to area A to perform work on at least 10 different occasions during the past year.

Because of the Employer's policy of training personnel to perform a variety of functions, it has been possible for several employees to transfer permanently from one area to another. For example, three order processing employees have transferred to merchandising, one warehouse employee has transferred to order processing, and one former employee transferred from order processing to the warehouse area.

Based on the foregoing, it is clear that there are many occasions and opportunities for employees working in the various areas to interact with each other face to face and by telephone. Contact among employees in the three areas is occasioned by discrepancies in paperwork, shortages of inventory, back orders, identification and location of items to be shipped, expediting of orders, and corrections of inventory control records. Thus, employees working in the three areas regularly confer with one another as a routine part of their jobs. Additionally, several employees have been borrowed from one department and used in another department when necessary to achieve a smooth operation. Moreover, some employees have transferred permanently from one area of the center to another. Finally, as indicated, fringe benefits and working conditions are the same for all employees.

When these factors are viewed collectively we find a compelling basis for finding that the warehouse employees do not have a community of interest sufficiently distinct and separate from other employees to warrant their placement in a separate unit. We conclude that the smallest appropriate unit is that consisting of employees working in the warehouse, order processing, and merchandising areas. In reaching this conclusion we rely on the highly integrated nature of the Employer's business, the fact that all employees participate equally and fully in this process, the high degree of interaction among employees, and the lack of distinction among employees as to wages, benefits, terms and conditions of employment, and levels of skills.[2]

Accordingly, we shall remand the case to the Regional Director in order that he may, in the event the Petitioner demonstrates to him within 10 days that it has an adequate showing of interest in the broader unit found appropriate herein, conduct an election in accordance with his Decision and Direction of Election, as modified herein,[3] except that the eligibility date shall be that immediately preceding the date below.

DIRECTION

This case is remanded to the Regional Director for Region 22 for the purpose of conducting an election pursuant to his Decision and Direction of Election, as modified herein, subject to the Petitioner's presentation of an adequate showing of interest among the employees in the appropriate unit. The eligibility date shall be the payroll period immediately preceding the date of issuance.[4]

The Regional Director shall make the list available to all parties to the election. No extension of time to file this list shall be granted by the Regional Director except in extraordinary circumstances. Failure to comply with this requirement shall be grounds for setting aside the election if proper objections are filed.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN, HUNTER, AND DENNIS

On 29 June 1983 Administrative Law Judge Karl H. Buschmann issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions[2] and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Lomasney Combustion, Inc., Poughkeepsie, New York, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

MEMBER HUNTER, dissenting.

I cannot agree with my colleagues' adoption of the judge's conclusion that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) by promoting a decertification petition among its employees. In my judgment, the evidence falls far short of establishing such a conclusion. Therefore, because the Respondent's alleged improper conduct with respect to the petition is the only issue before us, I would dismiss the complaint in its entirety.

The judge relies on a loose aggregation of events occurring in fall 1981 to establish a pattern of promotion and active support of the decertification petition: some remarks made by the Respondent's president, an informal conversation between the Respondent's vice president and an employee, and certain actions on the part of the Respondent's supervisor. On evaluation of those events, I fail to see any indication that the Respondent involved itself in the petition process to the degree necessary to support a violation.

The judge focuses on the remarks of James Lomasney, the Respondent's owner and president, to a group of his employees in October 1981 as the initial step in a campaign conceived and promoted by the Respondent to decertify the Union. What the Respondent's president actually said, quite simply, was that in the burdensome economic circumstances then prevailing, he did not feel that the presence of the Union was beneficial to the Respondent or to the employees. I view this as a statement of legitimate economic considerations protected by Section 8(c). It is an outrageous strain on reason to accept as fact that these remarks were, in effect, a "kick-off" for the Respondent's promotion of the decertification petition, especially when the Respondent made no mention of decertifying the Union. The credited evidence patently shows that the petition was conceived by employee Simpson with no active assistance from the Respondent, and that he alone circulated the petition in late November 1981, at least a month after the president's remarks. On the record before us, I fail to see a connection between these two events which would remotely suggest that the Respondent sponsored the petition.

The next event in the pattern of promotion deduced by the judge is the "interrogation" of employee Hoysradt by David Lomasney, the Respondent's vice president. At approximately the time of circulation of the petition, the vice president informally asked Hoysradt how he thought the petition would fare. Hoysradt responded that the employee who circulated the petition "would look like an ass." While the vice president's bland contribution to this repartee indicates that the Respondent had knowledge at that time of the existence of the petition, I see nothing in the context of this short, inane conversation which manifests the Respondent's promotion and sponsorship of the petition.

It is apparent that in the judge's view the activities of Supervisor Hoffman form the essence of the Respondent's promotional and facilitating conduct. I will emphasize here, since the judge did not, that Hoffman acted at the request of employee Simpson,

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[2] In the absence of exceptions we adopt pro forma the judge's finding that Respondent Vice President David Lomasney's interrogation of employee Timothy Hoysradt as to the feasibility of circulating a decertification petition did not violate Sec. 8(a)(1).

We find no merit in our dissenting colleague's attempt to isolate and minimize the component events in the Respondent's unlawful assistance of a decertification petition effort. In particular, we find that Supervisor Hoffman's signing of the petition was the critical factor supporting the finding of a violation. There is no factual or legal basis for our colleague's belief that employees would not reasonably regard such conduct as a manifestation of the Respondent's support for the petition.

who was initiating and intended to circulate the petition at the time. When Simpson asked for editorial help, Hoffman drafted the wording of the petition and later supplied him with the mailing address of the Board's Resident Office in Albany. It is well established that conduct of this kind is mere ministerial assistance and clearly not violative. See, e.g., Washington Street Foundry, 268 NLRB 338 (1983); Cummins Component Plant, 259 NLRB 456, 461 (1981); Consolidated Rebuilders, 171 NLRB 1415, 1417 (1968). The factual situation in Cummins Component, supra, is quite relevant to the present case. While the Board did find a violation based on the respondent's assistance in circulating a decertification petition, it adopted the administrative law judge's dismissal of the allegation that respondent's supervisor provided illegal assistance to an employee by giving her the Board's telephone number and by directing her in the filling out of a decertification petition form. This was merely ministerial aid given at the employee's request. I do not see any significant distinction between the supervisor's legitimate activity in that case and Hoffman's conduct here.

Finally, we are left with the appearance of Hoffman's signature on the decertification petition as it circulated among some of the employees. It is fair to conclude from the judge's decision that this was the only aspect of Hoffman's conduct of which the other employees, besides Simpson, were aware. I would not find this meager circumstance a sound basis for finding a violation. There must be other, more convincing evidence that Hoffman was campaigning for the petition on the Respondent's behalf and that the other employees knew about and were influenced by such campaigning. As the record presently stands, it is conceivable that Hoffman's signing the petition was motivated by his personal attitude toward the Union distinct from any desire to represent the Respondent's views. Without more, the signature does not provide a fair basis to infer that the Respondent was sponsoring the petition.

In a case before the Second Circuit Court of Appeals, NLRB v. Monroe Tube Co., 545 F.2d 1320 (2d Cir. 1976), the court reviewed a situation similar to the instant case: an employer's allegedly illegal solicitation of an assistance to its employees in securing withdrawal of union authorization cards. The court denied enforcement of the Board's decision and order which found a violation of Section 8(a)(1). That denial was based on the court's reasoning that an employer's conduct in this kind of situation is not a violation per se; it must be judged in light of the relevant circumstances, especially other illegal activity on the employer's part. NLRB v. Monroe Tube Co., supra at 1325–28.

In the present case I fear that my colleagues are taking the same per se approach discredited by the Second Circuit Court. The Respondent is not alleged to have engaged in other unlawful conduct. And the judge's conglomeration of irrelevant and insubstantial circumstances simply does not establish sufficient evidence to sustain a violation. Since the judge's 8(a)(5) finding depends on the validity of the finding of illegal promotion and assistance, I would dismiss the complaint in its entirety.

DECISION

KARL H. BUSCHMANN, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried before on me on January 27 and 28, 1983, in Poughkeepsie, New York. The complaint, dated July 28, 1982, as subsequently amended, is based on a charge filed on December 28, 1981, by the Union. The complaint raises the principal issues of whether the Respondent, Lomasney Combustion, Inc., initiated or supported a decertification petition in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act) and whether it withdrew its recognition of the Union and refused to bargain with it in violation of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act. Respondent filed timely answers to the complaint and its amendments, admitting some of the jurisdictional aspects of the complaint and denying the commission of any unfair labor practices.

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after consideration of the briefs filed by the General Counsel and the Company, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

Respondent, Lomasney Combustion, Inc., is a New York corporation located at 366 Mill Street in Poughkeepsie, New York, where it is engaged in industrial heating and cooling service and installation. The Company is admittedly an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

The Union, Local 201, United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices of the Plumbing and Pipefitting Industry of Dutchess and Ulster Counties, New York, is admittedly a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act. On November 17, 1980, the Union was certified as the exclusive bargaining representative of Respondent's employees in a unit defined as follows:

> All full-time and regular part-time employees engaged in the sales, installation and servicing of heating and air conditioning units including all welders, electricians, plumbers, steamfitters, servicemen, sheetmetal workers, carpenters, laborers, shop repairmen and helpers employed by the Respondent at its Poughkeepsie, New York facility; excluding all office clerical employees and all professional employees and supervisors as defined in the Act.

Bargaining commenced in January 1981. After additional bargaining sessions thereafter, the parties met for the last time on November 17, 1980. Although the parties had agreed at that meeting to schedule additional sessions after the Thanksgiving holiday, the Union's repeated efforts in December to schedule another meeting were unsuccessful. The Company merely informed the Union that it was "going for a decertification" of the Union.[1] A decertification petition was circulated among Respondent's employees on November 23, 1981, by James Simpson, an employee of the Company. The petition, dated November 23, 1981, contains the names of 11 of Respondent's approximately 15 employees[2] and states as follows:

> Dear Sir:
> The men who have signed below are employees of Lomasney Combustion, Inc. who no longer wish to be represented by Local 201 of the United Association of The Plumbing and Pipefitting Industry of the United States and Canada.

Prior—about a month and a half—to circulating the petition for decertification on November 23, 1981, James Simpson approached James Lomasney, the owner and president of the Respondent, with a personal problem. Stating that his wife was ill and needed a major operation, Simpson expressed concern about the medical insurance coverage for his wife and asked Lomasney whether he would increase the health insurance. Lomasney replied that the Blue Cross-Blue Shield policy, then in effect, was the best policy he could get and that he could not increase such benefits to the employees while negotiating with the Union. Simpson then inquired if he could get the Union out and decertify it. Lomasney said, yes; but stated that he could not coerce the employees into writing a letter, and that he would have to be on his own. "Afterwards, [Simpson] thought about it and decided [he] wanted the union out if it was possible to vote them out and get them out. [He] would have to be the one to do it." (Tr. 209.)

In October, Kevin Lomasney, the president's son who was employed as a laborer, told the assembled group of employees in a meeting that the Company could not afford the Union and that his father would burn the place down before he would ever sign anything.[3] James Lomasney, the president, and David Lomasney, vice president and also a son of James, were not present when Kevin made that remark at the beginning of the meeting; but James subsequently said to his employees that he did not want the Union because the economic times were not right for it and that it would be beneficial for the employees if they were not represented by a union.[4]

Several weeks later, at Thanksgiving time, Vice President David Lomasney approached employee Timothy Hoysradt and said that one of the members of the Company intended to circulate a petition to have the Union removed from negotiations. He asked Hoysradt how he felt it would go, to which Hoysradt replied, "The would look like an ass."[5]

Nevertheless, James Simpson discussed the Union's decertification with Clinton Hoffman, Respondent's coordinator and admitted supervisor, after work one evening prior to November 23. He requested Hoffman's assistance in the wording of a decertification petition. Hoffman drafted the language. Simpson, after typing it at home, signed it and circulated it among the employees on the morning of November 23. In Kevin Lomasney's presence, Simpson asked each of the approximately 10 employees to sign the petition. When employees Hoysradt and van DeWater refused, Simpson warned that they better think about it. Kevin Lomasney made similar comments stating that everyone should seriously consider signing it. Under these circumstances Simpson obtained a total of 11 signatures. Among them, as fifth from the top, was Clinton Hoffman, who also provided Simpson with the correct mailing address of the Board's Office in Albany, New York. Simspon mailed the petition to the NLRB and had a copy of it placed in his personnel file at the Company by David Lomasney.

Justifying its failure to meet and bargain with the Union in December 1981 and thereafter, because of its busy season and because it refused to deal with people who make false accusations, Respondent denied any reliance on the decertification petition for its failure to bargain and submits that it was not involved in any way with the decertification petition. The General Counsel, however, argues that in several ways, Respondent was deeply involved in the decertification. First, the antiunion remarks by David and James Lomasney, made prior to the circulation of the petition, indicated to the employees that Respondent was behind the petition; second, Simpson and Kevin Lomasney appeared to the employees to act as Respondent's agent in their involvement with the petition and, third, the assistance by supervisor Hoffman in the preparation of the petition and his signature on it promoted the petition.

The law is clear, Section 8(a)(1) of the Act makes it unlawful for an employer to instigate or promote a decertification petition. NLRB v. Birmingham Publishing Co., 262 F.2d 2 (5th Cir. 1958); Marriott In-Flite Services, 258 NLRB 755, 768–769 (1981), enfd. 729 F.2d 1441 (2d Cir. 1983); Craftool Mfg. Co., 229 NLRB 634 (1977). While I disagree with the General Counsel that Simpson had a special relationship with the Lomasney family so as to qualify him as a supervisor or an agent of Respondent, I agree that Respondent was more than a neutral

[1] Respondent has denied its refusal to resume bargaining with the Union. Yet the record shows that the parties have not met since the November 18 session and that the Union had placed telephone calls to Respondent's office.

[2] The Regional Director dismissed the decertification petition on August 13, 1982.

[3] Timothy Hoysradt, a witness and former employee, testified about Kevin Lomasney's remark. Although several of Respondent's witnesses generally denied that the Union had ever been mentioned at the meeting, I credit Hoysradt's forthright testimony. Moreover, David Lomasney conceded that his brother had "shot his mouth off" on occasion about the Union.

[4] However, since only one witness out of several who heard the remarks recalled a specific promise of benefits, I have not credited that testimony.

[5] Hoysradt's testimony about this episode was not denied by the Respondent.

employer who passively assisted the decertification drive when requested to do so. James Lomasney in his remarks to the employees at the October meeting expressed his union animus and created the impression that it would be to the employees' advantage to avoid the Union. Moreover, David Lomasney's interrogation of Hoysradt shortly before the petition was circulated, conveyed to the employees the impression that Respondent had advance knowledge of the petition, had approved of the decertification, and had supported the effort. Finally, Hoffman's active assistance in drafting the petition, signing it, and of providing the address of the Board's office to Simpson was a clear signal to the employees that Respondent had approved and supported the decertification drive. As correctly observed by the General Counsel, Respondent's conduct, particularly when considered in its entirety, unlawfully interfered with the employees' rights guaranteed by Section 7 of the Act, and tainted the decertification so as to render it void.

However, I disagree with the General Counsel in the following areas: First the record does not contain any indicia of Kevin Lomasney's supervisory status nor his agency relationship with the Respondent, other than his filiation with James Lomasney. Since the record does not show that the latter was aware of Kevin's conduct at the meeting when he threatened the employees, Respondent had no duty to disavow those comments. The mere fact that Kevin was James Lomasney's son, without a further showing that Respondent had implicitly accepted his conduct or was at least aware of his conduct and thereafter failed to disavow it, or that he enjoyed a privileged status by reason of his filial relationship, does not establish an agency relationship necessary to support a finding of a violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Second, David Lomasney's interrogation of Hoysradt, apart from its unlawful effect on the decertification petition, did not amount to an independent violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, since the surrounding circumstances lacked the required coercive atmosphere. Third, the record does not support a finding that Simpson who initiated the petition was a supervisor or an agent of the Respondent, as alleged in the complaint. He possessed none of the indicia of a supervisor. The limited authority to hire day laborers on specific jobs and on rare occasions was not peculiar to his status at the Company, and it certainly had no relevance to the Respondent's relationship with the bargaining unit. Respondent may have had more than the normal interest in Simpson, because he as a youngster, had been a foster child in the Lomasney home for several years, and because Simpson was the most senior mechanic in the employ of Respondent. For example, Simpson parked his trailer on property leased from Lomasney, and on occasion performed personal service for Lomasney. Simpson may also have received more lenient treatment from his employer after several acts of misconduct on the job. In any case, it is not only difficult to gauge the extent to which Simpson received special treatment in a relatively small family enterprise such as Respondent but also whether his relationship with the Lomasneys was perceived by other employees as sufficiently unique so as to characterize it as an agency relationship; suffice it to say that on this record I cannot find that Simpson acted as Respondent's agent in circulating the petition.

Nevertheless, Respondent's conduct, as already described, sufficed to taint the petition and render it void. Moreover, it is clear that Respondent relied on the decertification effort, in which it played a significant part in order to avoid bargaining with the Union. It is clear that absent special circumstances which are not present here, a union's representative status is presumed to continue during the first year following certification. Thereafter, an employer may lawfully withdraw recognition but only on a demonstration of a well grounded, good-faith belief that the Union's majority support no longer exists. Respondent has not made the required showing here. Significantly, Respondent cannot hope to avoid his duty to bargain by relying on the decertification effort in which it had unlawfully participated. Nor can Respondent escape its responsibility in reaction to the Union's protected ability in filing a charge with the NLRB. See Marriott In-Flite Services, supra.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Lomasney Combustion, Inc. is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. Local 201, United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices of the Plumbing and Pipefitting Industry of Dutchess and Ulster Counties, New York, is and has been a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. All full-time and regular part-time employees engaged in the sales, installation, and servicing of heating and air conditioning units including all welders, electricians, plumbers, steamfitters, servicemen, sheetmetal workers, carpenters, laborers, shop repairmen, and helpers employed by Respondent at its Poughkeepsie, New York facility; excluding all office clerical employees and all professional employees and supervisors as defined in the Act, constitute a unit appropriate for the purpose of collective bargaining within the meaning of of the Act.

4. By support, sponsoring, and participating among its employees a petition to decertify the Union, Respondent coerced its employees in the exercise of these rights guaranteed by Section 7 of the Act and thereby violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

5. By failing and refusing to recognize and bargain with the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative of the employees in the unit described above, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.

6. The violations are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

7. Respondent has not otherwise violated the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act, my recommended order will require Respondent to cease and desist therefrom and to take such affirmative action as will effectuate the purposes of the Act, including the resumption of bargaining with the Union.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[6]

ORDER

The Respondent, Lomasney Combustion, Inc., Poughkeepsie, New York, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing or failing to meet and bargain in good faith with the Union as the exclusive representative of the employees in the following bargaining unit:

> All full-time and regular part-time employees engaged in the sales, installation and servicing of heating and air conditioning units including all welders, electricians, plumbers, steamfiftters, servicemen, sheetmetal workers, carpenters, laborers, shop repairmen and helpers employed by the Respondent at its Poughkeepsie, New York facility; excluding all office clerical employees and all professional employees and supervisor as defined in the Act.

(b) Participating, encouraging, assisting, or sponsoring any efforts by employees to decertify the Union as their exclusive bargaining representative in order to avoid its obligation to recognize and bargain with the Union.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) On request, bargain collectively and in good faith with the Union as the exclusive representative of the employees in the above-described unit with respect to wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment and, on request, embody in a signed agreement any final understanding reached by the parties.

(b) Post at its facilities in Poughkeepsie, New York, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[7] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 3, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(c) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT refuse or fail to meet and bargain in good faith with the Union as the exclusive representative of our employees in the following bargaining unit:

> All full-time and regular part-time employees engaged in the sales, installation and servicing of heating and air conditioning units including all welders, electricians, plumbers, steamfitters, servicemen, sheetmetal workers, carpenters, laborers, shop repairmen and helpers employed by the Respondent at its Poughkeepsie, New York facility; excluding all office clerical employees and all professional employees and supervisors as defined in the Act.

WE WILL NOT participate, encourage, assist, or sponsor any efforts by employees to decertify the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL, on request, meet and bargain in good faith with the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative of the employees in the above-described unit with respect to wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment, and on request, embody in a signed agreement any final understanding reached by the parties.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND DENNIS

On 12 May 1981 Administrative Law Judge Joel A. Harmatz issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed a brief in response to the Respondent's exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions[2] and to adopt the recommended Order.

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings. Nor do we find merit in the Respondent's contention that, because the judge generally discredited the Respondent's witnesses and credited the General Counsel's witnesses, his credibility resolutions are erroneous or attended by bias or prejudice. NLRB v. Pittsburgh Steamship Co., 337 U.S. 656 (1949). Likewise, we find no merit in the Respondent's further contention that the judge demonstrated bias when, in an off-the-record discussion prior to hearing, he expressed an opinion regarding the ultimate merits of the case. In this respect, even assuming the incident occurred as alleged, we note that the Respondent did not object on the record to the alleged discussion and did not comply with our procedures for requesting disqualification of a judge. Sec. 102.37, Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board. See Sanford Home for Adults, 253 NLRB 1132 fn. 1 (1981), enfd. 669 F.2d 35 (2d Cir. 1981); Canal Electric Co., 245 NLRB 1090 fn. 2 (1979). Indeed, upon careful examination of the judge's decision and the entire record in this proceeding, we are satisfied that the Respondent was accorded a full and fair hearing and that its allegations of bias and prejudice are without merit.

[2] We agree with the ultimate conclusion reached by the judge that the strike-related misconduct here found does not rise to a level which would warrant depriving the Union of its collective-bargaining status. In so holding, we find it unnecessary to pass on the observations made by the judge in his discussion of Laura Modes Co., 144 NLRB 1592 (1963), and its progeny, particularly those set forth in the first four paragraphs of the "Concluding Analysis" section of his decision. Indeed, because the conduct here in question does not rise to a level which would otherwise warrant invoking the Laura Modes doctrine, we need not, nor do we, pass on the applicability of that doctrine to postelection misconduct by a union generally.

Chairman Dotson agrees that the conduct attributed to the Union is not of such a character as to warrant revocation of its certification and thus he would not deprive the employees of their elected collective-bargaining representative. However, picket line misconduct engaged in by union agents Bill Dennison and Connie Brown is serious enough that he would not require the Respondent to bargain with Dennison and Brown in matters related to terms and conditions of employment for the Respondent's employees.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Honaker Mills, Division of Top Form Mills, Inc., Honaker, Virginia, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JOEL A. HARMATZ, Administrative Law Judge. This proceeding derives from an original unfair labor practice charge filed on August 15, 1979, and a complaint issued on September 27, 1979, alleging that Honaker Mills, Division of Top Form Mills, Inc.[1] (Respondent) violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by refusing to meet and bargain in good faith with the Charging Party pursuant to a National Labor Relations Board certification issued on June 6, 1979, designating said Union as exclusive collective-bargaining representative in an appropriate unit. Said complaint further alleged that a strike, which commenced about July 24, 1979, in which certain employees in the aforesaid unit participated, was caused and prolonged by the aforesaid unfair labor practice, and hence was an unfair labor practice strike.

Evidence of the Union's majority herein stems from an underlying representation proceeding. Thus, pursuant to an election petition filed on June 21, 1978, in Case 5-RC-10511, seeking a unit of production and maintenance employees at the Employer's Honaker, Virginia plant, an election was conducted on August 18, 1978. The tally showed that of approximately 207 eligible voters, there was 1 void ballot, with 124 valid ballots cast for representation by the Charging Party and 72 against. There were five challenged ballots which were insufficient to affect the results. Thereafter, the Employer filed timely objections to the election. On September 29, 1978, the Acting Regional Director for Region 5 issued a "Report on Objections and Notice of Hearing" in which certain objections were overruled, and others deemed to have raised material issues of fact warranting an evidentiary hearing. Pursuant to notice, a hearing on objections was conducted before Hearing Officer John M. Glynn on October 18 and December 19, 1978. Thereafter, on February 2, 1979, the aforesaid hearing officer issued his report, recommending that all remaining objections be overruled in their entirety, and that a certification of representative be issued. The Employer filed timely exceptions thereto, and on June 6, 1979, the Board issued a "Decision and Certification of Representative," adopting the hearing officer's findings and recommendations and certifying the Charging Party as the exclusive representative.

[1] The name of Respondent appears as amended at the hearing. It is of no small interest that Respondent objected to this correction on grounds that its due process right to personal service was offended inasmuch as the original papers in this proceeding named "Honaker Mills Corporation" as Respondent.

In its original answer, Respondent denied that any unfair labor practices were committed, setting forth affirmative defense to the effect that the election conducted by the National Labor Relations Board in Case 5–RC–10511 was invalid and, accordingly, the Union had not been designated by a majority of Respondent's employees in a "free and untrammeled" election.

With the issues so framed, on November 26, 1979, the General Counsel filed a "Motion for Summary Judgment" on grounds that Respondent should not be permitted to litigate in this proceeding issues previously considered by the Board in the prior representation proceedings and therefore requesting the Board to continue the proceeding before it and to grant summary judgment and conclude as a matter of law that Respondent had violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

On December 4, 1979, the Board issued an "Order Transferring Proceedings to the Board and Notice to Show Cause," as to why it should not grant the relief requested by the General Counsel.

Thereafter, Respondent filed an amended answer to the complaint, dated December 21, 1979, which for the first time, raised the following:

> Respondent sets forth affirmatively that the union has committed numerous coercive acts of violence and intimidation against respondent and its supervisors and employees. These coercive acts include, but are not limited to, engaging in mass picketing so as to block ingress and egress to respondent's plant, blocking the right-of-way, intimidating and threatening employees, scattering nails in front of respondent's plant, throwing paint and acid and scratching with sharp objects and tire slashing of the cars of non-striking employees, and other coercive acts too numerous to mention. Due to an atmosphere of fear and coercion generated by the unlawful conduct, the respondent submits that the union is unfit to represent the employees of the respondent and that it is not entitled to the benefit of a bargaining order and that the certification should be revoked. The respondent further submits that the union should be denied the right to invoke the Board's statutory processes in aid of its demand for recognition until an appropriate time when the employees are able to demonstrate their desires in an atmosphere free from coercion, and the union proves its majority among those employees through a new election.[2]

Also on December 21, 1979, Respondent incorporated the above in its response to the Notice to Show Cause, urging that a hearing is required on "newly discovered or previously unavailable evidence."

By order dated March 6, 1980, the Board denied the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment and remanded said proceeding to the Regional Director for Region 5 for further appropriate action. In doing so, the Board concluded that issues of fact existed with respect to (1) allegations that the strike was caused and prolonged by Respondent's unfair labor practices, and (2) assertions by Respondent that the Charging Party is unfit to represent Respondent's employees in view of mass picketing and numerous acts of violence and intimidation which occurred in the course of said strike.[3]

Pursuant to the foregoing, a hearing in this matter was conducted before me in Lebanon, Virginia, on August 21 and October 6, 7, 8, and 9, 1980. Following close of the hearing, briefs were filed on behalf of the General Counsel and Respondent.[4]

---

[2] In its original answer dated October 5, 1979, Respondent denied par. 8 of the complaint which alleged as follows:

> On or about July 24, 1979, certain employees in the unit described above in paragraph 5 ceased work concertedly and commenced a strike against Respondent.

[3] In its posthearing brief, Respondent argues that the Board denial of summary judgment requires collateral review herein of all issues going to the validity of the election and the Union's certification, including alleged preelection conduct on the part of the Union and alleged procedural unfairness committed by the Board in the investigation of the Employer's objections to the election. There is no merit in this view. Said issues were in a summary fashion rejected by the Board in adopting the hearing officer's report on objections in Case 5-RC-10511. See G.C. Exh. 2. The present effort on Respondent's part to relitigate these preelection matters is unsupported by a showing of previously unavailable or newly discovered evidence. See Pittsburgh Glass Co. v. NLRB, 313 U.S. 146, 162 (1941), and Rules and Regulations of the National Labor Relations Board, Secs. 102.67(f) and 102.69(c). Nor is there merit in Respondent's contention that the Board implicitly paved the way for redetermination of these issues in directing a hearing and denying the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment. It is true that the Board in directing a hearing in this unfair labor practice proceeding, states as follows:

> The Board has duly considered the matter and is of the opinion that there are issues of fact, including the nature of the strike and whether violence was in fact committed, which may best be resolved at a hearing conducted before an administrative law judge. [Emphasis added.]

Contrary to Respondent, that direction by the Board fails to sanction new findings on matters disposed of with finality in the underlying representation case. The Board's direction of a hearing was preceded by explicit reference confined to Respondent's contentions based on the Charging Party's alleged improprieties during the course of the strike which began on July 24, 1979, a date well after the election and a month after certification of the Union by the National Labor Relations Board. The language utilized by the Board in denying summary judgment and defining the scope of this hearing, at best, from Respondent's point of view, was tailored to issues concerning "the nature of the strike" and "whether violence was in fact committed," and beyond that only such matters as would be supported by newly discovered and previously unavailable evidence. Absent specific direction from the Board, it would be ulture vires were I to enlarge the proceeding in a manner contravening Pittsburgh Glass v. NLRB, supra, and the Board's own Rules.

[4] The General Counsel, in its posthearing brief, for the first time announced that he was seeking partial reimbursement to the Board and the Union for reasonable counsel fees, salaries, witness fees, transcript and record costs, printing costs, and other costs and expenses to be determined at the compliance stage. Thereafter, Respondent filed a supplemental brief with respect to this limited remedial matter. By telegram dated February 9, 1981, the General Counsel opposed Respondent's request to file an answering brief on the following grounds:

> 1. The Board's rules and regulations do not provide for the filing of answering briefs before the Administrative Law Judge.
> The Administrative Law Judge indicated at the hearing that he would consider a partial reimbursement remedy if the Respondent relied on frivolous defenses, and
> 3. Respondent's request for permission to file an answering brief was submitted 18 days after the closing date for the receipt of posthearing briefs.

It is my opinion that ordinary conceptions of fairness demand in this instance that Respondent's election to respond be upheld. Firstly, receipt of Respondent's answering brief has not unduly delayed resolution of the merits of this proceeding. Furthermore the General Counsel, though well aware of the positions taken by Respondent, which it now claims to have

On the foregoing, and the entire record in this proceeding,[5] including the posthearing brief, and the opportunity to observe directly the demeanor of the witnesses while testifying, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. THE BUSINESS OF RESPONDENT

Respondent Honaker Mills, Division of Top Form Mills, Inc. is a New York corporation engaged in the manufacture of women's and children's apparel at its Honaker, Virginia plant. During the 12 months preceding issuance of the complaint, a representative period, Respondent sold and shipped in interstate commerce goods and services valued in excess of $50,000 to customers located outside the Commonwealth of Virginia.

The complaint alleges, the answer, with stipulations entered at the hearing, admits, and I find that Respondent is and has been at all times material herein an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The complaint alleges, the Respondent stipulated at the hearing, and it is found that International Ladies Garment Workers Union, Upper South Department, AFL–CIO is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Issues

1. Whether Respondent unlawfully refused to bargain in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by withholding recognition and failing to bargain with the Union as the certified representative of production and maintenance employees at its Honaker plant.

2. Whether a strike, which commenced on July 24, 1979, caused and prolonged by said refusal to bargain, constitutes an unfair labor practice strike.

3. If paragraph 1, above, is answered in the affirmative, were acts of violence and coercion committed in the course of the aforesaid strike to a degree sufficient to find that the Union is unfit to hold the status of exclusive statutory representative in accordance with Laura Modes, 144 NLRB 1592 (1963), and related cases.

B. Concluding Findings

1. The refusal to bargain

Following designation of the Union by a majority of the employees in the appropriate unit on August 18, 1978, the Union was certified as exclusive statutory representative on June 6, 1979.

By mailgram dated June 20, 1979,[6] the Union notified the Respondent as follows:

> Pursuant to the National Labor Relations Board's certification I hereby request that you contact me so that we can set a date to negotiate a contact [sic] in behalf of the employees at Honaker Mills.
> If we do not hear from you by Friday, June 29, 1979 I will assume that your lack of communication indicates an unwillingness to negotiate and we will be forced to take appropriate action.[7]

By letter dated June 26, 1979, Respondent, through Plant Manager Joe Hooker, informed the Union as follows:

> I have received your mailgram of 6–20–79 and have forwarded it to appropriate Company Officials and Company counsel. However, it may not be possible for you to receive a reply to your request by the June 29, deadline which you mentioned.[8]

As of July 24, a month had lapsed since the Union's request. Apart from Hooker's letter of June 26, the Company's posture was one of silence. On July 24, a strike commenced at the Honaker plant. Thereafter, while still declining to offer a further response to the Union, Respondent by letter dated July 31, 1979, explained its position to employees in the following terms:

> As you know the Union has called a strike because Honaker Mills has refused to bargain with it. The reason we have refused to bargain is that we believe the National Labor Relations Board Regional Office determination was wrong and that the Honaker employees are entitled to a fair and proper vote free from union threats and union harassment. The only way we can appeal and get review of this in Washington is to refuse to bargain. We think we deserve our day in court on the issue.[9]

At no time since the Union's request of June 20 has Respondent communicated its position directly to the been frivolously maintained, did not at any time prior to the close of the hearing or under circumstances affording notice of its intentions raise the claim for extraordinary relief. While it is true that very early in the hearing I cautioned counsel, pointing out that delays on the basis of frivolous contentions would not be tolerated, while alluding to the possibility of a partial remedy pursuant to Tiidee Products, 194 NLRB 1234 (1972), in the interest of protecting the integrity of the proceeding, said reference by me was couched in terms of warning, which, considering the time and circumstance in which that statement was made, would not necessarily have been construed by Respondent as giving rise to extant issue. The issue belatedly raised by the General Counsel calls for extraordinary relief on a partial basis, lacking direct support in precedent and, hence, Respondent has been permitted to address the question.

[5] The record herein has been reopened to receive into evidence stipulated testimony of Cecille Vest. This segment of Vest's testimony was actually afforded before me on October 7, 1980. However, through error of the reporting service, the testimony of the latter was erased prior to inclusion in the official transcript. By motion dated January 5, 1981, the General Counsel sought to reopen the record to receive as Jt. Exh. 1, the agreement of the parties as to the testimony in question. Based thereon, I reopened the record and received Jt. Exh. 1. However, while rulings are accurately reflected therein, further comments attributed to me are deleted as they fail to reflect context fully and are not verbatim reconstructions.

Union or otherwise expressed a willingness to negotiate and bargain.

Prior to the aforesaid refusal to bargain, all issues going to the validity of the certification based on the Union's alleged objectionable conduct during the preelection period had been overruled in Case 5–RC–10511. With respect to those issues, no effort has been made in this proceeding to elicit evidence of misconduct on the part of the Union prior to the aforesaid election which was newly discovered or previously unavailable and which would require the Board to reexamine the certification issue in the underlying representation proceeding.

Nevertheless, Respondent seeks dismissal of the 8(a)(5) allegation on the basis of a discrepancy in the Board's description of the appropriate unit appearing in the Certification of Representative issued on June 6, 1979. By way of background, it is noted that the election conducted herein was pursuant to a Stipulation for Certification Upon Consent Election, wherein the parties agreed that the following constituted the appropriate unit:

> All production and maintenance employees employed at the Employer's Honaker, Virginia location; but excluding office clerical employees, technicians, sales people, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

Said unit description appeared in that exact form in the notices of election, pursuant to which employees cast their ballots in the election held on August 18, 1978. Further, in both the Report on Objections and the hearing officer's report, the appropriate unit was described in those precise terms. However, on June 6, 1979, when the Board adopted the hearing officer's findings and recommendations and certified the Union, it defined the following as the appropriate unit:

> All production and maintenance employees employed at the Employer's Honaker, Virginia location; but excluding office employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

Further, the complaint issued by the Regional Director on September 27, 1979, repeated this erroneous description of the unit.

Respondent contends that the omission of the excluded categories of "technicians, sales people, professional employees" constitutes a fatal flaw in this proceeding. On this ground, Respondent seeks to negate the obvious choice made by its employees pursuant to statutory procedures.

With respect to the erroneous definition of the unit it was not until August 12, 1980, that the Regional Director for Region 5 sought Board amendment of the certification to include the omitted exclusions. Thereafter, on August 21, 1980, at the instant hearing Respondent, in seeking dismissal on this ground, was sharply critical of the General Counsel's failure to act with greater dispatch in this regard as stated by Attorney Spelfogel on behalf on Respondent:

> We would like to move to dismiss the complaint in this case on the grounds that there is a defective certification. The underlying representation proceeding certification is significantly different from the bargaining unit which the parties stipulated to—significantly different from the bargaining unit in which an election was held.
> This discrepancy has been a matter of public knowledge for at least eight months, when in opposition to a motion for Summary Judgment, the respondent expressly stated in its papers these facts.
>
> The Regional Director has acknowledged the discrepancy and finds the discrepancy so significant that it feels obliged to make a Special Motion to the National Labor Relations Board in Washington to amend and change the Certification.
> We have opposed that request to the National Labor Relations Board and this morning, just before the opening of this hearing, I was advised by the Executive Secretary in Washington that the Board would entertain briefs and arguments on the question and take the matter under advisement.
> Under the circumstances, I think the admission by the Regional Director that the matter is so significant to warrant the unusual request to amend at this late date—some eight months after this matter was brought to his attention at the opening hearing, and the fact that there is this discrepancy, we submit that the complaint should be dismissed, that the respondent cannot be ordered to bargain in a unit which is significantly different from the unit in which the election was held.

At this juncture, I note that it is difficult to subscribe to the view of Spelfogel that the matter was previously raised in the response to show cause so as to alert others as to the defect. Indeed, the cryptic reference to the matter in that document hardly matches the clarity and single-mindedness with which Respondent's position was articulated to me at the hearing and in a formal motion to dismiss, dated September 4, 1980, which recited as follows:

> The Respondent moves that the complaint in Case No. 5–CA–11305 be dismissed on the ground that the charge and complaint are contingent upon an erroneous certification of the bargaining unit by the National Labor Relations Board.

Respondent's response to the Board's Notice to Show Cause was a six-page document enumerating a variety of grounds on which summary judgment should be denied. The only reference therein to a controversy with respect to the unit was expressed as follows:

> Respondent states that the entity named in the charge and complaint is not a corporate entity subject to process, nor is the unit set forth in the complaint an appropriate unit or a unit stipulated to by respondent. The Board is not precluded from reexamining representation issues where there is newly discovered or previously unavailable evidence or sufficiently changed circumstances or where the > parties do not object. City Motor Co., Inc., 214 NLRB No. 38 (1974). Moreover, a bargaining order may not be enforced in an inappropriate unit, NLRB v. Metropolitan Petroleum Co., 506 F.2d 616 (CA 1, 1974), and to the extent that the election stipulation is ambiguous, there is no meeting of the minds so as to require a remand in order to give the parties another chance to stipulate to an appropriate unit. Buckley Southland Oil, 210 NLRB No. 145 (1974). An examination of the stipulated unit and the unit cited in the complaint reveal such discrepancies warranting remand and/or a hearing. In addition, as previously stated, the respondent states that "Honaker Mills Corporation" is not an entity subject to service of process and specifically controverts any contrary allegations in the complaint.

As should be apparent from the foregoing, the reference to the unit discrepancy was not highlighted, but intertwined with another line of argument pertaining to the complaint's misidentification of Respondent.[10] In addition, while Respondent at the time was seeking to avoid summary judgment, and did state that "An examination of the stipulated unit and the unit cited in the complaint reveal such discrepancies warranting remand and/or a hearing." definition of the nature of the error was not articulated. Indeed, the quoted statement itself is misleading as to the exact basis for the challenge to the unit insofar as Respondent urges "remand and/or a hearing." For as Respondent has consistently maintained before me, the discrepancy of which it speaks would obviate further hearing and warrant outright dismissal. No such claim was made to the Board, though if substantial, such would be the only appropriate disposition. The instant motion is unaided by Respondent's assertion that the "discrepancy has been a matter of public knowledge for at least eight months" prior to the effort by the General Counsel to rectify the error.[11]

In any event, on October 3, 1980, the Board granted the Regional Director's request to amend the certification, but declined to address itself to the motion to dismiss. In support of the latter, Respondent now claims that, because the faulty certification was in effect both at the time of the Union's June 20 demand for negotiations and at the time of the alleged refusal to bargain, no 8(a)(5) violation can be found based on Respondent's conduct at that time.

However, the above contention is unsupported by evidence that said inadvertence created confusion, misunderstanding, or uncertainty as to the scope of the Union's demand. Indeed, were such a claim made it would be difficult to honor, in the circumstances, as genuinely maintained. For on July 31 Respondent, during the first week of the strike, conveyed to its employees the justification for its refusal to confer recognition. That expression was clear-cut, lacking in open endedness, and related exclusively to the disposition of Respondent's objections by the National Labor Relations Board Regional Office. The message afforded employees was unambiguous and hardly susceptible to an interpretation suggesting that the extant unit description presented any problem.[12] Furthermore, every indication on this record confirms that the election was conducted pursuant to consent of the parties concerning the appropriate scope of the unit as well as excluded categories and nothing appears in their subsequent conduct suggesting a shift in position inconsistent with the unit set forth in the preelection stipulation, the notice of election, the Report on Objections, and the hearing officer's report.

This proceeding arises under authority of remedial legislation designed by Congress to vindicate public rights. The Board's error, if objectively viewed by those with only slight acquaintance with Board practices, procedures, and policies, would readily be ascribed to editorial oversight or perhaps even typographical miscue. Could there have been any other possible explanation? None is offered by Respondent, nor is one suggested from my own imagination.

Although Respondent speaks in terms of its being penalized by the subsequent correction of this error, this would have been true had it adopted a course of action in direct reliance on the Board's error.[13] However, on the face of the history of this proceeding, it would be ludicrous to assume that recognition would have been conferred were it not for the erroneous unit description. Objective fact attests, beyond peradventure, to the multitude of issues raised by Respondent in contesting the validity of the certification. It is difficult to imagine that these separate and independent matters would have been scuttled had the unit description been accurately transcribed at every turn. But more compelling is the fact that Respondent elected not to communicate with the Union in response to the latter's demand for recognition and took a strike in two plants rather than seek clarification of any extant ambiguity which it apparently claims to have influenced its course of action.

The employees in this case had designated the Union in a secret-ballot election. The National Labor Relations Board reviewed the Union's conduct during the preelection period and in effect concluded that said election was conducted in an atmosphere devoid of coercive influences. At the time of the certification, I infer, on the total record, that Respondent was fully mindful that the unit discrepancy was inadvertent, that the Union was not seeking representation of sales, technical, and professional employees, that the Board was not seeking sua sponte to compel such representation, and that the Union's demand merely entailed assertion of representational interests within the confines of the employee grouping which provided the overwhelming mandate at the polls. To find otherwise would defy reality. Accordingly, I find no merit in Respondent's claim that the inadvertent

[10] The General Counsel's characterization of the reference as "oblique" conforms with my view. See G.C. Exh. 1(u), p. 2.

[11] One possible explanation for the delay is offered by Respondent itself:

> . . . a reasonable inference may be drawn that the General Counsel noticed the mistake in certification during his final pretrial preparation, and immediately asked the Regional Director to request the amendment. [See R. Br. p. 37 fn. 6.]

[12] See G.C. Exh. 5.

[13] See, e.g. American Broadcasting Co., 134 NLRB 1458 (1961).

omission of sales, technical, and professional classifications from the exclusionary section of the unit definition furnished a defense to its conduct beginning in June 1979, and thereafter continuing through a 4-month strike, and this unfair labor practice proceeding.[14]

Based on the foregoing, I find that since June 6, 1979, the Union has represented a majority of Respondent's employees in the appropriate unit and by refusing to recognize and negotiate with the Union in such capacity, Respondent has since June 20, 1979, violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

2. The strike and its nature

Following the aforesaid refusal to bargain, employees on July 24, 1979, commenced a strike against Respondent. The complaint alleged that Honaker employees participating therein were unfair labor practice strikers, because the strike was caused and prolonged by Respondent's unlawful refusal to bargain. The strike ended in mid-November 1979, and the parties stipulated at the hearing that all strikers who sought reinstatement were reinstated to their former positions upon cessation of their individual strike action. As alleged in the complaint it is concluded, based on the credible testimony of William Dennison[15] and the entire record, that the sole cause of the strike from inception to terminus was Respondent's refusal to recognize the Union. Hence, I find that it was an unfair labor practice strike at all times material.

3. The Laura Modes issue

As should be apparent, this proceeding presents a further hurdle in an organizational effort which began in December 1977. In August 1978, it seemingly culminated when in a Board election a substantial majority opted for union representation. However, litigation of the Employer's objections to the election deferred certification until June 1979. This refusal to confer recognition and bargain in 1979 has been deemed unlawful. Yet, it is now 1981, and almost 4 years after the Section 7 rights were first asserted at Honaker; the question still exists as to whether employee choice will be enforced by a Board remedy.

Ordinarily, an employer's dishonor of such a certification is speedily resolved through a summary enforcement proceeding. Here, the Board deemed such a course of action inapropriate, on the basis of assertions that "the Charging Party . . . has committed numerous coercive acts of violence and intimidation against Respondent and its supervisors and employees during a strike against the Respondent at its plant in Honaker, Virginia." This claim was viewed as raising material issues of fact under the principle set forth in Laura Modes Co., 144 NLRB 1592 (1963). Prior to Laura Modes, the regulation of misconduct on the part of a labor organization by the Board was effected exclusively under Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act, and through the statutory policy of permitting employers to decline lawfully to reinstate striking employees who engaged in serious misconduct. In addition, nonadministrative relief included civil and criminal restraints and restraining orders available through the courts in the interest of maintaining peaceful and violent-free picketing. In Laura Modes, the conventional arsenal was augmented by a new concept whereby the Board would decline relief under Section 8(a)(5) to labor organizations which exhibit "a total disinterest in enforcing . . . representation rights through the peaceful legal process provided by the Act," but instead resort "to and/or encourage . . . the use of violent tactics to compel their grant."[16] Thus, in appropriate circumstances, notwithstanding that a pattern of violence was set in motion by an employer's own illegal conduct, no remedy is afforded to impel bargaining, but the statutory representative instead is required to again demonstrate "its majority among . . . employees to the Board's election procedures."

Prior findings herein make it clear that in the instant case the Laura Modes issue arises on the heels of a certification, a Board election, and a strike which began a full month after the Union's demand for recognition had gone unheeded, with Respondent failing to reply as to whether it would or would not confer recognition. Nonetheless, by direction of the Board herein, the misconduct properly attributable to the Charging Party and its agents must be balanced against the unfair labor practices which provoked the strike and its consequences, as basic to the determination of whether the results of the election will finally be enforced by Board remedy.

Before assessing the facts offered in substantiation of Respondent's contention it is necessary to point out my agreement with Respondent that misconduct, in connection with a strike and picketing at another nearby operating division of Respondent, herein called the Russell plant, is relevant to the inquiry. The latter was located in Lebanon, Virginia, about a half hour's drive from Honaker. Since 1978, the Charging Party had been actively engaged in an organizational drive at the Russell plant. In support of the effort at Honaker, the Charging Party initiated a strike at Russell on July 25, the day after the strike began at the former. The Russell picketing was part and parcel of a concerted effort in furtherance of the dispute at Honaker as evidenced by the movement of pickets on a regular basis from one location to the other, unified demonstrations and common responsibility exercised by union representatives with respect to both sites.[17] Indeed, Bill Dennison, the union organizer, charged with immediate responsibility for both picket lines, described the overall effort as a "coordinated strike . . . for the purpose of putting pressure on the Honaker plant."

Respondent attempted to substantiate its Laura Modes defense through almost 50 witnesses, who testified to their experiences both proximate to and away from each of the picket lines. A detectable tendency to exaggerate was reflected on the part of certain of these witnesses. At the same time, those presented by the General Counsel seemed prone to mitigate certain aspects of the conduct under scrutiny. In any event, an overview of the facts shows that the strike continued for almost 4 months, ending in mid-November. Both plants continued to operate throughout and there is no evidence of significant disruptions in production. At no time during the strike did Respondent seek to quell untoward conduct on the part of strike participants through temporary restraining orders. In addition, no charges were filed against the Union under Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act. Despite the wealth of evidence adduced on behalf of Respondent, there is no direct proof that company property was violated by trespass on the part of any union official involved,[18] striker, or strike sympathizer, or that company property was vandalized or damaged in any fashion.[19] Indeed, although nonstrikers during the course of the strike crossed the picket lines from two to four times daily, it does not appear that weapons, clubs, or other paraphernalia of harm were brandished by those supporting the strike or that those continuing to work were the object of any form of physical assault. There was no clear evidence that pickets engaged in mass picketing, blocking ingress and egress at either plant. Testimony does persuasively establish that the strikers and others on the picket line expressed their displeasure at the fact that, as the strikers withheld their labor and sacrificed their earnings, others took their jobs. This often took the form of name calling, which from time to time included profanities and threats.[20] The more serious trepidations at the picket line consisted of a single incident in which a tire was flattened when a striker threw tacks under a nonstriker's vehicle, the attachment of a sticker on a vendor's vehicle, and the "tailing" of nonstrikers under conditions which, with one exception, was lacking in independent manifestation of harassment.

[14] Cf. H.M. Patterson & Son, Inc., 245 NLRB 1412 (1979), where the Board's correction of a unit description in a certification was followed by a new demand, charge, and 8(a)(5) complaint.

The most compelling evidence offered in support of the Laura Modes issue consists of serious offenses of anonymous origin to property visited upon nonstrikers at locations remote from the picketed sites, but occurring during the course of the strike. However, no clear credible evidence exists linking such offenses to union representatives, strikers, or their allies.

a. Conduct at the picket lines

(1) By nonemployee union representatives

John Downing was an organizer for the Upper South Department of the ILGWU. He was not present on a regular basis in the Honaker-Lebanon area during the strike. He was implicated in alleged misconduct by two witnesses for Respondent. Nonstriker Fayne Rhea testified that on the first day of the strike Downing, as a vehicle in which she was riding approached the picket lines, "got out in the road . . . waving his hands and hollering 'stop.'" Nothing improper is suggested by this description of Downing's conduct. Although Rhea testified vaguely that Downing "got out in the road," the vehicle in which Rhea was riding passed without incident, and her testimony does not clearly establish that Downing assumed a position on the road calculated reasonably to block Rhea's access.

The only other incident pertaining to Downing was an effort to link him circumstantially with the discovery of roofing nails in the driveway of a resident of a trailer park situated across the road from the Honaker plant. In this regard, Edna Lester, a nonemployee and the operator of the trailer park, claimed that in late July or early August she discovered roofing nails behind her car. Lester testified that about a week later she observed Downing and 10 or 12 other pickets passing through her driveway inside the trailer park. According to Lester, "I figured that they had more nails, so I . . . [followed] them." The group was in route to the Union's trailer which was located on property adjacent to the trailer park. Patsy White was another resident of the trailer park and a nonstriking Honaker employee.[21] According to Lester, she observed roofing nails in White's driveway identical to those that she had removed from her own driveway during the prior week. Lester asserted that she later observed two women in Downing's group returning through the trailer park. She claimed to have hollered to them "don't come back over my property . . . this is private property and you already threw enough nails on my property and don't come back."[22] Her testimony implies that she failed to identify those responsible for the strewing of tacks in her driveway. Although she admitted to having followed Downing and the others prior to her discovery of tacks in the driveway of White, she acknowledged that she did not observe how those tacks got there.[23] Although I have serious reservations con-

[18] There was evidence that an individual suspected as a "union representative," apparently employed by an ILGWU shop, accompanied a truckdriver from that firm to the property of Respondent. When his presence was discovered, the individual was asked to leave, and did so without incident.

[19] There was testimony that in the course of the strike, shots were fired at a water tower at the Russell plant. The evidence that damage was done to the water tower was in the form of uncorroborated hearsay. Further, testimony offered in connection with this entire incident is suspect insofar as it represents an attempt to link the incident with the strike action.

[20] Witnesses for the General Counsel testified that curse words were not used. In the total circumstances, this testimony was a bit too cleansing and, considering the emotional nature of the conduct under scrutiny herein, was regarded as inhuman and implausible.

[21] Lester testified that her daughter who lives in a different trailer but rents that trailer space from Lester was an employee of Honaker who continued to work throughout the strike. No tacks or nails were placed in her daughter's driveway.

[22] Mary Charles, a striker at Honaker, testified that certain pickets and Downing did in fact cut across the trailer park that day to attend a Hardship Committee meeting at the Union's trailer. She testified that after the meeting, as several of the pickets returned through the trailer park, Lester reached down and picked up a rock, stating, in reference to Downing, who apparently was not present, "if that black son-of-bitch comes back up through here, I'll kill him." Lester did not squarely contradict Charles in this regard.

[23] Patsy White confirmed that tacks were in her driveway on the day in question.

cerning the credibility of Lester, even assuming that the facts were as she related, her account does not persuasively implicate Downing in any misconduct. While on balance, since she was corroborated by White, I accept her testimony that nails or tacks were scattered on the driveway of the latter, the identity of the individual or individuals responsible for this act is not established, and no reasonable basis exists for imputing responsibility to an employee or nonemployee representative of the Union. It is noted that, except for this single instance, there was no repetition of any violation of the property or persons of the nonstriking employees who resided in the nearby trailer park.

Bill Dennison was the ILGWU nonemployee organizer in charge of both Honaker and Russell plants. He regularly served in the area during the strike. Dennison was implicated by Respondent in no less than 10 incidents during the 16-week period of the strike. Thus, Kenneth Sword, a truckdriver, assigned to the Russell plant, testified that beginning in early August, on two occasions, Dennison followed him on trips. There is no evidence that this occurred under menacing conditions or that a breach of the peace resulted.[24]

Rhonda Helton, a nonstriking employee at the Russell plant, was hired in August 1979. She thereafter worked regularly for the duration of the strike and crossed the picket line four times daily during the course thereof. Nonetheless, she testified to a single incident involving Dennison. Thus, she claimed that in August as she was leaving work she stopped at the intersection leading from the plant to the main road. Dennison approached her automobile as she was waiting for the traffic, put his arms on the window, and asked how long she had been working and why "was we there taking somebody else's jobs." Dennison added that they "couldn't get by with taking somebody else's job." According to Helton, Dennison, referring to the car in which Helton was a passenger, stated that the driver "didn't need a job working down there anyway with a car like that." Helton went on to testify that unidentified individuals on the picket line simultaneously were "talking about how good her car would look with flat tires and a different color." Dennison apparently did not repudiate such remarks.[25]

Fayne Rhea testified that she and her daughter Debby Grubb were reporting to work on August 31 when, as they turned off the main road into that which leads to the factory, Dennison "reached out and hit the left front fender of her daughter's car." No damage resulted, and while, presumably, the hand or arm of Dennison came in to contact with the car, the degree of force he employed was undefined.

Charlotte Foleno, during the strike, was office manager at the Honaker plant. She testified that it was her practice to cross the picket line several times daily and that on one such occasion, she stopped at the stop sign at the intersection leading to the plant. Dennison and Diane Harris, another nonemployee union agent, were standing in the road. Foleno claims that she motioned for them to move, but that Dennison and Harris failed to respond. Foleno was able to pass the car without hitting the latter or the oncoming vehicle. Foleno further testified that, as she passed, Harris called her a "bitch." Beyond that, it is noted that Foleno's testimony does not, with certainty, establish that Dennison and Harris actually blocked passage of her vehicle.

Honaker Plant Manager Jerry Couch testified that on August 22 he observed Bill Dennison taking pictures of the plant. Couch attempted to describe the objects photographed in the following terms: "From where I was standing, it looked like . . . the factory and possibly some of the vhicles that was parked in the parking lot." The conjecture of Couch as to whether photographs were taken of vehicles, was deemed speculative and unreliable. Further, there is no evidence that striking or nonstriking employees were present at the time of this early morning incident.

The most serious incident involving picket line misconduct on the part of Dennison was admitted by the latter. James Wolford was not employed by Respondent, but by Kwik Kafe Company. Apparently, Wolford crossed the picket line regularly during the strike to vend refreshments to employees at the Russell and Honaker plants. He testified that in late August, as he was passing through the picket line in route to the Russell plant, "they . . . wanted to put a sticker on the truck." Wolford claims that he shook his head "no" and continued. On leaving the plant, as Wolford pulled to the stop sign, Dennison walked behind the truck and placed a sticker on the vehicle. When asked to remove it, Dennison refused. In consequence, Dennison was subsequently convicted in the local court of "defacing private property."

Dennison was also linked to an altercation with plant guard Will Ireson which allegedly occurred at a local eating establishment. Ireson testified that on September 30 he, together with another plant guard, went to a restaurant where Dennison and Diane Harris appeared and started "bad mouthing" the guards at the restaurant. After words were exchanged, according to Ireson, Dennison took a swing at him. Ireson's testimony was uncorroborated. Harris and Dennison denied any such incident. There is no other evidence of hostility between Dennison and plant security personnel or indeed between supporters of the strike and such individuals. Nor does it appear that Dennison, during the strike, engaged in any sort of physical altercation or assault on any person. I did not believe Ireson. At the time of the incident, Ireson was 6 foot, 6 inches tall and weighed 230 pounds. Dennison, on the other hand, was of moderate size and was described by Ireson as small. He stood about 5 feet, 8 inches tall and weighed about 160 pounds. The guard allegedly in Ireson's presence at the time was described as weighing 110 pounds but, as Ireson's account goes, Dennison laid no challenge to the smaller man.

In addition to the above, I find that Dennison, in what appears to have been an August press conference, articulated to a reporter for the "Bluefield Daily Telegram"

[24] Sword also testified that Connie Hopson, a striker and member of the organizing committee at the Russell plant, followed him under similar otherwise tranquil conditions on two other occasions.

[25] I credit Helton who was not employed by Respondent at the time of the instant hearing.

words to the effect that "the Company would have a hard time hiring scabs."

Considering the duration of the strike and the testimony of a credible nature indicative of Dennison's role therein, convincing evidence does not warrant a conclusion that he contributed directly to any overall pattern of violence and intimidation.

Connie Brown was a nonemployee union organizer who, though primarily involved in the picketing at Honaker, also participated regularly at Russell. Several of Respondent's witnesses identified her as having engaged in picket line misconduct. Thus, Pat Price, a nonstriker at the Honaker plant, related that on the first day of the strike, as she turned off the main road, "Connie Brown jumped out in front of me and was hollering stop, Pat." Price claims that she had to put on her brakes to keep from hitting her. To me Brown's action on that occasion quite possibly was no more than a temporary, instantaneous effort to gain attention. Ethel Herndon, another nonstriking employee, testified that on July 30, at the Honaker picket line, Connie Brown stated as follows, "Why, you dirty low down scab . . . you had better work while you can . . . . we are closing that god damn place down."[26] Priscilla Dell testified to an incident occurring at the Honaker picket line after she had applied for a job. According to Dell, she was asked by a picket if she had obtained a job and responded in the affirmative. Dell went on to testify that Brown then asked her not to cross the picket line. However, when Dell said she would, according to Dell, Brown stated "if you do, we will throw this car down the hill."[27]

Diane Harris was a nonemployee union organizer who had primary responsibility at the Honaker picket line. Harris was a former employee of Honaker Mills, but was terminated on December 11, 1978. Prior to her termination, Harris was chairlady of the steering committee, an organization of employees committed to the support of the Union.[28] Charlotte Perkins was a nonstriking employee at the Honaker plant. Her brother Edgar Phillips testified that Diane Harris in late August asked if he was Perkins' brother. When he responded that he was, Harris allegedly said, "Why don't you go down to the plant and . . . tell Charlotte to get her god damned ass out of there she don't below [sic] in there."[29] Jane Smith was hired at the Honaker plant during the strike. Spencer Burke was her boyfriend. Burke had purchased a "Corvette sport car" for Smith which was the object of vandalism on Thursday, September 7. Burke claims to have witnessed the incident and to have identified Connie Brown and Diane Harris as the individuals responsible.[30] Smith and Burke pressed charges against the latter. The matter never came for trial. Subsequently, however, after Smith had terminated her employment at Honaker, the couple confronted Diane Harris and others at a night club in Bristol, Virginia. Smith and Burke testified that the Harris party followed them 4 to 5 miles, cutting off Smith's car twice. Harris testified that her group did in fact encounter Smith and Burke at the night club, but that they entered the club as Smith and Burke were leaving and remained there until the early hours of the morning. Harris denied following Smith and Burke on that occasion. I did not regard Smith and Burke as credible witnesses. The version offered by Harris is viewed as the more truthful.

Cecille Vest was the last of the nonemployee organizers to be implicated in misconduct. Thus, Audrey Gilbert, a nonstriking employee at the Russell plant, testified that on two occasions in August as she was leaving the plant, Cecille Vest, "set and blocked me for about 2 minutes," while pickets in Vest's car "snickered and laughed" and called Gilbert names. After this, according to Gilbert, Vest simply returned to her parking space. Vest testified to a single incident in which she backed out of her parking space onto the road as Gilbert was exiting from the plant. According to Vest, on observing Gilbert coming down the road, she pulled back into the lot as quickly as she could shift gears to allow her to pass. I was inclined to believe Vest. Gilbert did not impress me as a trustworthy witness. Her attempt to attribute identical conduct and scenario on two separate occasions was viewed as suspect. I prefer the testimony of Vest.

(2) Conduct attributed to identified strikers alleged to be employee agents of the Union

From the advent of the union activity at the two plants, various committees were established by the Union in aid of its objectives at those sites. At the Honaker plant, an employee organization committee was first established in 1977. Apparently in September 1978, following the election, a steering committee was elected composed of Honaker employees with Diane Harris as its chairlady. At the outset of the strike on July 24 at Honaker, picket captains were designated and also during the strike, a hardship committee was established. In addition, following the election, a negotiation committee composed of Honaker employees was formed.

At Russell an organizing committee was formed in August 1978. After the strike began, picket line captains were designated to police the conduct of the Russell strikers.

There is no evidence that the organization committee, steering committee, or negotiating committee functioned at the time of, or had any responsibility with respect to the picketing at Honaker. From all appearances on the record, including the credible testimony of Bill Denni-

[26] Theresa Boyd, who applied for a job during the strike at Honaker, but never worked there, testified that as she left the plant, 10 pickets crossed in front of her but dispersed as she accelerated her automobile. She claims that someone from within that group twice told her "not to come back no more." Boyd described the individual to her mother, who opined that it was "Connie Brown." It is noted in this connection that the attempt to impute said statements to Brown was predicated on uncorroborated, incompetent hearsay. It is also noted that the testimony of Boyd does not clearly establish that there was any attempt on the part of the pickets on that occasion to obstruct her access to the main highway.

[27] Brown denied stating she would "tear the hell out of this car," or using words to that effect. On balance, I am willing to give Dell the benefit of the doubt.

[28] See R. Exh. 13.

[29] A few days after this conversation, two tires were slashed on Charlotte Perkins' car. The identity of those responsible was not established on the instant record by direct evidence.

[30] This issue is treated infra as anonymous conduct occurring away from the picket line.

son, I find that the only employees with responsibility toward the conduct of the strike were the picket line captains, the hardship committee, and the organization committee at Russell. Indeed, since it does not appear that strikers on the hardship committee had any responsibility other than cushioning the impact of the strike upon those individuals allied in common cause, serious question exists as to responsibility of the Union for conduct of those so engaged. Nonetheless, the following reflects my findings with respect to conduct attributed to various employee members of these committees.

Eva Mae Reynolds, a nonstriking employee at the Russell plant, testified that on the first morning of picketing at that location as she crossed the picket line, strikers Catherine Whithed and Juanita Perkins called the nonstrikers "jaw suckers and scabs and pigs." According to Reynolds, that same afternoon, she was told by strikers Barbara Wise and Betty Fields that if she crossed the picket line "they'd throw rotten eggs in my face." Further, Reynolds claims to have been informed that because she signed a union card she could not cross the picket line. Whithed and Wise were picket captains at Russell. It is noted that the testimony of Reynolds does not isolate with clarity whether the statements were actually made by the picket captains or others in their presence. Though possible, it is difficult to believe that the statement attributed to Wise and Fields was made in chorus.

Rita Hess, a nonstriker hired at the Russell plant the day after the strike began, testified that on July 31 as she was leaving work Connie Hopkins[31] yelled at those crossing the picket line calling them "bitches . . . whores . . . job suckers . . . scabs and fags."

Hazel Street, a nonstriking employee at the Honaker plant, testified that in the course of the strike, prior to September, striker Debby Justice and her husband, who was driving the Justice automobile, harassed her while she was in her vehicle. According to Street, while she was getting gas Mr. Justice pulled into the station and swerved as if he were going to hit her. As I understand her testimony, as she left the gas station, he followed her, tailgating closely behind. She goes on to claim that Mr. Justice tried to run her off the road, and when she pulled over to let them pass the Justice car took the lead and threw its brakes on, while Debby Justice cursed Street. Charges were filed and, although the reckless driving charge was dropped, Debby Justice was found guilty and fined $25 for cursing and abuse. It is noted that Street admitted on cross-examination that, contrary to her insinuation on direct, Mr. Justice did not try to run her off the road. While willing to acept her testimony that she was followed by the Justices and cursed by Debby Justice, her characterizations of the incident beyond that are rejected. Street impressed me as prone to exaggerate and unreliable with respect to such matters.[32]

Charlotte Hensley, a nonstriker at the Russell plant, testified that in mid-September as she and other nonstrikers were returning from lunch, Sue Datsun, a striking employee, walked in front of them across the road, stopped, and said, "Hit me by God, I'm paid for." Another nonstriker, Debbie Jones, was the driver of the vehicle. Hensley's description of this incident was not corroborated. In any event, although Hensley testified that she thought that Datsun was with the union committee at Russell, I am unwilling to credit her testimony in this regard as no foundation is laid for her belief, and there is no suggestion elsewhere that Datsun played any formal role in the campaign.

Sue Wilson, a nonstriker at Russell, testified that on August 21 she drove a company car to a gas station. She claims that as she passed through the picket line, strikers Lou Huffman and Connie Hopson entered a car. As Wilson went into a gas station, Huffman and Hopson went into a "Tastee Freeze" located on property adjacent to the gas station. According to Wilson, the strikers ate, but after Wilson got gas they followed her as she returned to the factory. Wilson admitted that there was no attempt to communicate with her by either Huffman or Hopson on this occasion. Huffman was a member of the organizing committee at Russell and Hopson was a picket captain and a member of the organization committee at Russell.

(3) Conduct attributed to nonagent, but identified strikers

Nonstriker Sue Wilson further testified that on August 23 she, with her daughter, went to a nearby Montgomery Ward outlet to pick up a package. She claims to have observed striker Vaney Laney reach on a table and pick something up. Observing this and believing that Laney would come after her, Wilson went into the outlet seeking assistance. When she returned, Vaney Laney was across the road. He called her a "fat scab and a scaredy cat." Wilson indicated that she was not afraid and was not a "scaredy cat." Laney then allegedly said,"Now, I got a job over there waiting on me, even a job over you." Her daughter then returned to the car and they left without incident. Although Wilson testified that she guessed that Vaney Laney was on the union committee there is no evidence to support her surmise.[33]

Charlotte Hensley testified to a further incident at the Russell picket line involving Vaney Laney. She claims that during the course of the strike, as she was returning to the plant from lunch, Laney stepped out into the road in front of her car, yelling for Hensley to stop. She claims that she swerved to the other side of the road and ran off on the gravel to avoid Laney, but then continued on to the plant.

[31] The record indicates that Connie Hopson was a picket line captain at Russell. It is entirely possible that Hess in this instance was referring to the latter. Although the record is unclear, I am willing to give Respondent the benefit of the doubt and assume that this was the case.

[32] Debby Justice was a member of the steering committee and negotiating committee at the Honaker plant. It does not appear that she was either a member of the hardship committee or a picket captain.

[33] Although Wilson testified that Cecille Vest and Bill Dennison were in the area, she admitted on cross-examination that they were not in a position to overhear the conversation with Vaney Laney.

Shirley Brown, a nonstriking employee at Honaker, testified that a few days prior to her car being vandalized, Debbie Mays hollered to Brown as she was passing through the picket line, "You're going to get it." Debbie Mays was not an employee of the Company, but she was the sister-in-law of Joyce Mays, a strike captain.

Nonstriker Doris Stensen testified that as she was leaving the Russell plant on October 12 the traffic officer stopped her at the intersection, when Vaney Laney yelled, "You god damn bitch, go to hell." According to Stensen, Laney started to walk toward the car, and took hold of the door handle. However, when the police officer signaled that Stensen move on, she proceeded. At home, Stensen informed her husband of the incident.[34] On cross-examination, it was developed that Stensen returned to the picket line with her husband, who asked Laney why he used abusive language to Doris Stensen. As I understand her testimony, her husband wanted Laney to cross the road and fight. Laney, according to Stensen, "hid behind two women."[35] Laney's version sharply conflicts that of Stensen. As to their initial confrontation, he admits to calling Stensen a "scab," at which point Stensen called him a "son-of-a-bitch," while raising a box containing a small revolver, showing it to Laney, and stating, "I'll blow your damn head off." According to Laney, when Stensen returned to the picket line with her husband that afternoon, the latter jumped out of the car with a "T-bar," and while swinging it asked Laney, "What have you been saying to my wife?" Shortly thereafter the chief of police arrived and the incident abated. Later the matter went to court and both Stensen and Laney were found guilty of "curse and abuse." As between the uncorroborated testimony of Stensen and that of Laney, I prefer the latter's version. It seemed the more probable, and I did not believe that Laney, with a police officer present, would have grabbed the door of the nonstriker's vehicle. Furthermore, his testimony as to the second confrontation was corroborated by Connie Brown.

Arbutus Forester was a striker at the Honaker plant. Charlotte Foleno, the office manager, and Kathleen Harris, Foleno's mother, who was also the engineer at the Honaker plant, afforded mutually cooperative testimony that Forester appeared to have thrown something under Foleno's automobile as she crossed the picket line on July 31. When she arrived at the plant, Foleno discovered that a tire on the automobile had roofing nails in it. Forester, though admitting that she had nails in her possession that day, denied throwing them under the Foleno automobile. I believe the testimony of Foleno and Harris, and infer from their mutually corroborative accounts that Forester did throw nails under the vehicle that day.

Pat Price, a nonstriker at Honaker Mills, testified that on a Saturday during the course of the strike her husband was repairing her car at the plant. Only she, her husband, the security guard, and her children were at the plant that day. She claims to have observed Forester going up and down the road adjacent to the plant serveral times. Later, according to Price, the security guard found a handful of tacks in the vicinity of the plant gate. Price admitted that she did not see Forester throw the tacks. However, she offered that the tacks were not there when she came on to the plant property that morning. Forester's daughter lives on the road in question. While I have taken into account the fact that Forester did throw tacks under the Foleno automobile, I am unwilling to find on the basis of Price's testimony that she was responsible for tacks appearing on plant premises as related by Price. It is noted that Forester was not a member of any committee established to aid the organizational effort at the Honaker plant.

Charlotte Foleno testified that as she was leaving work during the course of the strike striker Debby Wilson yelled, "Hey Charlotte, you might not ought to leave here by yourself . . . you might not get back if you know what is good for you . . . you won't be out running around by yourself."[36]

(4) Picket line conduct attributed to the unidentified

With respect to conduct originating at the picket line, it is noted that the record indicates that in addition to strikers the picket line was manned by others, including relatives, children and friends of strikers. Thus, some of the evidence offered in this respect, could conceivably have originated with nonstriking sympathizers. For example, while uncontradicted testimony establishes that there were no striking male employees at the Honaker picket lines,[37] Charlotte Foleno testified that in the course of the strike when she went to lunch she was followed by "two boys." Though Foleno was the office manager at the Honaker plant, she could not identify them. According to Foleno they simply followed her to the restaurant, sat down across from her, and when Foleno left, the boys returned to the picket line.

In addition, nonstriker Loretta Cooke, an employee at Russell, testified that as she was crossing the picket line and engaging in a conversation with Cecille Vest concerning the identity of newly hired employees in the plant someone from the picket line stated that they knew where Cooke lived. Doris Stensen claimed that on July 26, a woman on the picket line told her that if she "knew what was good for my health, I'd better stay home the next day."[38]

[34] Stensen's mother-in-law Juanita Pickett, a supervisor at the Russell plant, was in the car with her. Pickett did not testify.

[35] Stensen denied that her husband had a tire iron at the time, and she also denied placing a handgun on the dashboard in the course of the incident and threatening to shoot Laney's brains out. However, she admitted that a firearm was kept at all times in an open box on the seat of her automobile. My disbelief of Stensen is so strong as to warrant rejection of her further testimony that on July 26 someone on the picket line verbally threatened her.

[36] Although Foleno testified that Connie Brown was on the picket line that day, no foundation was laid tending to support a finding that Brown would have heard the remarks attributed to Wilson.

[37] See testimony of Connie Brown.

[38] Bill Dennison was placed on the picket line at the time, but only through prejudicially leading examination by Respondent's counsel. Any implications that Dennison condoned this conduct is weakened further by the absence of any foundation whatsoever which would reasonably warrant an inference that he would have overheard the comment. Dennison denied that any such threat was made in his presence.

Sue Wilson testified that on August 17 she left work early only to have 12 to 14 pickets gather "around" her car, calling her names, and waving their signs at her.[39]

Respondent called several witnesses who testified as to coercive language originating at the Honaker picket line. Thus, according to James Wolford, an employee of a vendor which sold refreshments to employees of Honaker, someone from the picket line called "do you value your life" as he passed. Pat Price testified that on July 24 someone in a crowd of 30 to 35 on the picket line hollered that they "was going to beat my ass . . . and they'd meet me up the road."[40] Jane Smith, who worked briefly during the strike at Honaker, testified that when she put her application in with the Company during the strike Connie Brown and another girl from the picket line were explaining the reason for the strike. While this was going on a girl on the other side of the picket line came over to the passenger's side of the window and said, "You'd better not go to work if you know what is good for you."[41]

(b) Anonymous offenses to persons and property occurring away from the picket line

The most serious of the offenses registered on this record pertained to conduct occurring at locations removed from the picketing. Thus, nonstrikers were subject to anonymous telephone calls of a threatening nature and damage to their automobiles. Although there was testimony as to shootings, in this respect, the evidence was either viewed as incredible or as devoid of convincing link with the labor dispute. As for property damage, it appears that in late July, a rash of such incidents occurred in connection with vehicles parked at the homes of nonstrikers. Thus, Rita Fields, a nonstriker at Honaker, testified that on July 31, paint stripper was placed on her car causing discoloration and damage. An offer of proof was entered to the effect that Fatema Rush, a nonstriker at the Russell plant, would testify that also on July 31 her right rear tire was slashed.[42] In a similar incident, Helen Russell, a nonstriker at the Russell plant, testified that in late July a tire was slashed on her husband's automobile. Also Mildred Hubbard, a nonstriker at Russell, testified that within that same time frame a tire was slashed on her car. Another Honaker nonstriker, Sandra Wallace, testified that in late July acid was thrown on her car. Finally, Barbara Warden, a nonstriker at the Russell plant, related that in late July a tire was flattened on her car and the word "union" was scratched on its surface, and Audrey Gilbert, a nonstriker at the Russell plant, testified that at some point in the strike, tacks were thrown in her driveway, causing three flat tires.[43]

Hazel Street, a nonstriker at Honaker, testified that in September, at approximately 2 a.m., the windshields were broken in her husband's car, her son's car, and her car. She further testified that having been awakened by the crash she and her husband identified two vehicles leaving the scene, namely, a blue car with a white stripe and a pickup truck of undisclosed color. Street testified that they obtained the tag number off of the pickup which was traced to a "Larry Hagey." No evidence is cited by Respondent linking Larry Hagey with the pickets or the strike at either location. An independent canvassing of the record fails to confirm any such connection. Respondent's Exhibit 22 has not been overlooked. Thus, this document was prepared by Jerry Couch, plant manager at Honaker and is a listing of union representatives and pickets whom he observed as being on the picket line during the course of the strike, together with a description of their vehicles and tag numbers. Included on that list is a Betty Hagey. Although it appears that Hagy was listed as having a maroon "P. U.," a description which I assume to be pickup, her name is spelled differently from that which appears in the official stenographic transcript for Mr. Hagey, and there is no independent evidence suggesting a relationship between the two. In the circumstances to link Larry Hagey with the picketing at either plant would be an act of raw speculation. Finally, it is noted that though the incident was reported to state police, no charges were levied against any individual in connection therewith.

Charlotte Perkins, a nonstriking employee at Honaker, testified that on August 22 a few days after Diane Harris inveighed on her brother, Edgar Phillips, to dissuade Perkins from crossing the picket line, she had two tires slashed on her automobile. Shirley Brown, also a nonstriker at Honaker, testified that on September 21, after the sister of a picket captain at Honaker had warned that [39] This occurred when Wilson had stopped her car at the intersection to the main highway and her testimony fails to convince that her access was physically blocked by the pickets.

[40] Although Connie Brown and Diane Harris were named as present on the occasion in question and also Diane Harris was identified as having engaged in name calling, there was no evidence that Harris or Brown were in a position to overhear the above threat.

[41] Although Connie Brown was presumably on the other side of the car, and Smith testified that she said nothing after the remark was made, the scenario is not developed to the point of permitting clear inference that Connie Brown overheard the threat. In any event, I have grave misgivings as to the credibility of Jane Smith and am unwilling to accept her uncorroborated testimony. Although Smith testified that her sister-in-law was present at the time, the latter did not testify. Spencer Burke, Smith's boyfriend, testified to another occasion in which he was crossing the Honaker picket line and told "we'll get you" by an unidentified picket. Burke was an incredible witness, whose uncorroborated testimony is rejected.

[42] The offer of proof indicates that when Rush, together with her husband, took the tire to the plant on August 1, Vaney Laney volunteered, "It wasn't a knife, it was an ice pick." Laney denied making such a statement. Rush's husband did not testify. Laney indicated that he did have a conversation with the husband of Rush, when the latter brought the tire to the plant, but that said conversation was limited to an inquiry as to whether Laney knew who had damaged the tire, and Rush's expression of pique at having lost a day's work and wages in consequence of the slashing. I credit Laney.

[43] I did not regard Audrey Gilbert as a particularly credible witness. However, I am willing to accept that her car was damaged during the strike. Another aspect of her testimony is rejected. Thus, she claimed that on the evening of July 29, four shotgun pellets struck the roof of her home, leaving dents. It was my impression that in that respect Gilbert was testifying from personally held unconfirmed suspicion and deduction, rather than direct knowledge of the facts and, accordingly, her testimony was deemed unreliable. But even were her testimony to be believed, this record attests, through Respondent's witnesses, that the possession of weapons was not an unfamiliar phenomenon in this particular area, and I am not willing to conclude that simply because shots were fired at a time contemporaneous with the strike, the supporters thereof may fairly be deemed responsible. Such a conclusion would be unduly speculative.

she would get it, had the word "SCAB" spray painted on her car.

Rita Hess, a nonstriker at the Russell plant, testified that during the strike, she was awakened at approximately 1 a.m. by sounds coming from her driveway. She observed persons in her driveway preparing to cut her tires. The latter assertedly got into their car and departed when discovered. Hess testified that the automobile was a 1968 "Ford Galaxy car" and that the person on the passenger side had long, light-colored hair. Hess' testimony fails to disclose the color of that vehicle. Though she claims that her own automobile was damaged as the Galaxy left the driveway, she acknowledges that the incident was not reported to the police. Elements of Hess' testimony were viewed as suspect. The fact that Diane Harris drove a Ford Galaxy, and had shoulder length, long blonde hair would have been commonly known by nonstrikers. Although it is possible that Hess, in the middle of the night, could have picked out details suggesting the possibility that Diane Harris was involved, her testimony in this respect struck as too pat and, indeed, I have reservations concerning her description of the entire incident.

Brenda Dye, a nonstriking employee at Honaker, testified that on September 21, she discovered that her automobile had its bumper and tail lights painted red, with the work "SCAB" painted in red letters across the trunk. At the time, according to Dye, she was living with her sister. She testified that the night before, striker Betty Hagy visited her sister to borrow a "pattern" at the same residence where her automobile was damaged. She claims that on that occasion Hagy looked at her "real hard."

Bobby Hughes was not employed at either plant. However, his daughters worked at Honaker during the strike. He testified that on the last Saturday in August paint and acid was thrown on his truck, resulting in permanent damage to the vehicle. This occurred at the Hughes' residence. Hughes further testified that on a second vehicle, a broom handle or similar object was used to poke a hole in the radiator of his car while parked on the lot at the Honaker plant. This latter aspect of the testimony of Hughes is deemed incompetent, as plainly based on hearsay and personally held opinion. Scrutiny of his testimony discloses that his daughters used the car to drive to work that day, and that he discovered the radiator problem when they returned that evening, because the car was heating up. As his examination continued it became apparent that Hughes had simply deduced that the damage must have occurred at the plant. Hughes testified that his daughters did not know how the damage to the radiator occurred. Neither of his daughters was called to afford primary evidence as to their experience with the vehicle that day. Although Hughes testified that the vehicle was parked at the plant parking lot between 6:45 a.m. and 3:30 p.m. on the day in question, no foundation for his knowledge of this fact was offered.

William Ireson, a security guard, testified that while his vehicle was parked at the Russell plant his windshield was broken. At the time, Ireson claims to have been on duty and that his van was parked lengthwise within company property at the main entrance to the plant. No other incident of property damage within plant premises is disclosed by acceptable proof herein. The record does not include a photograph of the alleged damage done to Ireson's vehicle, and he failed to identify the date of this incident. Ireson as heretofore indicated was regarded as an unreliable witness. My mistrust is sufficiently deep to discredit the entirety of his testimony to the extent uncorroborated.[44]

Serious question exists as to credibility of testimony surrounding damage to an automobile of Jane Smith. The latter, for a brief period in September, crossed the picket line to work at Honaker.[45] Smith owned a "Corvette" automobile which was purchased for her by her boyfriend Spencer Burke Jr. On Thursday, September 7, in the middle of the night, the air was let out of two of her tires, there were cuts in the body of the car around the taillights, the hood was warped apparently due to being forced, the passenger door had been kicked and had a large scratch in it, and the carburetor had been filled with soap powder. In consequence of this incident warrants were sworn out agaisnt Connie Brown and Diane Harris.[46] The only evidence linking these nonemployee, union representatives with the incident appears in the testimony of Spencer Burke.

The vandalism occurred at the home of Smith in Richlands, Virginia, approximately a one-half hour drive from the Honaker plant, Smith testified that she first noticed the damage to the car the next morning when she woke up to go to work. According to Smith, she left the car that evening at approximately 11:30 p.m. before going to bed. Smith and Burke testified that that evening, Burke, together with a friend, were rehabilitating a second car owned by Burke which Smith intended to use in driving back and forth from the plant. The repair work was to be done at a garage in Swords Creek, which is located between Honaker and Richlands.

Burke, who at times material, had his license revoked, and who did not live at the same residence of Smith, testified that at approximately 2 or 2:30 a.m. as he and his friend were returning the second car to Smith, they turned down the hill leading to Jane Smith's home and observed that the hood was up on the "Corvette," the interior light was on, and two people "were in it." He [44] Also noteworthy is the testimony of Phillip Lawson, cocounsel for Respondent, that several months before July 24, there were rumors that a strike was possible. As the rumors emerged, according to Lawson, he met with Jerry Couch and Fayne Farmer, a management official at Russell. Both were informed by Lawson to photograph property damage including "tire slashings, windshield—whatever happened," and to take a statement from the person affected and a photograph of the situation. Although Lawson testified that there were photographs in addition to those that were placed in evidence by Respondent, there is no indication that such a photograph was taken of the Ireson windshield, nor is there explanation as to why no such photograph was placed in evidence. The failure of Ireson to identify the date of the incident suggests that no report was made as per Lawson's instructions.

[45] I have heretofore discredited testimony that Smith had been warned by someone on the picket line that she had better not go to work if she knew what was good for her.

[46] Although the charges were scheduled for court hearing on several occasions, they were not pressed. An alleged eyewitness, who ostensively would have corroborated Burke in identifying Brown and Harris, declined to testify.

testified that as he had two collectors' model Smith & Wesson pistols in the car, his first instinct was to go to the "Corvette" and see if the guns had been stolen.[47] He testified that he noticed that the tires were flat, and that because the guns were in the "Corvette," he returned to the second car and without success he and his friend pursued the vandals.

A shift in Burke's testimony appeared when he was again questioned by Respondent's counsel as to what he observed when he first arrived at Smith's home that evening. The colloquy is set forth as follows:

> Mr. Lawson: Okay, I would like you to go back to where you first came up on them. How did you see him?
>
> Burke: Well, there was a street light at the house and the interior light was on in the car too and our headlights too. I got a real view of one of them and—
>
> Mr. Lawson: All right. I would like you to describe what you saw when you say you saw them in your headlights in the street.
>
> Burke: At the time, one was standing. The hood was on the car. The one in the back was huddled down about knee high to the rear right tire.
> As soon as we turned the corner they ran. I don't know what kind of car it was. The guy that was driving said it looked to be a green Gremlin or Pinto.[48]

In the darkness, and the quickness with which those responsible would have left the scene, Burke claims that he made a certain identification from 75–100 feet away of Brown and Harris. He claims that one was tall, husky, with long blonde hair, and the other had long, medium-length hair. He admittedly had never seen Harris before in his life.[49] The precise identification came the next day when Burke allegedly picked Harris and Brown out of the Honaker picket line. When again questioned as to how long he observed the two individuals at the car, Burke responded as follows: "When the lights turned the corner, they ran around the side of the hedge and went in the car . . . I had a pretty good look at them, especially a good look at the one on the right side of the car."

A further interesting aspect of the testimony of Burke pertains to the explanation that the second car was being repaired because Smith held concern as to the propriety of using the Corvette because of fears that it might be damaged. However, on the evening in question, the Corvette was admittedly left unlocked, with the keys and the Smith & Wesson revolvers in it, which Burke valued at $2000.

Diane Harris and Connie Brown deny being in the area on September 6 or 7 or having had anything to do with the damage of the Corvette.[50] I credit their testimony.

A further incident of anonymous conduct relates to nails thrown in Patsy White's driveway in the trailer park located across the road from the Honaker plant. White confirmed the testimony of Eva Lester that nails were discovered in her driveway.

The only evidence of personal battery in the course of the strike involved Ireson. Thus, he testified that on September 8, at approximately 12 midnight, he received a black eye while struck in the head with a rock at the Honaker plant. Ireson could throw no light on the identity of the individual that threw the rock. A somewhat strained attempt to link this incident with the Union is based on the admitted fact that Connie Brown and Diane Harris frequented the top of the hill to the rear of the plant during the day to observe trucks unloading. In this respect, Jerry Couch testified that on September 18 he observed Connie Brown and an unidentified individual on the top of the hill, and again on the following day. This, however, furnishes no basis for inferring that either they or any other agent of the Union were involved in the rock throwing incident in question.

c. Other anonymous conduct

Several witnesses called by Respondent testified that they were victims of anonymous phone calls during the strike. Nonstrikers Charlotte Perkins, Julia Cooke, Sally Breedlove,[51] and Rita Fields all testified that they began

---

[47] Jane Smith, in recanting what she apparently had been told by Burke, made no reference to any pistols in the Corvette. Indeed, she testified that when Burke came down the hill Diane and Connie were observed, with one at the tire and the other at the end of the hood. She relates that "then they ran and Rick got out and got in the Corvette to chase them. . . . It wouldn't start . . . so he got Lawrence to take them [sic]." This phase of Smith's testimony is more consistent with a second, contradictory version afforded by Burke as to what he first observed in arriving at her house that evening.

[48] Note also that while Smith testified that Burke did not alone take up the chase in the "Corvette," because that car would not start, Burke testified that he went to the "Corvette," "took a look," and returned to the second car to begin the chase because he "didn't have no license to drive."

[49] Interestingly enough, Burke testified that on a previous occasion, when he visited the plant, Connie Brown and a bunch of pickets cursed him, with an unidentified individual hollering "We'll get you, I'll get you." Note the similarity between this incident and that which has been discredited as described by Jane Smith. However, Jane Smith does not corroborate that she was in Burke's presence when such a statement was made. Smith testified that she was with her sister-in-law when she was threatened. One wonders what Burke was doing in the vicinity of the picket line without Jane Smith, when he had no license to drive and lived quite a distance from the plant.

[50] Diane Harris admittedly changed the color of her hair, but neither the length nor style at some time during strike. Although Harris initially testified that this occurred some time between the start of the strike and her going to court on the complaint of Jane Smith, she subsequently testified that she could not recall whether this occurred before or after her first court appearance. Harris denied knowledge as to where Jane Smith lived at the time of the incident. She denied doing any damage to the car of Jane Smith on September 7, or having been with Connie Brown that morning. Brown did nothing to change her appearance. Although the change in Harris' appearance is suspicious, it fails to offset my strong disbelief of Burke and my impression that he was a thoroughly unreliable witness. To the extent that this anonymous act of vandalism is claimed to have been the work of Harris and/or Brown, I find that the credible proof does not exist substantiating any such conclusion. I would also note that the damage described here far exceeds that inflicted on property of any other nonstriker.

[51] Breedlove testified that in the first such call, though she could not identify the caller, she was referred to as a "scrawny ass." She claims that Charlotte Vance is the only person who had ever called her such a name. I am unwilling to infer on that isolated basis that Charlotte Vance, a picket captain, was responsible for the call.

receiving threatening, anonymous phone calls during the period between July 31 and early September.

In another incident, Jerry Couch, the plant manager at Honaker, testified that before employees reported for work on the morning of September 26, oil was on the pavement at the intersection leading to the Honaker plant. The oil was not absorbed until 9:30 p.m. Although Couch could not identify who was responsible for the above, he testified that Diane Harris and steering committee member Shirley Honaker were on the picket line that morning. In my opinion the evidence is insufficient to link the incident with the Union or any of its agents.

Testimony adduced by Respondent indicates that two bomb threats were made at the Honaker plant. The first occurred on August 1 at 1 p.m. Iona O'Quinn, an office employee, testified that she answered the phone and was told that a bomb was planted in the factory and set to go off at 1:45 p.m. The employees were evacuated to the parking lot where they remained outside for some 30 or 35 minutes. The threat occurred in the context of an unusual demonstration by the strikers. According to the credited testimony of Plant Manager Couch, while pickets in the past in small numbers had repaired from the intersection to the front of the plant at no time prior to August 1 had this occurred en masse. Union representative Dennison acknowledged that a press conference had been arranged previously for 1:30 p.m., on August 1, at the picket line. It appears that prior thereto a large group of pickets marched to the plant itself where they conducted a brief demonstration at times reasonably contemporaneous with the bomb threat. Connie Brown, according to Couch, was on the picket line when the bomb threat was received, but prior to that had left the picket line with another unidentified individual who did not return.

Couch testified to a second bomb threat on September 5. In this regard, Couch testified that Connie Brown was not on the picket line when the second threat was received, but that she arrived shortly thereafter.

In addition to bomb threats, two plant security guards testified that they detected separate shooting incidents in the vicinity of the Russell plant during the strike. Thus, Larry Browning testified that shortly before termination of the strike, on November 12, while he was on duty at 8 p.m. he heard three shots fired from a field directly in front of him as he was sitting in his car near the main gate to the Russell plant. He claims to have seen a muzzle flash on two such shots, and that in all 8 to 10 shots were fired, which he approximated to have struck the ground within 10 feet of him.[52] It was the sense of Browning's claim that he immediately telephoned the Lebanon police and they responded in about 3 minutes. The police neither saw anything nor found anything.

Plant guard Ireson, who previously has been deemed incredible, testified to two incidents involving shootings in the area proximate to the Russell plant. Ireson testified that in August, at dusk, when he first started working there, "three shots were fired at me from an old house on the top of the hill near the Russell plant." Ireson did not know who fired the shots but claimed that he called the police. Ireson related that the shots hit "two or three feet in front of him." He asserted that although the police officer "dug around" to try and find the bullets none were located.

Ireson testified to another occasion, when shots were fired at the Company's water tower. Although two other guards were described as on duty at the time, neither was called as a witness. Ireson declared that 10 to 12 shots were fired. While Ireson claims that the incident occurred "one evening late," he incredulously asserted that one of the security guards took a pair of binoculars to see if there were any holes in the water tank while Ireson called the police. According to Ireson, the police found holes in the water tower and also discovered "three weapons in the house" on the hill. No search of the house ensued, according to Ireson, as the police explained that a warrant would be necessary. No indication exists that Respondent attempted to secure a warrant or the identity of the occupants or owners of the house on the instant record. These omissions are somewhat curious. In addition, while untoward events during the course of the strike were to be made the subject of a report, here again Ireson could not isolate the incident as to time. I am not convinced that these shootings had anything to do with the union campaign.

d. Concluding analysis

To my knowledge, this is the first case in which the Laura Modes defense has been recognized as viable in the context of a strike for the sole objective of securing representational rights gained by employees through an election conducted under the auspices of the National Labor Relations Board. Before considering the precedent, it is noted that the injection of this issue in this type of proceeding and at this point in the course of struggle for representation collides with the general charge that questions concerning resolution be expeditiously resolved. Certainly, there is a technical legal distinction between the procedures through which the Board polices the atmosphere in which votes are cast and results determined pursuant to election petitions, and the unfair labor practice procedure through which those results are enforced by Board remedy. Nonetheless, working men and women who have struggled long and hard to secure the Section 7 right to bargain through an agent of their own choosing would naturally find it difficult to perceive of such distinction. Their confidence in the peaceful procedures of the National Labor Relations Board is hardly enhanced by delays inherent in litigation of complex issues, which might be disposed of elsewhere. This is not to say that the Laura Modes doctrine is unsound generally. However, the problem with that principle, when invoked to an ongoing postelection dispute over representation, is the wealth of litigation invited by standards so vague as to hinder: (1) rejection of the defense as insubstantial before hearing, (2) exclusion of time consuming trivia at hearing, and (3) distillation of an uncertain policy into legal conclusions after the record is made. For, the dimensions of this doctrine transcend qualitative assessment or rational explication. Ultimately, the result will turn upon feel and personal reaction, judgmental factors which themselves nurture the delaying influences of extended deliberation, indecision, and division within the the decision-making process. Concern exists in this quarter as to whether the statutory policy encouraging employees to utilize Board election procedures will suffer disproportionately to the gains to be realized by application of Laura Modes to conduct occurring after an Board election and in furtherance of a dispute limited in objective to employee efforts to enforce the choice made pursuant to the statutory scheme.

[52] Serious question exists as to whether this act related to the strike. The strike ended in mid-November, and despite the plethora of incidents litigated on this record, apart from the discredited testimony as to an incident occurring in Bristol, Virginia, as described by Jane Smith and Burke, the most recent incident occurring in connection with the strike at the Russell plant was on October 12 and involved the picket line confrontation involving Vaney Laney, Doris Stensen, and the latter's husband. Furthermore, no employees or pickets were present at the time of the incident described by Browning. There unquestionably would be a tendency to attribute to the strike every anonymous act of vandalism which occurred in areas proximate to the plant at times contemporaneous with the strike. Ordinary experience reflects the danger of endorsing such conjecture.

Strike violence, apart from Laura Modes, has always been regulated through civil, criminal, and statutory sanctions. Rather than inject the former as a further obstacle to summary enforcement of certifications under Section 8(a)(5), misconduct related thereto could be relegated to 8(b)(1)(A) proceedings, in which event, should the evidence reflect an established pattern of intimidation and violence, conventional redress could include an admonition that the fitness of the statutory representative would be subject to future review in the event of reemerging substantial misconduct.[53]

As matters now stand, however, the procedural history of this case demands that findings be made with respect to the above misconduct on the basis of extant precedent. Regrettably, this determination can only be made by reconciliation of the above findings against diverse fact patterns, with final analysis turning more on my perception of trend than logically communicated assessment of factors which, though deemed relevant, since Laura Modes have been the object of shifting values and dispositions more aptly described as conclusionary than elaborately rationalized.

First, the landmark case of Laura Modes, the bargaining order was withheld in the face of overt acts of misconduct by nonemployee union representatives in the course of an initial organizational campaign. However, unlike the instant case, a Board election was not involved, and the union established its majority on the basis of signed authorization cards. During the course of that campaign, the employer reacted with serious unfair labor practices undermining the union's majority. Indeed, on the day after the employer assembled its employees, advising them that it had no intention of meeting with or entering an agreement with the union, a union business agent, together with eight nonemployee union members invaded the plant, assaulting one of the owners of the business and jostling others. On the following day a strike began. During the course thereof, a striker pointed out a second owner of the business to four to nine unidentified individuals, who thereafter assaulted and beat the latter. The Board, while concluding that, in the circumstances, the employer's refusal to confer recognition violated Section 8(a)(5), viewed the "atmosphere of violence and intimidation" inspired by the Union as precluding the grant of an affirmative bargaining order. In doing so, the Board stated:

> [W]e cannot, in good conscience, disregard the fact that, immediately before and immediately after it filed the instant charges, the Union evidenced a total disinterest in enforcing its representation rights through the peaceful legal process provided by the Act in that it resorted to and/or encouraged the use of violent tactics to compel their grant. Our powers to effectuate the statutory policy need not, we think, be exercised so single-mindedly in aiming for remedial restortation of the status quo ante, that we must disregard or sanction thereby union enforcement of an employer's mandatory bargaining duty by unprovoked and irresponsible physical assualts of the nature involved here. We recognize, of course, that the employee's right to choose the Union as their representative survives the Union's misconduct. But we believe it will not prejudice the employees unduly to ask that they demonstrate their desires anew in an atmosphere free of any possible trace of coercion. . . . We conclude that, in the particular circumstances of this case, the policies of the Act and the legitimate interest of the public and the parties will best be served by denying to the Union the right to invoke our statutory processes in aid of a demand for recognition as bargaining representative of Respondent's employees unless and until it demonstrates its majority among those employees through the Board's election procedures.[54]

The newborn doctrine was again considered in United Mineral & Chemical Corp., 155 NLRB 1390 (1965), where the Board, in discounting serious misconduct on the picket line during a 65-day strike, distinguished Laura Modes. The Board reasoned that, there, the union persisted in efforts to enforce its statutory rights through the Board processes, and further observed that the four to five incidents of serious misconduct were attributable to only two strikers, and all took place "in the heat of picket line tensions, and do not appear to be part of a plan of intimidation." Accordingly, the Board having also found that the union obtained a majority on a basis of signed authorization cards, and that the employer engaged in unfair labor practice undermining the union and evidencing a rejection of the principles of collective bargaining, entered an affirmative bargaining order. However, that order was not enforced by the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit.[55] The court disagreed with the Board's evaluation of the misconduct, indicating disapproval of the Board's conclusion that the evidence failed to reveal that the strike misconduct was "part of a plan of intimidation." The court, after weighing such misconduct against the employer's unfair labor practices, denied enforcement of the bargaining order.

Later, the Board itself applied Laura Modes to picket line misconduct in Aircraft Mantel & Fireplace Co., 174 NLRB 737 (1969). In that case there had been no bargaining history, but during an initial organizational campaign, the union obtained signed authorization cards from a majority. As in Laura Modes there was no Board election. However, a strike was called under conditions in which the employer would clearly have been apprised of the extent of the Union's representative status. Although the employer's refusal to extend recognition was not accompanied by independent unfair labor practices calculated to undermine the union's majority, an 8(a)(5) violation was found on the, since beclouded, theory that the employer was not free to assert "a genuine or sincere doubt that the Union did have majority authorization." The Board adopted the trial examiner's conclusion that redress of this 8(a)(5) violation would be withheld because of numerous acts of violence and misconduct on the picket line, including vandalism to respondent's premises, the placement of nails under vehicles entering said premises, mass picketing, threats of bodily harm, the paint bombing of the homes of nonstrikers, and the throwing of a cup of coffee by a nonemployee union representative into the face of the employer's owner. In that case, the Board affirmed the conclusion that the intimidating misconduct was part and parcel of a "plan of intimidation" unprovoked by the employer, and occurring in a context in which the employer's refusal to bargain was the sole unfair labor practice, and did not itself reflect ". . . the basis for finding antiunion animus." The trial examiner, in applying Laura Modes and withholding a bargaining order, stated:

> . . . I find nothing from which I would assume in the light of everything else that happened that the Union in this case had a genuine and continuing interest in having its statutory right to recognition enforced or determined by the Board's process.[56]

In Allou Distributors, 201 NLRB 47 (1973), Laura Modes was followed in the context of an established bargaining relationship. There, the employer had unlawfully induced decertification activity by promising benefits to induce withdrawals from the union and by its direct involvement in the preparation and circulation of a petition in support of decertification. In consequence of that activity, a decertification petition was filed with the National Labor Relations Board. By virtue of these unfair labor practices, the company's refusal to recognize on the basis of the doubt of the union's majority was found to be a violation of Section 8(a)(5). However, the facts also revealed that the union, during the decertification activity, was informed by an employee that he alone had remained sympathetic to the union, and that all others had signed a petition to leave the union. The next morning the union responded with six nonemployee union representatives who literally invaded the company's premises, confronting, in full view of others, employees responsible for the decertification activity and threatening them and their families with reprisals if they persisted in their efforts to withdraw from the union. In addition, one of the owners was physically assaulted by two union representatives. The conduct of the union representatives was described by the administrative law judge as ". . . the invasion of the Company's warehouse . . . by a relatively large number of union representatives, who ignored the protest of the employer, who effectively disrupted the employees' normal work activities, and who behaved as if they were in control of the premises, created a potential for violence and placed the employees in fear of physical harm and loss of employment."

In another case of overt violence by nonemployee union officials, the Board revoked a union's decertification. See Union Nacional de Trabajadores (Carborundum Co.), 219 NLRB 862 (1975). In that case, though the union had been recently certified in a Board-conducted election, the violence erupted in consequence of matters unrelated to a continuing recognitional dispute or to any other unlawful conduct on the part of the employer. The Board in revoking the certification relied not only on the "brutal and unprovoked physical violence" established on the record before it but also on the basis of that particular labor organization's "extensive record of similar aggravated misconduct in other recent cases" both of which "evinced an intent to bypass the peaceful methods of collective bargaining contemplated in the Act and commonly accepted and practiced by labor organizations and employers throughout the country."[57]

The reluctance of the Board to apply Laura Modes to strike misconduct, where provoked by serious unfair labor practices on the part of the employer, was plainly suggested in Grede Foundries, Inc., 235 NLRB 363, 364 (1978). The labor organization in that case had enjoyed an established bargaining history dating back some 15 years. The Board granted a bargaining order, stating: "[I]t is beyond peradventure that but for the Company's antecedent unfair labor practices the Union would not have engaged in a strike to protest the Company's unlawful acts, and thus would not have been in a position to commit the violations . . . which accompanied its strike." As further observed by the Board:

> [I]t was the Company that set in motion those events which ultimately resulted in the multiplicity of violations of the Act found herein, and which were begun for the express purpose of undermining the collective-bargianing process by unlawfully attempting to deny to its employees the right to representation by their collective-bargaining agent which had represented them continuously for almost two decades.

The trepidations by the union during the course of the strike in that case included mass picketing and physical obstruction of access to the plant. Threats were made by a nonemployee union representative and, in one instance, that same union representative threw a brick from the picket line, in the presence of other strikers, after which a nonstriker was followed by him and other strikers with tailgating so close as to actually make contact with the bumper of the nonstriker's vehicle. It also appeared that threats of physical harm to nonstrikers and their families were continuous, property was vandalized, nonstrikers were physically assaulted, and roofing nails were scattered by nonemployee union representatives. On one occasion, the tailgating of an automobile of a nonstriker was accompanied by the use of a slingshot against it. A nonemployee union representative was identified as involved in the throwing of a board with steel spikes under the front tires of a truck crossing the picket line and in spraying an irritating substance into a car carrying nonstrikers, as well as the placement of a firecracker on the side of a nonstriker's autombile as it passed through the picket line. A nonemployee union representative was also found to have shot pellets at automobiles of nonstrikers.[58]

In applying Laura Modes and withholding an 8(a)(5) remedy, the administrative law judge concluded:

> . . . that this is a case in which, soon after the issuance of the complaint against the company, the Union lost interest in enforcing employee rights by lawful means and called the strike with a deliberate plan of intimidation and violence which continued for over a month and resulted in a multiplicty of violations of the Act by the Union hardly less grave than the company unfair labor practices which gave rise to the strike.

A Board panel, Chairman Fanning and Member Jenkins, with Member Murphy dissenting, reversed as to this issue. The majority agreed with the administrative law judge that five factors are relevant to consideration of whether to deny a bargaining order because of misconduct in the face of an 8(a)(5) finding. They are as follows:

1. The extent of the Union's interest in pursuing legal remedies.
2. Evidence of deliberate planning of the acts of violence and intimidation attributable to the Union.
3. Whether assaults by union advocates were provoked.
4. The duration of the Union's misconduct; and
5. The relative gravity of the Union's misconduct as opposed to that of the Company.[59]

The Board majority nonetheless disagreed with the result reached by the administrative law judge in applying these standards to the facts involved and granted the 8(a)(5) bargaining order.

In New Fairview Hall Convalescent Homes, 206 NLRB 688 (1973), the administrative law judge withheld a bargaining order under authority of Laura Modes in the face of what he considered to be "serious acts of misconduct" during a strike. He relied on the following incidents of misconduct perpetrated in the main by acknowledged union representatives:

> . . . I find and conclude that Union Representative Brown accompanied by striking employees forcibly entered the Employer's nursing home during the strike; Union Representative Brown accompanied by striking employees and others followed nonstriking employees to and from work and repeatedly threatened them with physical harm and property damage; striker Dean, also picket captain for the Union, called in a bomb scare to the nursing home during the strike; Union Representative Ciulla threatened nonstriking employee Rich with property damage; Union representatives participated in mass picketing, blocking the ingress and egress of nonstrikers and banging on cars: Union Representative Morico kicked a car and cursed at and threatened management and, thereafter, attempted to run one of the Company's representative off the road during the strike; striker Dean threw small rocks or pebbles at a supervisor's car attempting to leave the facility during the strike; strikers Mary J. Fazzino and Linder Alger assaulted a representative, nonstriker, and damaged her property; and union representatives threatened, followed and harassed management's representatives as they attempted to enter and leave the facility. And, as found supra, . . . even before the strike union representatives repeatedly attempted to enter the Employer's facility without permission.[60]

The Board found that the employer violated Section 8(a)(5) by rejecting the Union's demand for recognition in the face of designation by a majority through signed authorization cards and thereafter engaged in pervasive and extensive acts of coercion and restraint and interference with employee rights so as to undermine their support of the Union. The Board reversed the administrative law judge's conclusion that a bargaining order was inappropriate in the face of the aforedescribed strike misconduct. In rejecting Laura Modes, the Board stated as follows:

> We do not condone any picket line violence, and the processes of this Board are available to prevent its recurrence, as is evidenced by the 8(b) proceeding herein. But we also are reluctant to deprive a substantial group of employees of the benefits of collective bargaining because of the misconduct of a few miscreants. Here, looked at in perspective, there were but few instances of misconduct by a relatively small proportion of strikers, which occurred only sporadically in the context of a 4-month long strike and against the background of Respondent's frequent and recurring unfair labor practices. Viewed in that light, while recognizing that the matter is not altogether free from doubt, we have concluded that the extraordinary sanction of withholding an otherwise appropriate remedial bargaining order would not best effectuate the policies of the Act.[61]

[58] In addition to the foregoing, the Union was found not responsible for extensive damage of an anonymous nature experienced by nonstrikers with respect to their property away from the picket line. Thus, one night three nonstrikers discovered that their cars had been damaged by fire. Later, another nonstriker awoke to find the porch of her apartment on fire which resulted in an explosion and complete destruction of her apartment.

In Great Chinese American Sewing Co., 227 NLRB 1670 (1977), the Board found that strike misconduct did not reflect a sufficiently total disinterest on the part of the union in pursuing the "peaceful legal process provided by the Act . . . and hence, did not warrant withholding an otherwise appropriate remedial bargaining order." The Board indicated, however, that "a further repetition of conduct attributable to the Union in cases coming before the Board will be scrutinized with a view to withholding our remedial process."

Under the above holdings, I am not convinced that Laura Modes affords relief to Respondent herein. The strike herein did involve serious misconduct, but the latter for the most part was anonymous and effected away from the picket line and inferentially linked to the strike by virtue of timing and the fact that nonstrikers had been victimized. Any finding that union representatives contributed to an atmosphere of violence or intimidation is handicapped by the fact that direct evidence links their misdeeds to sporadic incidents and that which could not be viewed as extraordinary in the tense atmosphere created by a strike at two locations in the face of an employer's continued operation transpiring over a period of almost 4 months. In contrast to the anonymous conduct, the conduct of strikers and their supporters at the picket line was, for the most part, tranquil and, despite abusive language and threats, it is noted that the threats were scattered. Thus, threatening language was attributed to unidentified strikers on only four occasions,[62] by a nonemployee union representative on one occasion,[63] a picket captain on one occasion,[64] and only one instance where a threat was uttered by an identified striker.[65] Beyond the foregoing, aggravated vandalism was experienced by nonstrikers who were victimized by anonymous phone calls and damage to their automobiles. Also of unknown origin, was an oil spill and two bomb threats. At the same time, however, the property of Respondent was respected, physical assaults upon nonstrikers were absent, and there was no mass picketing foreclosing ingress and egress to the plant.

With respect to the anonymous conduct, it would be difficult to conclude that all was totally divorced from the strike action. At the same time, however, it does not necessarily follow that every act of vandalism sustained by a nonstriker during a lengthy strike was at the hands of strikers, union representatives, or others subject to control of the latter. Reliance on anonymous conduct to influence a hard fought representation dispute is always hazardous and may well encourage sinister behavior on the part of elements in a community that may, perhaps, oppose unionization. In any event, vandalism is often senseless and without ulterior motive, and the possibility is ever present that at least some of the malicious mischief of an anonymous nature herein was a matter of coincidence. There is also the possibility in a case such as this where relatives, friends, and children are actively engaged in support of the strikers, that forces are unleased which are beyond the knowledge and control of the union, or indeed, even the strike participants. In short, third party conduct is a dangerous predicate for application of the remedial disqualification envisioned by Laura Modes.

In any event, even if the third party conduct evidenced on this record by credible proof were attributable to the Union, the Board has heretofore etched its concern as to the applicability on Laura Modes to strike misconduct. Only once has the Board withheld remedy in connection with a recognitional strike.[66] In that case, however, there was no Board election and the refusal to bargain charges were not filed until some 5 months after the violent strike began. Furthermore, the employer had engaged in no unfair labor practices reflective of animus, and, indeed, might not even have been guilty of a refusal to bargain under the present state of law.[67] In stark contrast to Artcraft Mantle, the Board declined to follow Laura Modes in Grede Foundries, supra, and Fairview Nursing Home, supra.[68] This misconduct involved here did not measure up to the atmosphere of intimidation presented in either of the latter cases. The evident trend away from a withholding of remedial processes in consequence of strike violence is not only consistent with the fact that the "fitness" of the exclusive representative is the focal point of Laura Modes, but comports with results in other areas where the Board has been called upon to exercise its discretionary remedial authority. Thus, in Union de Tronquistas Local 901 (Lock Joint Pipe Co.), 202 NLRB 399 (1973), the Board declined to direct a union to afford backpay to employees who sustained a loss of work as a result of strike violence. The Board stated as follows:

> The extension of backpay liability to a situation where, as here, only picket line misconduct has occurred involves important considerations going to the heart of the right to strike under Sections 7 and 13 of the Act. Those sections of the Act have been called the safety valves of labor management relations. Emotions run high among those for and those against the union. Regrettable [sic], sometimes there is violence and the threat of violence. This we deplore and in no way condone. However, adequate remedies under the Act other than backpay exist to prevent the occurrence of violence without interference with the right to strike.

extent as to substantially diminish that right. For the misconduct of a few pickets may be sufficient to find the Union in violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A) and enough to intimidate many employees . . . . Faced with this financial responsibility, few unions would be in a position to establish a picket line. In our opinion, union misconduct of this nature, while serious, does not warrant the adoption of a remedy so severe as to risk the dimunition of the right to strike, a fundamental right guaranteed by Sections 7 and 13 of the Act.

Whether the withholding of access to the remedial process of the Board under Laura Modes would serve to impede the statutorily protected right to strike may well be debatable. But the thinking of Lock Joint Pipe, may come into play more directly when one considers the impact of Laura Modes upon employee resort to the peaceful representation procedures of the Board. Here, for example, the employees rather than resort to other forms of pressure elected to secure union representation through those processes. Thus, the representation petition was filed in June 1978 and the election conducted in August 1978. Despite overwhelming designation of the Union, a certification of representative did not issue until June 1979. The Union demanded negotiations on June 20 and, not having been extended the courtesy of a clear expression of position by Respondent, finally struck on July 24.[69] To date, employees have not reaped any of the benefits of their freely expressed choice, and it is predictable, in the most absolute terms, that no final answer will be afforded in the near future. Although the Employer's refusal to bargain in this case did not occur in the context of collateral unfair labor practices, and itself was free from union animus, its conduct in that regard contributed to delay, prejudiced employee choice, and contributed exclusively to the determination of employees to resort to self-help. In my opinion, Laura Modes, if at all relevant to postelection strikes which merely seek employer compliance with a certification, should stand on no different footing than recognitional strikes provoked by egregious, pervasive, or other employer unfair labor practices precluding the conduct of a fair election. In the latter, application of Laura Modes has no impact upon, and does not render futile, the pursuit of representation claims through Board procedures. In the former, however, the dishonor of a certification, whether or not in good faith, also creates a volatile condition suggesting to employees that time expended in the representation proceeding was futile. The resulting unrest in either type of recognitional dispute carries the potentional for strike action with its inherent proclivity for violence. To apply Laura Modes to such postcertification strikes is to send a clear message to employees that patient adherence to National Labor Relations Board representation procedures has produced a nullity. At a minimum, that result ought to be reserved to unmistakably extreme, egregious conduct, which is directly traceable to the designated union. Only in such circumstances should employees, several years later, be required to climb that ladder anew.

Based on the foregoing, I am convinced that in order to preserve the integrity of the Board's election procedures, union excesses in the course of the strike to enforce a certification should be judged with no greater stringency than applied where the union's claim for representation is based on NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575 (1969), and more serious offenses to the Act by employers. Here, the misconduct attributable directly to union representatives, its agents, and the picket line was more sporadic and less drastic than the pattern which confronted the Board in New Fairview Hall Convalescent Home, 206 NLRB 688, enfd. sub. nom. Donovan v. NLRB, 520 F.2d 1316 (2d Cir. 1975). Furthermore, even if the Union be deemed vicariously responsible for the entirety of the anonymous conduct established by credible evidence herein, the totality of the misconduct would fall short of the oppressive pattern which faced the Board in Grede Plastics, 235 NLRB 363 (1978). In neither case was Laura Modes deemed controlling, and in each the Board remedied the employer's 8(a)(5) violation by affirmatively ordering the employer to recognize and bargain with the Union. A similar result is warranted here.

Conclusions of Law

1. Honaker Mills, Division of Top Form Mills, Inc. is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. International Ladies Garment Workers Union, Upper South Department, AFL–CIO is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. All production and maintenance employees employed at the employer's Honaker, Virginia location; but excluding office clerical employees, technicians, sales people, profesional employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act, constitute a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

4. Since June 6, 1979, the above-named labor organization has been and is now the certified and exclusive representative of all employees in the aforesaid appropriate unit for the purpose of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

5. By refusing, during June and July 1979 and at all times thereafter, to recognize and bargain collectively with the above-named labor organization as the exclusive bargaining representative of all employees in the appropriate unit, Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

6. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

The Remedy

Having found that Respondent had engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of [69] Although Respondent claims that the Union's delay in filing the instant 8(a)(5) charges til August 15, some 3 weeks after the strike began, evidenced a disinterest in utilizing the peaceful processes of the Board, any such view must be considered in the light of Respondent's persistent and continuing failure to afford the Union the benefit of direct communication as to whether or not it would honor the certification.

Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, it shall be recommended that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and, on request, to bargain collectively with the Union as exclusive representative of all employees in the appropriate unit and, if an understanding is reached, to embody such understanding in a signed agreement.

In order to assure that the employees in the appropriate unit will be accorded the services of their selected representative for the period provided by law, the initial period of certification shall be construed as beginning on the date Respondent commences bargaining in good faith with the exclusive representative in the appropriate unit. See Mar-Jac Poultry Co., 136 NLRB 785 (1962); Lamar Hotel, 140 NLRB 226, 229 (1962), enfd. 328 F.2d 600 (5th Cir. 1964), cert. denied 379 U.S. 817 (1964); Burnett Construction Co., 149 NLRB 1419, 1421 (1964), enfd. 350 F.2d 57 (10th Cir. 1965).

As indicated, the General Counsel claims extraordinary relief in the form of partial reimbursement to the Board and the Union of reasonable counsel fees, salaries, witness fees, transcript and record costs, printing cost, and other costs and expenses to be determined at the compliance stage. The relief sought by counsel for the General Counsel is limited, however, to the cost incurred with respect to only two of Respondent's defenses both of which are characterized as "frivolous attempts to avoid its bargaining obligation." The first such defense relates to the claim founded upon the erroneous description of the unit in the certification issued by the Board. The second relates to Respondent's attempt during the hearing to litigate evidence regarding an investigation by the United States Department of Labor of certain activity regulated by the Landrum-Griffin Act. This proceeding was concerned in its essential respects with Respondent's defense based on Laura Modes. Other matters, even if viewed as frivolous, did not burden the record beyond the de minimus. It is also a fact that Respondent's counsel, on being cautioned by me that unnecessary delays would not be countenanced, reacted thereafter in a cooperative vein, while contributing positively to the expeditious conclusion of the hearing. Accordingly, having first hand knowledge as to the manner in which this cause was litigated, it is the opinion of the undersigned that the General Counsel's request for extraordinary relief in the present circumstances would neither enhance the administrative process nor effectuate the policies of the Act.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[70]

ORDER

The Respondent, Honaker Mills, Division of Top Form Mills, Inc., Honaker, Virginia, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to bargain collectively concerning rates of pay, wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment with International Ladies Garment Workers Union, Upper South Department, AFL–CIO, as the exclusive bargaining representatives of its employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All production and maintenance employees employed at the employer's Honaker, Virginia location; but excluding office clerical employees, technicians, sales people, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

(b) In any like or related manner restraining or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) On request, bargain with the above-named labor organization as the exclusive representative of all employees in the appropriate unit with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment, and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement.

(b) Post at its Honaker, Virginia facility, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[71] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 5, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(c) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

[70] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[71] If this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
AN AGENCY OF THE UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

> To organize
> To form, join, or assist any union
> To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To act together for other mutual aid or protection

To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain collectively concerning rates of pay, wages, hours and other terms and conditions of employment with International Ladies Garment Workers Union, AFL–CIO as the exclusive representative of the employees in the bargaining unit described below.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce our employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL, on request, bargain with the above-named union, as the exclusive representative of all employees in the bargaining unit described below, with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment, and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement. The bargaining unit is:

> All production and maintenance employees employed at the employer's Honaker, Virginia location; but excluding office clerical employees, technicians, sales people, professional employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND DENNIS

On 19 March 1982 Administrative Law Judge Robert M. Schwarzbart issued the attached decision. The Respondent and the General Counsel filed exceptions and supporting briefs.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions,[2] as modified herein, and to adopt the recommended Order.

The judge found that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by refusing to reinstate unfair labor practice striker Andrew Blalock even though he engaged in picket line misconduct. For the reasons stated in our respective opinions in Clear Pine Mouldings, 268 NLRB 1044 (1984), we do not agree.

Briefly, the judge found the facts to be as follows. At approximately the 5 p.m. quitting time, Blalock, who had been picketing with other employees near the Respondent's property, came though a double gate onto the Respondent's property and began cursing loudly and making gestures at employees as they left the building to reach their cars. He was observed to be holding either a stick or an iron bar. Employee Wayne Lewis came onto the premises and led Blalock back to the gate. Then Blalock "beat on" employee C. W. Pittman's car as it exited the gate and did $200 worth of damage.

The judge, applying then-current Board law, found that Blalock's conduct was not sufficiently egregious to warrant the Respondent's failure to reinstate him. In Clear Pine Mouldings, we held that henceforth we would apply the test the United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit set forth in NLRB v. W. C. McQuaide, Inc.,[3] and find that an employer is justified in not reinstating a striker whose "misconduct is such that, under the circumstances existing, it may reasonably tend to coerce or intimidate employees in the exercise of rights protected under the Act."[4]

We find that Blalock's conduct clearly meets this test. Blalock intentionally took a club and used it to inflict $200 damage to nonstriking employee Pittman's automobile. This conduct clearly tended to coerce or intimidate employees in the exercise of their protected right to refrain from striking. The fact that the strike was an unfair labor practice strike does not warrant a different result. In our view the Act should not protect such obviously intimidating conduct as using a weapon to damage a fellow employee's vehicle.[5] Accordingly, we modify the judge's remedy to provide that Andrew Blalock is not entitled to be made whole for any loss of earnings resulting from the Respondent's failure to reinstate him.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Central

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[2] In its exceptions the Respondent contends that the judge had three private conferences with the General Counsel some time during the hearing which prejudiced the Respondent. The Respondent did not, however, raise this claim of impropriety until after the judge issued his decision. In so doing, the Respondent did not comply with the requirements of Sec. 102.37 of the Board's Rules and Regulations. Accordingly, we find that the claim was not timely raised. NLRB v. Sanford Homes for Adults, 669 F.2d 35 (2d Cir. 1981).

Chairman Dotson finds that the private conferences raised in the Respondent's exceptions were not prohibited ex parte communications under Secs. 102.127(b), 102.129(b), and 102.130(c) of the Board's Rules and Regulations. The Respondent admits it received prior notice of the meetings and consented to them. To the extent the Respondent contends that it unwillingly permitted the third conference between the judge and counsel for the General Counsel, Chairman Dotson finds the claim to be untimely. Chairman Dotson deems the Respondent's contention to be similar to that of a request for disqualification and that the Respondent was obligated to promptly raise its objection by filing an affidavit with the judge prior to his decision.

In sec. III,A,7,e, of his decision and in the section entitled "The Remedy," the judge inadvertently failed to include Ernest Hollifield's name in the list of employees that the Respondent unlawfully laid off. We correct this error.

We agree with the judge's finding that the Respondent unlawfully refused to bargain over the effects of the sale of part of its business. We do not rely, however, on his entire rationale, but rely on his finding that Thomas Bailey Sr. and his attorney gave Union Representative Ellis the runaround and disclaimed any responsibility for bargaining with the Union.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

ROBERT M. SCHWARZBART, Administrative Law Judge. These consolidated cases were heard on September 21 through 24, 1981, in Raleigh, North Carolina, pursuant to charges filed by International Union of Operating Engineers, Local 465, AFL–CIO, affiliated with International Union of Operating Engineers, AFL–CIO (Union), and a consolidated complaint.[1] The complaint alleges that Central Mack Sales, Inc. (Sales, Central Truck Leasing Corporation) (Leasing, North Carolina Coastal Motor Lines, Inc.) (Coastal) and D. Thomas Bailey Sr., an individual, are alter egos, and, as a single integrated employer, have violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act). The Respondents, in answering the successive complaints, denied commission of unfair labor practices.

Issues

1. Whether the Respondents are a single employer within the meaning of the Act.

2. If so, whether Sales and the other Respondents, as alter egos, violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by unilaterally making the following changes in employees' terms and conditions of employment without prior notice to and bargaining with the Union as certified bargaining representative of such employees:

(a) Requiring that employees present physicians' excuses in order to receive sick leave benefits.

(b) Requiring employees to present physicians' notes in order to receive holiday pay when the employees were absent the day before and/or after the holiday.

(c) Modifying the attendance policy to provide for the discharge of any employee who is absent for 5 consecutive days without notifying the employer.

(d) Discontinuing the prior practice of providing employees with free coffee.

(e) Increasing the amount of continuous service an employee must have to become eligible for paid vacation.

(f) Laying off four employees when work was slack, rather than continuing the former policy on those occasions of having such employees do clean-up and maintenance work.

3. Whether the Respondents further violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by:

(a) Refusing to discuse with union representatives the above-described unilateral changes during negotiating sessions for a first contract.

(b) Failing to notify the Union of its decision to sell the assets of Sales before completion of that sale.

(c) Not bargaining with the Union concerning the effects on employees of its decision to sell Sales' assets.

(d) Telling employee-bargaining representatives during contract negotiations that it would not give the Union a contract.

(e) Declining to continue with contract negotiations because of the pendency of unfair labor practice charges filed against the Respondents by the Union.

4. Whether the strike that commenced on August 11, 1980,[2] was a unfair labor practice strike.

5. Whether the Respondents, in reprisal for the union sympathies of employees, violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by discriminatorily:

(a) Reducing the number of hours worked weekly by employees.

(b) Imposing more onerous working conditions by failing to operatively maintain and purchase soap concentrate for the steam jenny, a mechanical cleaning device.

(c) If the strike referred to in item 4, above, was an unfair labor practice strike, refusing to reinstate one unfair labor practice striker and delaying the reinstatement of eight others following an unconditional offer to return to work.

6. Whether the Respondents violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by threatening employees with unspecified reprisals because of their union and protected concerted activities.

All parties were given full opportunity to participate, to introduce relevant evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, and to file briefs. Briefs, submitted by the General Counsel and the Respondents, have been carefully considered.

On the entire record[3] of this case and by observation of the witnesses and their demeanor, I make the following

[1] The docket entries are as follows: In Case 11–CA–9325, the charge, first and second amended charges were filed on August 11 and 29, 1980, and April 28, 1981, respectively. The charge, first and second amended charges in Case 11–CA–9385 were filed on September 3, October 10, 1980, and April 28, 1981, respectively. The charge, first and second amended charges in Case 11–CA–9638 were filed on January 13, April 28 and May 15, 1981. The complaint in Case 11–CA–9325 issued September 18, 1980. The order consolidating Case 11–CA–9325 and 11–CA–9385 and first consolidated complaint issued October 16, 1980. The second order consolidating Cases 11–CA–9325, 11–CA–9385, and 11–CA–9638 and amendment to prior consolidated complaint issued February 27, 1981. The amended consolidated complaint in all three matters issued in final form on May 18, 1981.

[2] All dates hereinafter are 1980 unless otherwise specified.

[3] The General Counsel, by motion attached to his brief, objects to receipt of the Respondents' posthearing offer to five court records concerning offenses by Andrew Blalock, the unreinstated striker, other than File No. 80 CR 47840, the only such record the Respondents had been granted leave to obtain and introduce as their Exh. 15 after the close of the hearing. Noting that the proferred court records, beyond the one described, had not been contemplated or explained during the hearing, do not relate to the present proceeding, and exceed the ruling as to what might be submitted posthearing, no foundation has been established for their receipt. Accordingly, the General Counsel's motion is granted and only File No. 80 CR 47840 is received in evidence. The additional court records attached thereto remain only as rejected exhibits.

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION: THE RESPONDENTS' STATUS AS A SINGLE EMPLOYER

The parties agree that Sales[4] and Leasing[5] both North Carolina corporations, during the 12 months prior to issuance of the second amended consolidated complaint herein, a representative period, operated facilities in Raleigh, North Carolina. In addition, Leasing had other locations in North and South Carolina. During the above period, Sales and Leasing each derived gross revenues in excess of $500,000, and each received products valued in excess of $50,000 at their Raleigh facilities from points directly outside the State of North Carolina.

On the foregoing facts I find that, during the times material herein, Sales and Leasing are employers engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

Although the Board asserted jurisdiction over Coastal in a 1975 case,[6] the Respondents deny that the jurisdictional findings are still valid at this time as Coastal, although still existing as a corporate shell, has not been operational since about September 1, 1977.[7]

The General Counsel, contrary to the Respondents, has alleged that Sales, Leasing, Coastal, and D. Thomas Bailey Sr.[8] constitute a single integrated enterprise engaged in the businesses described above from common facilities in Raleigh, North Carolina, and that they are a single employer within the meaning of Section 2(2) of the Act.

Bailey Sr. has been president of Sales since 1964 when that company was organized as a franchise retail dealer of Mack trucks. He became president of Leasing in late 1967 or early 1968, when it was organized to lease tractors and trailers to selected accounts. From their inception, continuing until the early 1970s, Bailey Sr. was the sole stockholder of both corporations.

About 1966 or 1967, Bailey and First Citizens Bank and Trust Company established Coastal as a joint venture, each owning 50 percent of the stock. Earlier, the bank had repossessed the equipment of a poultry-hauling operation following that company's default,[9] and the venture had been undertaken to keep the bank from losing money on the repossession. Coastal, however, was beset early by financial difficulties and, following a 1978 lawsuit against Bailey, his wife, Sales, Leasing, and Coastal brought by the bank on a note of indebtedness for which all were liable, Bailey became and remained the sole stockholder of Coastal. As noted, Coastal stopped operating in 1977.

In 1972, while all three corporation were still active, Bailey gave half of his shares in Sales and in Leasing to his four children, equally divided. These recipients were his sons, D. Thomas Jr., Samuel T., and James E.,[10] and a daughter, Nan Bailey Crawford. During the following year, 1973, Bailey gave the remainder of his stock in Sales and Leasing to his above-named children, again about equally divided, except that he retained a 1-percent interest in each corporation. From the time of these divestitures to the present, Bailey Sr. has continued to serve as president and board chairman of both corporations although personally owning but a small minority of their stock. He also has remained president, board chairman, and sole stockholder of Coastal.[11]

Since 1973, the officers of Sales have included Bailey Sr., as president, Sam T. Bailey, as vice president and either assistant treasurer or assistant secretary, and Gwen M. Jones, as secretary-treasurer.[12] The Sales board of directors since 1973 has included Bailey Sr., as chairman, and Bailey Jr., Samuel T. Bailey, and Gwen Jones.

The same persons also served in like capacities as officers and directors of Coastal between 1975 and 1977, and of Leasing since 1973, except that Bailey Sr. described Bailey Jr. as a director but not an officer of Leasing.[13]

In addition to the above, Bailey's daughter, Nan Bailey Crawford, presently serves as principal bookkeeper and as an officer for Sales and for Leasing,[14] and William H. Hatton, during the times material herein, was vice president and operations manager of Sales. Hatton, who is not related to the Baileys, never served as a director of any of the corporations.

Bailey Sr. testified that he is in charge of labor relations for the three corporations[15] and controls their day-to-day operations. At the hearing of this matter, Bailey Sr. reaffirmed as still true certain testimony given by him in a November 1979 deposition. There, Bailey, after tracing the history of his involvement with the three corporations and the stock conveyances to his children, avowed that, although he owned but 1-percent of Coast-

[4] Until January 7, 1981, when its assets were sold, Sales was engaged in the retail sale and repair of Mack trucks.

[5] Leasing is in the business of leasing trucks to selected customers.

[6] See N.C. Coastal Motor Lines, 219 NLRB 1009 (1975). There it was found that Coastal, a North Carolina corporation, was engaged in the operation of freight terminals in several States and in the interstate transportation of freight by motor carrier, and that, during a representative 12-month period, Coastal had derived gross revenues in excess of $50,000 from the interstate transportation of freight.

[7] Coastal has been continued only to wind up its affairs and for possible sale as a tax loss.

[8] D. Thomas Bailey Sr. will most frequently be referred to herein as Bailey Sr. to distinguish him from his son D. Thomas Bailey Jr., also active in the above companies.

[9] At the time, Bailey was a member of the bank's board of directors.

[10] James E. Bailey worked as parts manager.

[11] Bailey's children have never owned stock in Coastal.

[12] Bailey Sr., on whose testimony much of the discussion concerning the issue of single employer is based, identified Jones as the office bookkeeper who, prior to her departure at an unrecalled date, had held various offices in the corporations, as described.

[13] The same persons also served in like capacities as officers and directors of Coastal's dispatchers and, from the record of the present case, it is apparent that for some time he was active in Coastal's operations. Since 1977, Bailey Jr. apparently derives his principal livelihood from sources unrelated to the family enterprises. However, he has retained his positions as officer and director, returning to assist, as required.

[14] Bailey Sr. is not certain whether his daughter has ever been a director of any of the corporations.

[15] The Respondents, in their brief, argues that, in spite of this testimony, there was no common labor relations policy as drivers employed by Coastal before 1977 were subject to different terms and conditions of employment than mechanics and parts employees at Sales, while Leasing, at that time, had had no nonmanagerial employees. This assertion, however, is inapposite as the over-the-road drivers employed at Coastal had been subject to ICC regulations and as common control of labor relations at two or more corporations does not require that terms and conditions of employment at each be uniform. With central control, uniform terms can be negotiated where desired.

al and Leasing, he controlled all the stock in those corporations.[16] When asked in the deposition how he could control the stock, in view of the much larger holdings in these corporations by his progeny, Bailey Sr. replied, "I controlled it because it was my children and I controlled the stock and they would have gone along with me." Still later in the deposition, Bailey asserted that he "could have" disposed of all the stock, and reiterated his control of all the stock of Leasing and Sales. As noted, at the time of the hearing, Bailey Sr. personally owned all of Coastal's stock.

Although Coastal, in 1977, employed several mechanics, Leasing, until early 1981, had no employees. Basically, between the three corporations, all employees, including mechanics, were carried on Sales' payroll. Accordingly, Sales' mechanics serviced and provided parts for trucks owned by Leasing and Coastal. Sales also sold trucks to Coastal.

In addition to its headquarters facility in Raleigh, Leasing also had two other locations in South Carolina, one in Georgia, and various additional facilities in North Carolina. Certain Sales-employed mechanics were regularly assigned to service and provide parts for Leasing's trucks in Raleigh and at these outlying locations as well. Leasing also received truck servicing and parts from outside concerns. In addition to working on Leasing's trucks, Sales' mechanics provided truck maintenance services for the general public and only approximately 10 to 20 percent of Sales' repair services were performed for Leasing. Although Sales provided services and parts to trucks owned by Leasing and Coastal and, as noted, sold trucks to Coastal, Sales made no purchases from those companies.

Sales billed Leasing and Coastal for labor, services, and parts, but Coastal, in financial difficulty, only paid some of those bills, as determined by Bailey Sr., the chief executive officer of each corporation. Bailey Sr. testified that in January 1981 Sales was compelled to sell its assets because Coastal's continued and mounting indebtedness to Sales deprived Sales of the ability to continue to meet its obligations. As of about 1975, Coastal owed Sales approximately $300,000 for parts and services. Between 1975 and 1977, this indebtedness increased to $900,000. Nonetheless, Sales continued to perform services and to provide parts for Coastal. From 1975 to 1979, both Bailey Sr., and Leasing made loans to Sales. Bailey's personal loans to Sales totaled at least $175,000, documented by interest-bearing notes.[17] By October 1, 1979, Sales had accumulated a total indebtedness to Leasing in excess of $387,600, which sum increased to almost $392,000 by the end of the year. In spite of the continued existence of these obligations by Sales to himself and to Leasing, Bailey Sr. did not include either Leasing or himself in the affidavit listing Sales' creditors, prepared in accordance with state law in connection with the sale of Sales' assets in 1981.

[16] In that deposition, Bailey even listed the value of the shares of Sales, Leasing, and Coastal among his personal assets, years after having given them to his children.

[17] There is no showing that this indebtedness was ever repaid.

Although Coastal stopped operating in 1977, it nonetheless continued to accumulate debt. A demand note executed by Bailey Sr., as Coastal's president, to Leasing, dated October 1, 1979, reflected an obligation decently in excess of $337,000, an amount that increased to well over $582,700, evidenced by a like note executed just 1 year later.[18]

When Coastal stopped operating, it was indebted to a bank in the amount of about $400,000, evidenced by a note secured by the senior Bailey's real estate, including his home. As part of this transaction, the Baileys also mortgaged assets of Leasing to the bank. Accordingly, with the approval of Leasing's directors, Bailey Sr. and three of his children, Leasing has been making significant monthly payments on this note to the bank to avoid foreclosure.

Bailey explained that as principal officer and sole shareholder of Coastal it had been his decision to seek loans for Coastal in excess of $500,000 from Leasing, rather than from Sales, as the latter corporation had no money.

Over a period of 7 years, rather than issuing monthly notes of indebtedness, the Baileys had followed a practice of merely recording their inter sese loans in the books of the various corporations. These were summarized by the accountant, who usually audited the books around October 1 of each year, at which time notes were consolidated as of that date.

When, in 1981, Sales' assets were sold, its mechanics and parts employees, after a brief delay, were transferred to Leasing's payroll.[19] For mechanics who had been regularly assigned by Sales to service Leasing's trucks, this move did not entail a change in duties.

At the time of the hearing, Leasing and the remnants of Sales and Coastal were headquartered in the same Raleigh offices, using a telephone listed to Leasing. It is there that the books and records for the three companies are kept and the officers and directors meet and conduct business.[20]

In Bryar Construction Co.,[21] another case where a father had transferred legal ownership of a company to his children while continuing in operative control, Administrative Law Judge Ries, in his Board-approved decision, restated the rule as follows:

> In determining whether two or more businesses are sufficiently integrated so that they may be fairly treated, for jurisdictional and other purposes, as a single enterprise, the Board looks to four principal factors: (1) common management; (2) centralized control of labor relations; (3) interrelation of oper-

[18] Bailey explained that the continuing increases in Coastal's indebtedness level after 1977 was required to centralize Coastal's widely scattered equipment and to service the same before it could be sold.

[19] As Leasing had not, until then, had its own employees, a delay was required to enable printing of paychecks in Leasing's name. By the time of the hearing, Leasing had three employes on its payroll who previously had worked for Sales.

[20] Earlier, and in 1977, the three companies had been located in facilities in a different part of the Raleigh area. There, Sales and Leasing had shared offices in one building, and Coastal had operated from another across the street, under the day-to-day administration of Bailey Jr.

In the present matter, as in Bryar Construction Co., supra, it is clear that Bailey Sr., as chief executive officer and board chairman of the three corporate Respondents, was actively in charge of operations, including labor relations. It was he who had invested in these companies and continued to operate and refinance them according to his own judgment. Although the Respondents in their brief point out that since 1973 Bailey's children have been the majority shareholders and directors of Sales and Leasing and, under the bylaws of each corporation, the president is subordinate to and serves at the directors' pleasure and authorization, as noted in Bryar, the vesting by Bailey Sr. of legal ownership of Sales and Leasing in his offspring after having obtained all the shares of those corporations "seems of scant significance in light of the plainly dominant role he played in the affairs" of the Bailey family and the corporations in question.[22] Bailey Sr. himself described his status in his 1978 deposition, years after conveyance of his shares in Leasing and Sales. There he attested to his continued control over those companies and his right to dispose of their stock. Significantly, too, in that deposition, Bailey Sr. continued to list the value of those shares among his personal assets. The financial dealings between Bailey Sr., Leasing, and Sales can hardly be considered to have been conducted at arm's length when the major obligations of Sales to Leasing and to Bailey Sr., personally, were not recorded in the statutorily required list of Sales' creditors when its assets were sold. As noted, Bailey had never released to his children ownership of his shares in Coastal.

The three corporations could not have been more interrelated financially and functionally. They dealt with each other when operative and, by virtue of their common control, extended to each other vast aggregating unsecured credit. As a result of these continuing inbred obligations, Sales could no longer continue in business, even with the extensive financial support from Leasing and Bailey Sr. Although Leasing is still operating, its assets, too, have been pledged because of the burdens placed on it by the interrelated financial difficulties of Sales, Coastal, and the Baileys. The resources of Bailey Sr. and those of the corporation are completely entwined. Even if the three concerns were not to be judged a single enterprise, during the period encompassed by the complaint, Leasing, through the agency of Bailey Sr., would be at least a joint employer of the Sales employees, and jurisdiction would attach in that manner.[23]

It also is appropriate to assert jurisdiction over Bailey Sr. as an individual alter ego to the corporate Respondents. Bailey, in effect, was the employer of the Sales employees and, when the assets of that Company were sold, he moved certain employees to Leasing's payroll. As will be shown, he is the responsible force behind the unfair labor practices to be found hereafter. From the record herein, it clearly is appropriate that the order to be issued attach to a respondent who is responsible for the infractions found to the extent that he may be capable of remedying them.[24]

Accordingly, I find that Sales, Leasing, Coastal, and Bailey Sr. constitute a single integrated employer, hereinafter referred to as the Respondent, and that this employer is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.[25]

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Refusals to Bargain and Related Discriminatory Conduct—Facts and Conclusions

1. The appropriate unit; majority status

The pleadings establish that on April 8, following a representation election conducted on March 31 in Case 11–RC–4835, the Union was certified as the exclusive bargaining representative of employees in the following unit:

> All parts department employees, mechanics, body and paint shop employees, cleanup steam room employees at Central Mack Sales' Raleigh, North Carolina, facility, excluding all office clerical employees, professional employees, sclesmen, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

The parties are in agreement that on the date of the election there were approximately 19 employees in the bargaining unit. All events herein occurred during the certification year. As it has been found above that at all times material herein Sales, Coastal, Leasing, and Bailey Sr. were a singnle integrated employer, it hereby is concluded that the duty to bargain with the Union on behalf of employees in the above-described unit devolved upon each of them.

[22] While the record does show that certain notes were reissued annually by vote of the directors who, as close family members, had ready access to each other, key actions by Bailey Sr. proceeded without formal authorization. Accordingly, corporate minutes show no written authorization for Bailey's personal loans to Sales, for the sale of Sales' assets, and for the consolidation of Sales' indebtedness to Leasing into a single note.

2. The negotiating sessions[26]

Claiborne P. Ellis, the Union's business manager, testified that before the first contract negotiating session with the Respondent following certification, he was advised by several employees that the Respondent had changed certain preexisting working conditions. Ellis was informed that the Respondent had discontinued its practice of providing free coffee for the employees, had stopped making change for employees to facilitate use of in-plant vending machines, had shortened the regularly assigned workweek, and had increased the period of continuous service required for employees to qualify for paid vacations. While Ellis did not separately communicate with the Respondent concerning these reported changes, he prepared contract proposals addressed to these modifications.[27]

The first contract negotiating session took place at the Respondent's office on June 24. The Union was represented by Ellis and employees Douglas Critcher and Jess Martindale. Present for the Respondent were Bailey Sr., his son, Vice President Sam T. Bailey, and Sales Vice President and Operations Manager William H. Hatton.[28]

Ellis began the meeting by presenting the Union's total contract proposal to Bailey Sr. Ellis declared his preference that negotiations be conducted in a professional, businesslike way. Bailey agreed, but stated that the Union could not make him do a "damn" thing and he did not know if the Union would have a contract.

In response to the Union's written proposal that the Company should continue the practice of providing free coffee to employees, Bailey Sr. replied that there would be no more free coffee; it cost too much.[29] No progress was made during the first session, or thereafter, concerning the Union's proposal that there be no change in the Company's sick leave procedures,[30] or to the Union's proposal for continuation of the policy whereby vacation leave eligibility had required less initial continuous service by the employees. The Respondent rejected the vacation proposal also on the ground that it would be too costly.

During the first session, Ellis asked Bailey Sr. to fill in blanks left in the first, second, and third steps of the proposed grievance procedure with the names of the Respondent's representatives to be involved in those stages.[31] Bailey Sr. retorted that there was no use to put anyone's name in those spaces at that point because the Union might not have a contract.

The General Counsel contends that statements by Bailey Sr. at the outset of the June 24 meeting, that the Union could not make him do a "damn" thing and he did not know if the Union would have a contract, and his later refusal during that session to fill in the names of company grievance-processing representatives on the ground that to do so served no purpose as the Union might not have a contract, were both violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. As it is clear that the Act does not compel an employer to agree to any specific proposals made by a bargaining agent,[32] Bailey's initial phrase to the effect that the Union could not make him do a "damn" thing was an accurate statement of fact and is not unlawful. However, his two expressions of doubt that the Union would have a contract, and his refusal for that reason to name company representatives to participate in the grievance procedure, all were violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. The Board long has recognized that statements of that kind amount to an anticipatory refusal to bargain and inculcates in employees a sense of futility about the exercise of free choice in selecting a representative for collective bargaining. Hence, the Board has held that such statements constitute unlawful interference with the exercise of Section 7 rights.[33]

On June 30, the same individuals met for the second negotiating session. On that occasion, the parties did not again discuss the asserted discontinuation of free coffee, or the Union's proposals concerning sick leave or vacation eligibility, which had been rejected by the Company during the first session. Rather, the parties continued to review the Union's complete contract proposal presented at the first meeting. On June 30, the parties discussed wages, checkoff of union dues, and seniority. However, the grievance procedure, discussed at the June 24 meet-

[26] On the matter of initial animus, employee Henry Shields Jr. testified that in March a group of about seven employees, including Shields and Troy Bullard, informed Bailey Sr. that they had decided to vote a union into the shop. Bailey had replied that that was fine. If they wanted to vote for the Union, they should do so. However, later that day, during another break taken by Shields and employee Jerry Rigsbee in the office, Bailey Sr., also present, told the men that he hoped they all knew what they were doing. It could get them in serious trouble if they did not know what they were doing. Bailey continued that the employees all could join women's lib, it did not make any difference to him. The General Counsel contends that Bailey's statement that the Union could, in effect, get the employees in serious trouble if they did not know what they were doing constituted a threat of unspecified reprisals in violation of Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act. However, in Kranco, Inc., 228 NLRB 319, 321 (1977), it was found that similar statements to employees by a supervisor did not contravene the Act's provisions but merely were permissible statements of permissible opinion. Unlike here, in Kranco, supra, the supervisor's remarks were phrased "crudely and profanely" and, accordingly, afforded greater potential for intimidation. Accordingly, I do not find that the statement by Bailey Sr. on that occasion was in violation of Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act.

[27] All matters referred to above as alleged unlawful unilateral changes will be considered in separate detail below.

[28] The Respondent concedes that Hatton was a supervisor and agent of Sales within the meaning of Sec. 2(11) of the Act, but denies his authority with regard to the other Respondent corporations. Having found above that Sales, Leasing, and Coastal are alter egos, it is concluded that Hatton also was a supervisor within the meaning of the Act of the other corporations.

[29] The Union's proposal during the first session that change be made available to employees for use in the vending machines was agreed to by Hatton during the second negotiating session and is not an issue in this proceeding.

[30] The General Counsel contends that under the invoked change, employees still were allowed five paid sick days per year but that physicians' certificates were required for any day that the employees were out. They previously had not been required. The Union proposed that such certificates be submitted only after three consecutives days of absence.

[31] The grievance procedure had not been settled.

ing, again was considered at the second session and Bailey then announced that he, as company president, would hear the first step of the grievance procedure.

The parties met again for a third session on July 30. In addition to those who had been present at the earlier sessions, the July 30 meeting also was attended by Leonard Duggins of the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service and Gary Cupp, an insurance consultant retained by the Union.[34] The mediator asked the parties to go over the contract again so that he could assess their positions. As before, no company proposals were presented. Toward the end of that session, Cupp, the Union's insurance consultant, presented and explained the Union's proposals concerning health and life insurance. This part of the discussion continued for about 15 minutes toward the end of the meeting. Just before adjournment, Bailey Sr. asked Cupp, "If this union mess doesn't come through, can I buy that insurance?"[35]

3. The Respondent's refusal to continue negotiations during the pendency of unfair labor practice charges.

A fourth negotiating session was scheduled for Friday, August 8. However, on July 30, after that day's negotiating session, Ellis, acting for the Union, filed unfair labor practice charges against the Respondent in Case 11-CA-9301.[36]

Subsequently, Ellis received from the Respondent a carbon copy of the following letter, dated August 4, to mediator Duggins from Bailey Sr.:

> We are surprised to receive in the mail today from the National Labor Relations Board a charge of unfair labor practices instituted by Mr. Ellis of the International Union of Operating Engineers.
> Under the circumstances, we feel the meeting to be held on Friday, August 8, should be postponed until this matter had been settled.

On August 5, Ellis sent the following mailgram to Bailey Sr.:

> In reply to your letter dated August 4, 1980, we do not agree to postpone meeting scheduled for Friday. Negotiations should continue until charges have been investigated.

In reply, Ellis received the following letter, dated August 6, from Bailey Sr.:

> Our letter of August 4 is very clear, and under no circumstances will we negotiate while unfair labor practice charges are outstanding.

The Respondent's refusal to continue to meet with the Union while unfair labor practice charges were pending before the Board, a position documented by its letters of August 4 and 6, is patently unlawful.[37] Accordingly, I find that by such conduct the Respondent refused to bargain within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

4. The strike and the refusal to promptly reinstate certain strikers after the unconditional offer to return to work

Ellis, following receipt of Bailey's August 6 letter, asked the bargaining unit employees to meet with him at his office. Sixteen employees attended. Ellis told the employees that Bailey had completely refused to meet. In response to their questions as to what could be done, Ellis told them that unfair labor practice charges had been filed and recommended that they wait while the Board forced Bailey back to the bargaining table. Responding to questions as to how long that process could take, Ellis told the group that it could take the Board up to a year. When employees asked what they could do to compel Bailey to return to the table, Ellis declared that their only other alternative was to take strike action. Ellis, however, stated his opposition to a strike. Nonetheless, at the urging of employee Clinton Jackson, who told the group that Bailey had much work in the shop to get out and a strike would be a good way to get him to negotiate, the 16 employees voted to stop work.

The strike began on August 11. All 18 of the employees then in the unit were on the picket line during the first day. The men carried picket signs prepared by Ellis which read "Mack truck employees/on strike/unfair/ Mr. Bailey refused to meet." The various signs bore different legends, but all referred to unfair conduct by the Respondent.

About August 25, while the strike was still in progress, the Respondent's vice president Hatton told employees on the picket line that their insurance would be canceled and that they would have to turn in their uniforms or have the costs deducted from their last paychecks. While Hatton was still at the line, he agreed to give Bailey Ellis' message that the Union was ready to resume negotiations at any time. However, Ellis did not receive a response.

On August 28, Ellis requested that Hatton ask Bailey Sr. to come out. When Bailey did so around 9:30 a.m., Ellis handed him the following letter:

> On behalf of all employees presently on strike, we are hereby making an official unconditional request to return to work Tuesday, September 2nd at 8:00 a.m.

[34] The Conciliation commissioner, Duggins, had come to the meeting at Ellis' request, and with Bailey's consent. Ellis explained that after no progress was made at the June 24 bargaining session, he had met with unit employees to report on the negotiations. The employees had wanted to strike at that time, but Ellis had rejected the idea before a mediator could assist in negotiations.

[35] Contrary to the General Counsel, I find that while Bailey's question as to whether he could buy that insurance if this union mess does not come through reflects a negative attitude toward the Union, unlike certain of Bailey's earlier remarks found violative herein, this comment was framed too speculatively to constitute an unlawful anticipatory refusal to bargain within the meaning of Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act.

[36] Case 11-CA-9301, which later was withdrawn, is relevant here only with respect to the Respondent's reaction to that charge having been filed.

[37] See Pine Manor Nursing Home, 230 NLRB 320, 326 (1977); Zenith Radio Corp., 187 NLRB 785 (1971).

The Respondent's reply was by letter dated August 28, signed by Bailey Sr. as president of Sales:

> In answer to your hand-delivered letter today, I have called our attorney and he is in court all day August 28, 1980.
> He and I will get together tomorrow and give an answer just as soon as possible.

By letter dated August 29, addressed to Ellis, Bailey Sr. wrote the following:

> We are denying your request as represented in your hand-delivered letter of August 28 until further consultation with our attorney.
>
> In the meantime work in the shop has dropped off so we do not have enough work for all the strikers since some have been replaced, but we can use Jack Eatmon and Kevin Cieciorka Tuesday, September 2 if they are interested.
> For the others we will employ as needed on a Seniority Basis.

Subsequently, however, all striking employees who desired to return to work were reinstated by the Respondent, except Andrew Blalock.[38]

Noting that the strike that began on August 11 had been precipitated by the Respondent's unlawful refusal to meet with the Union to engage in further contract negotiations while the Union's unfair labor practice charges were still pending, in the context of the Respondent's other conduct found unlawful herein,[39] in agreement with the General Counsel, I find that the strike was an unfair labor practice strike from its inception and that the strikers are unfair labor practice strikers entitled to immediate reinstatement as of September 2, the effective date of the offer to return.[40] However, offers of reinstatement were not made to the affected employees until they were separately contacted by the Respondent at later dates. Allowing 1 additional day for return from the date that the Respondent telephoned each employee with its offer to reinstate,[41] I find that backpay for the following strikers runs from September 2 to the dates shown below next to their respective names.

James Bech	Sept. 9 (reinstated)
Troy Bullard	Nov. 11 (reinstated)
Ernest Hollifield	Oct. 2 (reinstated)
Curtis Jones	Oct. 2 (reinstated)
Wayne Lewis	Sept. 9 (reinstated)
Robert Liertz	Oct. 7 (reinstated)
Troy Lindsey	Sept. 11 (reinstated)[42]
Henry Shields Jr.	Nov. 17 (declined reinstatement)

Accordingly, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by refusing to promptly reinstate the above unfair labor practice strikers in response to the Union's unconditional offer on their behalf, delivered on August 28.

5. The Respondent's refusal to reinstate Andrew Blalock

Although all others who participated in the unfair labor practice strike that began on August 11 subsequently were offered reinstatement by the Respondent at the various times shown, Bailey Sr. has refused to take back Andrew Blalock because of his picket line conduct.

Bailey Sr. testified that during the week of August 11 around the 5 p.m. quitting time, he saw Blalock, then picketing, come through the double gate onto the Respondent's property to a distance of 30 to 40 feet. Although Bailey Sr. observed the scene from a distant window, he related that he could hear Blalock cursing loudly and see him making signs at employees as they left the building to go to their cars at the end of the day. He noticed that Blalock was holding either a stick or an iron bar. As Bailey Sr. watched, he saw another employee/picket, mechanic Wayne Lewis, come onto the premises and lead Blalock back to the gate. Bailey Sr. then saw Blalock "beat on" employee C. W. Pittman's car as it exited through the gate. Pittman continued through the gate, turned around, drove back in, and went to the office where he announced that he was going to swear out a warrant against Blalock. Bailey Sr. told Pittman that if he thought it justified, he should do so.

At Blalock's May 15, 1981 trial on charges brought by Pittman, he pleaded guilty to damaging personal property, paid court costs of $60, and received a 60-day suspended sentence with 3 years probation. It also was agreed that Blalock would repair the damage to Pittman's car, estimated at approximately $200, in his shop.[43]

Citing Blalock's unauthorized encroachment on company property while serving as a picket, his cursing of nonstriking employees, and the damaging attack on Pittman's automoble and his subsequent guilty plea to criminal charges based on that attack, the Respondent con-

---

[38] Respondent has based its refusal to put Blalock back to work on his conduct during the strike. This will be considered separately.

[39] Additional violations of the Act occurring before the start of the strike will be discussed below.

[40] The Union's unconditional offer on August 28 to return the employees to work as of September 2, rather than immediately, may have been influenced by Drug Package Co., 228 NLRB 108, (1977), enfd. as modified 570 F.2d 1340 (8th Cir. 1978), where the Board found that a 5-day grace period was a reasonable accommodation between the interest of the employees in returning to work as quickly as possible and the employer's need to effectuate that return in an orderly manner. However, in International Business Systems, 258 NLRB 181 fn. 4 (1981), it was found that the 5-day grace period served no useful purpose where the offer to return to work had been rejected, and the backpay period in that case was held to commence as of the date of the offer to return. Although here the offer to return also was initially rejected, the present matter is distinguishable in that the offer, by its terms, did not become effectively until a specified later date. Therefore, while no grace period would have been necessary here, from the offer made I find that the backpay period for all unfair labor practice strikers began on September 2.

[41] Although the Respondent sent employee Robert Liertz his offer of reinstatement by letter dated October 1, the mailing and an intervening weekend served to extend Liertz' response period until Monday, October 6. Liertz' backpay period ended on October 7, the day he returned to work.

[42] Although there is no showing in the record as to when Lindsey was offered reinstatement, the Respondent has not disputed the shown cutoff date asserted by the General Counsel.

[43] Apparently, Blalock had the facilities to do auto body repair work.

tends that Blalock has rendered himself ineligible for reinstatement.

Blalock, in turn, denied having entered company property during the strike and that it was he who had struck Pittman's car.[44]

Blalock related that while picketing outside the gate, 2 or 3 days after the start of the strike, he saw Bailey Jr. accompany Pittman to his car. Pittman did not slow down as he drove through the gate and caused striker Wayne Lewis to jump out of the way to avoid being hit. Pittman declared that his car had been hit with the stick,[45] so he made a U-turn and drove back through the gate, causing Blalock to scramble out of the way. Bailey Jr. came out and met Pittman. At the time of the incident, Lewis was about 6 to 8 feet outside the gate.

Blalock explained that he had pleaded guilty because he did not have the money for an attorney and had not been told of his right to have a court-appointed lawyer. In addition, he originally had expected that Lewis would keep his promise and testify that it had been he, not Blalock, who had had the stick. Lewis had accompanied him to court on April 17, 1981, when Pittman's charges were first set for hearing. However, the trial was postponed to May 15, by which date Blalock had learned from friends that Lewis had moved to Alabama. Accordingly, as Blalock did not have counsel, as he could pay the $60 in court costs to "get out from under the matter," and was able to repair Pittman's car himself for less than it might otherwise cost, Blalock pleaded guilty.[46] Blalock admitted having cursed nonstriking employees as they left work.[47]

Noting that, as found above, Lewis was among the strikers reinstated by the Respondent, Bailey Sr.'s account of Blalock's picket line activities leading to the decision not to reinstate him is credited. Unlike Blalock, who rather inconsistently has pleaded guilty to criminal liability for damaging Pittman's car, while asserting innocence and seeking to blame someone else who was not there, Bailey Sr. had continuously recognized Blalock's responsibility. In determining why Blalock alone among the unfair labor practice strikers was not ultimately reinstated, there is no evidence that he had been more active than other employees either in organizing for the Union or in urging the strike. Apart from the Pittman event, there is no demonstrated reason as to why the Respondent should be more reluctant to return Blalock to work than had been the case with the others, including Lewis.

Nevertheless, having accepted the Respondent's account that Blalock, during the strike, ventured on company property, cursed at departing nonstriking employees, and struck Pittman's car, it still does not appear, in balancing the Respondent's conduct that provoked the unfair labor practice strike, in the context of the numerous earlier company violations to be considered herein, against Blalock's picket line misconduct, that it can be concluded that Blalock's picket line activity was of such serious nature as to disqualify him from reinstatement. While Blalock's conduct can in no way be condoned, the Board has held that absent "brutal violence" a picket is not disqualified from reinstatement in spite of participation in various incidents of misconduct, which may include using obscene language, making abusive threats against nonstrikers, engaging in minor scuffles and disorderly arguments, momentarily blocking cars by mass picketing, and engaging in other incidents of minor misconduct.[48] Consistent with these cases, the Board and the courts long have held that minor active misconduct must have been contemplated by Congress when it provided for the right to strike and that this right would be unduly jeopardized if any misconduct, without regard to seriousness, would deprive the employees of the Act's protective mantle.

Accordingly, it is concluded that neither Blalock's actions nor his language were sufficient to warrant denying him reinstatement to his job as of September 2, consistent with the Union's unconditional offer to return.[49] The Respondent's failure to so reinstate Blalock is violative of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

6. The alleged failure to notify and negotiate with the Union concerning the sale of Sales' assets

Union Business Manager Ellis testified that in mid-November he telephoned Bailey Sr.[50] During the conversation, Bailey agreed to Ellis' suggestion that a mediator be present at their next meeting as at the last one on July 30. Ellis also told Bailey Sr. that he had heard through the grapevine that Bailey had been planning to sell his business. Bailey Sr. answered that he had no intention of selling, but that he knew some people who were interested in buying the business.

Thereafter, on January 8, 1981, Bailey Sr. sent the Union the following letter:

> Central Mack Sales, Inc., on January 7, 1981 entered into a contract to sell its physical assets to Carolina Mack Sales, Inc. This transaction is effective January 19, 1981. Central Mack Sales will release the Mack Truck Franchise and will terminate its operation.

---

[44] Blalock described Pittman as a striker replacement who had been one of the first to apply for work in response to the Respondent's newspaper advertisement for mechanics.

[45] Blalock asserted that it had been Lewis who had been holding the stick, which he described as either a sawed-off pick handle about 1-1/2 inches in diameter or a large tobacco stick.

[46] Pittman, however, never took his car to Blalock's shop.

[47] Samuel T. Bailey, the Respondent's vice president, testified, contrary to Blalock, that he frequently had seen Blalock inside the fence during the picketing.

[48] Coronet Casuals, 207 NLRB 304, 305 (1973), and cases cited at 305 fns. 6–10.

[49] Mark Twain Marine Industries, 254 NLRB 1095, 1108–09 (1981). Blalock's entitlement to reinstatment as an unfair labor practice striker as of September 2 was not erased by his subsequent guilty plea to charges based on related picket line misconduct. The seriousness of Blalock's picket line misconduct must be evaluated on the basis of what actually was done by him. His obligation to answer for such conduct in another forum, while germane in helping to establish Blalock's responsibility, does not serve to exacerbate its seriousness so as to deprive him of the strong protections afforded unfair labor practice strikers under the Act which, otherwise, would be his. The penalty imposed did not affect Blalock's availability for assignment by the Respondent.

[50] Earlier, Ellis had written to Bailey Sr. requesting that the parties resume negotiations, to which Bailey had agreed. Accordingly, Ellis' call to Bailey, described herein, was to work out certain details concerning resumption.

> On behalf of Central Mack Sales, Inc., I repeat my offer to you to discuss all matters of mutual interest at any convenient time. I do not think it necessary to wait until a mediator becomes available as you have suggested.

Ellis forwarded the following letter, dated January 15, to Carolina Mack Sales[51] at its Raleigh office:

> The International Union of Operating Engineers Local 465 is ready, willing and prepared to bargain concernng wages and other terms and conditions of employment, including how the sale by Central Mack Sales to Carolina Mack Sales affects the employees.
>
> To date both Central Mack Sales and Carolina Mack Sales have refused to bargain at all.
> Please contact me as soon possible for bargaining.

Subsequently, Ellis received the following letter, dated January 19, from Bailey Sr.:

> In reply to your letter dated January 15, 1981, we take exception to the second paragraph which states "To date both Central Mack Sales and Carolina Mack Sales have refused to bargain at all."
>
> Your statement is completely false, and the record will show that you have repeatedly put off every offer on our part to bargain and not once have we refused to do so.
> We are and have been willing to meet at any reasonable time.

Ellis testified that Bailey's letter of January 8, written 1 day after the sale of Sales' assets, was the first notice to the Union that such a sale had been intended and that it had been issued approximately 24 hours after the transaction had taken place. He related that within a day of receipt of the January 8 letter, he had telephoned Bailey and asked if the latter would be willing to negotiate with him concerning the future of these employees. Bailey replied that Ellis would have to call his attorney, William Joslin. However, when Ellis telephoned Joslin, he was told that the Respondent had no responsibility for the employees; they no longer were the Respondent's employees and the responsibility lay with the new company.

After receiving notification that Sales' assets had been sold, Ellis did not thereafter present claims for backpay, vacation pay, or other monetary compensation, nor did he ever propose to the Respondent a time and place to meet to negotiate the effects on employees of the sale. In explanation, Ellis related that he did not feel he could effectively present demands or proposals to an employer who already had sold the assets of his business, but that he would have proceeded differently had he learned of the sale in advance.

Bailey Sr. testified that he first had begun to speak to the purchaser in October 1980. As negotiations progressed, it was expected that the deal for the sale of the assets could be completed on December 31, but certain discrepancies delayed in finalization until late in the afternoon of January 7, 1981. On that date, the parties signed an agreement whereby the purchaser would buy Sales' assets effective January 19.

On January 8, the day after execution of the sales agreement, Bailey told the employees of the sale and sent the Union written notification. During the week of January 12, Sales was shut down for inventory-taking. Certain bargaining unit mechanics were assigned to assist in this; others were laid off. The regular work of the shop did not continue that week.

Accordingly, the facts as to what occurred in connection with the sale of Sales' assets in relation to notice to the Union of the sale and subsequent bargaining are not in dispute.

Since the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in First National Maintenance Corp. v. NLRB,[52] an employer, to bargain in good faith, need not negotiate with its employees' bargaining representative over the decision to close a part of its business. However, an employer contemplating partial closure is required to give the union timely notice and to bargain concerning the effects of partial closure on the bargaining unit employees. The practical effect of the First National Maintenance Corp. decision is to equate the bargaining obligations of an employer who would partially close his business with those of employers contemplating total closure. Accordingly, while it is now settled that an employer may close his business, either partially or completely, without bargaining about the decision to do so, the Act requires that the employer afford the union the opportunity to discuss the effects of such closure on bargaining unit employees. In Climate Control Corp.,[53] a case involving complete closure, it was found that the respondent had failed to bargain in good faith with the union about the effects on employees of the termination of operations. There, as here, the decision to terminate was a fait accompli, and the business closed as contemplated by the time the Union received the respondent's letter of notification. When, here, Ellis attempted to secure negotiations on behalf of the affected employees, he was referred by Bailey to the Respondent's attorney, who, in turn, disclaimed the Respondent's responsibility for those employees and referred him to the purchaser of Sales' assets, Carolina Mack Sales. Ellis then wrote to that company to request bargaining, also without success. While it is conceivable that Ellis might have been more agressive in seeking negotiations, particularly in view of the later response from Bailey Sr. protesting interest in same, I find that after the runaround Ellis had received from Bailey Sr. and the Respondent's attorney Joslin, after first having been presented with an accomplished sale, Bailey's offer to bargain in his letters of January 8 and 19 was not in good faith. Contrary to the Respondent, I conclude that the Union has not slept on its rights. The Respondent's bad faith here concerning the Union is spotlighted by the mid-November conversation where

[53] 257 NLRB 173 (1981).

Bailey Sr., when asked by Ellis whether the Respondent planned to sell its business, had denied same, although discussions concerning such a sale actually had been in progress since October. The Respondent's conduct herein, as indicated by the General Counsel, is consistent with the Respondent's earlier violation in N. C. Coastal Motor Lines,[54] where Coastal, one of the Respondent alter egos found herein, was held to have breached Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by unilaterally terminating the bargaining unit operation without notice to the union and without offering to bargain over the effects.

Under these circumstances, I find that the Respondent has failed to bargain in good faith with the Union about the effects of the partial termnination of its operations on the bargaining unit employees, in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

7. The alleged unilateral change in terms and conditions of employment

The General Counsel contends that the Respondent contravened its bargaining obligation by bringing about certain unilateral changes in terms and conditions of employment of bargaining unit employees after the March 31 election without notice to or consultation with the Union. Except where indicated, these contentions have not been challenged by the Respondent.

The Board in Master Slack [55] again stated the general principles of law applicable to the General Counsel's contention:

> Unilateral changes of "wages, hours and terms and conditions of employment," as defined in Section 8(d), at a time when an employer its obligated to bargain with the duly designated representative of the employees in an appropriate unit, violates Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.[3] This applies even absent an independent showing of overall subjective bad faith[4] and is not excused by "economic expediency, even in good faith."[5]

These principles also are applicable where an employer changes terms and conditions of employment during the pendency of objections to an election . . . which eventually results in certification. (Mike O'Connor Chevrolet-Buick-GMC Co., Inc., etc, 209 NLRB 701, 704 (1974), reversed on other grounds 512 F.2d 684 (C.A. 8, 1975).)

a. The alleged more stringent policy for calling in when absent

The Respondent by posted notice, dated April 15,[56] to all Sales shop personnel on the subject "Absent from work" announced the following:

> Any employee absent from work without proper notification to the company for a period of five (5) working days, will be automatically terminated.

Although Clinton Jackson[57] testified that while he personally had followed a practice of telephoning Shop Foreman Bob Jacklet,[58] he had not known of the prior existence of the rule set forth in the April 15 bulletin providing for discharge of employees who have not called in after 5 days of absence.

The reasonability of the policy posted on April 15 is not the issue here. The General Counsel's evidence that this rule did not exist before the Union's certification is unrebutted, and the posting of the rule at the time indicated is undisputed. As the rule created a different policy affecting the obligations and discipline of employees and the terms and conditions of their employment, the Respondent clearly was bound to bargain with the Union concerning this matter prior to implementation. The Respondent's failure to do so was violative of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

b. More stringent requirements of physician's receipts to receive sick benefits

Also on April 15, the Respondent posted the following bulletin to Sales shop personnel on the subject of vacations and sick leave:

> It is and has always been the Company policy, rules and regulations, that the vacation and sick leave[59] and the amount of each is based on the length of continued service.
> Also, in order to receive sick leave benefits, employee will have to have a doctor's receipt of his visit.

John Curtis Jones[60] testified that before the representation election the Respondent had followed a policy of providing 5 paid sick days per year. Sick employees could call Shop Foreman Jacklet, but no doctor's note ever had been required. This changed a week after the Union was certified as bargaining representative, when the April 15 bulletin was posted requiring, as applied, that employees who were out even for but 1 day submit a doctor's receipt stating the reasons for absence.

[56] The Union was certified on April 8.

[57] Jackson first left the Respondent's employ about 1975, but returned there in 1976 continuing to work as a mechanic until the strike of August 11. After the strike, he again worked for 2 more months before leaving the Respondent's employ.

[58] In accordance with the stipulation of the parties at the hearing, I find Jacklet to be a supervisor within the meaning of Sec. 2(11) of the Act.

[59] The Respondent provides 5 paid sick days a year.

[60] Jones was employed by the Respondent as a diesel mechanic from July 1974 until January 8, 1981, when Sales' assets were sold.

Jones related that this new policy was utilized after the representation election, but even before the notice was posted, to deprive him of paid holiday. Prior to the election, an employee, in order to receive holiday pay, was required to work both the day before and day after the holdiday. The record shows that the Respondent observed Easter Monday, April 7, as a paid holiday. Jones, however, had called in sick on April 8, the day after this holiday. On his return on Wednesday, April 9, he was told by Jacklet that he would not receive holiday pay for April 7. When Jones asked why, reminding Jacklet that he had called, Jacklet told him that he now would have to have a doctor's excuse. Jones' protests were unavailing and he was not paid for that holiday. Jones testified without contradiction that before the representation election, he had been absent on days immediately preceding or following holidays, but always had been paid without the requirement of a physician's note.

Having first learned of this rule from employees, Union Representative Ellis attempted to redress the situation by proposing, during the June 24 negotiating session, that employees be allowed 7, rather than 5, paid sick leave days per year and that physicians' certificates be required only after 3 consecutive sick days. This was rejected without a counterproposal.

Accordingly, it is concluded that by requiring, for the first time, immediately following the Union's selection as bargaining representative that employees submit physicians' "receipts" in order to receive sick leave benefits, without prior negotiation with the Union, the Respondent unilaterally created a more stringent prerequisite to eligibility. Also, as applied to Jones on April 8, the new rule also served to unilaterally change eligibility for holiday pay. As both matters affect terms and conditions of employment, the Respondent's unilateral conduct in both instances was in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1)of the Act.[61]

c. The change in providing coffee for employees

Henry Shields Jr., Curtis Jones, and Leamon Alford, all employed at the time by the Respondent,[62] testified that before the representation election, employees had been able to obtain coffee from an open pot on a table in the shop office. Although there was a box with "10 cents" written on it, these witnesses related that hardly anyone put money into the box to pay for their coffee. When Shields first began to work for the Respondent, he did contribute to the box, but discontinued when he noticed that in doing so he was virtually alone. Jones, too, described nonpayment as the general practice and related that he "could" take coffee 1 or 2 weeks at a time without contributing. Then, feeling guilty, he might put in a dollar. These witnesses understood that the coffee, the cups, and the accompaniments were paid for from proceeds from various soft drink vending machines on the premises[63] or by Bailey Sr.

However, on a Monday morning, about 1 week after the election, employees found that the coffeepot was gone from the office, replaced for the first time by a coffee vending machine at 25 cents a cup.

The Respondent contests the above facts only in asserting that the coffee provided before installation of the vending machine had not been free, as indicated by the 10-cent sign on the coffee box.

In the present matter, I find that under the longstanding practice before arrival of the coffee vending machine, coffee had been provided by the Respondent for employees at no required cost to them. While 10-cent contributions were encouraged by placement of the money box, such donations rarely were made. This contrasts with the involuntary 25-cent payments required by the vending machine.

No notice was given to the Union in advance of the machine's installation and, when the Union raised this matter, among others, during the June 24 negotiating sessions, the Respondent summarily rejected the proposed resumption of its former coffee policy as too costly.

In Ford Motor Co. v. NLRB,[64] the U.S. Supreme Court affirmed the Board's consistently applied rule that in-plant food prices are among those terms and conditions of employment about which the employer and the union must bargain under Section 8(a)(5) and 8(b)(3) of the Act, and observed that in-plant food prices and services are matters not too trivial to qualify as mandatory subjects of bargaining.

Accordingly, the Respondent clearly was required to notify and bargain with the Union concerning installation of the coffee vending machine before its installation. Even, assuming, arguendo, as in Ladish Co.,[65] that once the vending machine was installed, the Respondent, by reason of its contract with the machine supplier, could not control the price per cup,[66] it very much was within the Respondent's discretion to determine, in the first instance, whether the machine was to be installed. The Respondent's unilateral action and its later rejection of meaningful bargaining with the Union on this fait accompli during the June 24 negotiating session stand as violations of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

d. Alleged change in vacation policy

Jones, Shields, and Jackson, then employees, also testified that following the representation election, but before the first negotiating session, the Respondent changed its policy concerning vacation eligibility by requiring that employees be continuously employed for 1 year as of January 1 of the year in which they became vacation eligible. Before this, employees became eligible for vacations after 12 months of continuous service computed from the employee's date of hire.

[61] Although the Respondent did show that by April 8 Jones had used all 5 days of his sick leave, his claim on that occasion was not for sick leave but for holiday pay. His stated reason for not having received same is not rebutted.

[62] Alford, one of the employees who moved to Leasing after sales' assets were sold, is still with the Respondent. He testified as a witness for the Respondent.

[63] Jones had received this information from shop clerk Glen Alford in 1979.

[64] 441 U.S. 488 (1979).

[65] 219 NLRB 354 (1975), enf. denied 538 F.2d 1267 (7th Cir. 1976).

[66] The Respondent did not offer to prove that it could not control the coffee vending machine price.

Accordingly, under the preexisting system, an employee hired on February 1 of a given year, if continuously employed, would become eligible for a vacation as of February 1 of the following year, his anniversary date. Under the system allegedly put into effect after the election, a continuosly employed employee with a February 1 starting date would not become eligible on his anniversary date because he had not been employed for 12 months by his first January 1 with the Employer, but would have to continue to work until after January 1 of the following year.

It is not clear exactly when in 1980 this asserted change in vacation policy was put into effect. Inferentially, it is tied to the above-quoted bulletin posted on April 15, which concerned the requirement for doctors' receipts in order to receive sick leave benefits. That bulletin also provided, somewhat ambiguously, that the amounts of vacation and sick leave are based on length of continuing service. This notice, however, did not detail the alleged changes in vacation policy. Shields, however, testified that he had learned of the change when, "after the union started," Shop Foreman Jacklet announced to employees in the plant that they no longer would get a vacation after 12-months but that they would have to wait 2 years.

Union Respresentative Ellis testified that his first knowledge of this more stringent vacation eligibility requirement also came from employee complaints. He thereafter sought to meet this issue at the June 24 bargaining session by proposing a progressive vacation schedule based on length of service, with initial eligibility vesting as of the employees' first anniversary dates. This, however, was rejected as too costly. On this matter, as with others, there was no company counterproposal.

The Respondent sought to show through the testimony of Donna Hester[67] and Sandra Nunn[68] that the vacation policy had not changed, but, rather, that eligibility always had been computed as of January 1.

Hester testified that at the bottom of an identified schedule of vacation and sick days, dated April 10, 1978, prepared by her for parts department personnel, she had written, "All vacation and sick leave are based from January 1 of the following year from the date the employee was hired." She testified that that notation was made after she had had separate conversations with Bailey Sr. and Hatton to the effect that employees, after April 1978, no longer were entitled to vacations after only 1 year of employment, calculated from the date of hire. When she made the notation, Hester also called a meeting of parts personnel and announced this new vacation scheduling policy to them.[69]

Although Nunn, too, testified that the January 1 computation date for vacation eligibility was put into effect before 1980, she contradicted Hester's account that it had been promulgated in 1978, relating that it had been put into effect in March 1977. Then, the policy had been typed at the bottom of a posted notice by Bailey's daughter, Crawford, explicating the weeks of available vacation to qualifying years of service. The relevant notation at the bottom of this notice was as follows: "Vacation contingent on continuous service and based on beginning date of January 1 of each year." Nunn iterated that this policy went into effect for all employees, including parts department personnel, in March 1977 while Nunn was bookkeeper, and did not thereafter change. As noted, by 1980, neither Hester nor Nunn was still employed by the Respondent.

In view of the pattern of unlawful conduct found herein calculated to undermine the bargaining process, including the several violations relating to unilateral changes in terms and conditions of employment, I credit the General Counsel's witnesses and find that the vacation policy was unilaterally changed, as described, after the 1980 representation election so as to precondition vacation eligibility on longer periods of continuous service than had been previously required. Although evidence given by Hester and Nunn tends to show that the asserted change had been in effect before 1980, Nunn, by testifying to a March 1977 promulgation, as noted, directly contradicted Hester's testimony that this same policy was first implemented in April 1978. Neither was still with the Respondent in 1980, when the events herein occurred, and their information is not current.

Accordingly, it is concluded that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the act by unilaterally changing its policy concerning vacation eligibility in the period following the representation election and further violated those sections of the Act by refusing to meaningfully negotiate that change in policy with the Union during the June 24 bargaining session.

e. The unilaterally imposed policy of laying off employees during slack work periods

It is undisputed that on Thursday, July 24, Shop Foreman Jacklet summoned employees Curtis Jones, Henry Shields Jr., Clinton Jackson, Joe Williford, and Ernest Hollifield and informed them that Bailey had told him to send home anyone who did not have anything to do. The men then were told that they were being sent home and directed to call the shop before returning to work.[70]

The four employees then asked Vice President Hatton to speak to Bailey Sr. to see if the men could be sent home by seniority as they believed that certain employees who were continuing to work had not been with the Respondent as long as themselves.[71] They also asked for their paychecks for that week. Hatton went to the office and returned with their paychecks, but reported to the men that Bailey had said that he did not have a contract with anybody and did not give a damn about seniority.

[67] Hester had been Sales' parts manager for 9 months when she left the Respondent's employ in mid-August 1978 after nearly 4 years of service.

[68] Nunn was employed by Sales from September 1969 until May 1979, the last 4 years as bookkeeper.

[69] Although parts personnel are also within the bargaining unit, no mechanics were on the schedule prepared by Hester.

[70] Jackson testified that on the day in question work had not been slack. He had been road-testing a truck that afternoon and had returned to the plant about 4:30 p.m. Soon thereafter, he received the news of his layoff.

[71] There is no evidence that seniority previously had been observed in the plant.

The General Counsel, from testimony by Jones, Shields, and Jackson, contends that before July 24, when work had been slack in the shop, the employees were not sent home but were assigned to clean the premises and equipment and to do general repair work. Accordingly, the July 24 layoff was a departure from past practice.

The layoff continued through the next day, Friday, July 25. On the following Monday, July 27, when the men returned to the shop requesting either their jobs or layoff slips, they were returned to work. Although the Union then was engaged in contract negotiations with the Respondent, it did not receive advance notification of these layoffs.[72]

The Board, in Clements Wire & Mfg. Co.,[73] noted:

> Although an employer may properly decide that an economic layoff is required,[5] once such a decision is made the employer must nevertheless notify the Union, and, upon request, bargain with it concerning the layoffs, including the manner in which the layoffs and any recalls are to be effected.[6] By failing to so notify the Union while its objections to the election were pending, Respondent acted at its peril and, since the Union was thereafter certified as the collective-bargaining representative of its employees, Respondent thereby violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.[74]

[5] See, e.g., Southern Coach & Body Company Inc., 141 NLRB 80 (1963), enforcement denied 336 F.2d 214 (5th Cir. 1964).

[6] See, e.g., Keystone Casing Supply, Inc., 196 NLRB 920 (1972); see also The Lange Company, a Division of Garcia Corporation, 222 NLRB 558 (1976).

Accordingly, the Respondent's failure to notify and bargain with the Union concerning the unilateral layoff of Jones, Shields, Williford, and Jackson violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

B. Additional Discriminatory Treatment of Employees—Facts and Conclusions

1. Reduction in the workweek

The General Counsel contends that on March 24 the Respondent, by posted bulletin, signed by Bailey Sr., notified employees of its intent to reduce the weekly work hours of unit personnel from 42.5 hours per week to 40 as of March 26.[75] This, assertedly, was done in retaliation for employee support for the Union. The new work schedule, as posted, altered the existing 5-day workweek to establish one with hours from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. and lunch from 12 to 1 p.m. This allegedly replaced the hours established in an earlier notice to employees, posted August 10, 1979, also signed by Bailey Sr., which had set the 5-day week at 42.5 hours. Under the first such schedule, employees worked from 7:30 a.m. to 5 p.m., with lunch also from noon to 1 p.m. Hours worked in excess of 40 per week were overtime paid at time and a half.

Clinton Jackson[76] testified that after March 26 he no longer received overtime as in the past.

The parties agreed to restrict the evidence on this allegation to General Counsel's Exhibit 19.[77] Without becoming overly involved, records forming part of that exhibit show that during the fourth quarter of 1979 all unit employees were paid a total of 372 hours of overtime out of a total of 8120.8 compensated hours. In the first quarter of 1980, overtime for the unit totaled 315.4 hours of a total of 7805.[78] However, for the second quarter of 1980, the Respondent's record show that while 7721.8 hours were worked by unit employees, only 32 hours fewer than during the preceding quarter, only 144 hours were paid in total overtime. Expressed in percentages, during the fourth quarter of 1979 and the first quarter of 1980, overtime comprised 4.87 and 4.3 percent, respectively, of the net total number of hours worked. In the second quarter of 1980, total overtime hours were only 1.98 percent of the net total number of hours worked. The General Counsel contends that it therefore is reasonable to project the average of the 4.87 and 4.3 percentages of the two quarters preceding the asserted change to conclude that overtime during the second quarter of 1980 should have continued to run at 4.59 percent of the 7721.8 net hours compensated during that quarter. This would provide for a total of 334.4 hours of due overtime in the second quarter of 1980 as compared to the 144 overtime hours reflected by the Respondent's records.[79] The General Counsel also would project that average into the third quarter of 1980 until the start of the strike on August 11.

The Respondent has not offered justification for the reduction in work hours shown, but argues that this matter was improperly litigated as paragraph 10(a) of the consolidated complaint, which contains this allegaton, did not specifically refer to a reduction in available overtime hours.[80] The Respondent's argument is without merit. It is established that although premium pay may be required for work beyond 40 hours per week, employees can be required to work overtime as a condition of employment and have been terminated lawfully for refusing.[81] Employees are not free to set their own work

[72] As noted, in response to news of these layoffs, the Union, on July 30, filed the subsequently withdrawn unfair labor practice charges in Case 11-CA-930, whereafter the Respondent refused to continue negotiations, which in turn led to the strike.

[73] 257 NLRB 1058, 1059 (1981).

[74] In the present matter, the Respondent's obligation to bargain with the Union as the duly certified bargaining representative of its employees is even more pronounced than in Clements Wire & Mfg. Corp., supra, as there the Union, although successful in a representation election, had not yet been certified at the time of the unilateral layoff pending determination of objections to the election.

[75] As noted, the representation election was set for March 31, 3 workdays after the effective date of this notice.

[76] Jackson was then employed by the Respondent as a mechanic.

[77] G.C. Exhs. 19(b) and (c) are summaries of the Respondent's business records showing the number of hours worked by individual unit employees during the fourth quarter of 1979 and the first two quarters of 1980.

[78] The work schedule change was posted at the end of the first quarter of 1980.

[79] As the unfair labor practice strike found herein occurred in the third quarter of 1980, the Respondent's records after August 11, when the strike began, would not be representative.

[80] Complaint paragraph 10(a) alleges that:

> On or about March 26, 1980, Respondent instituted a reduction in the number of hours worked weekly by its employees.

[81] See Poppin Fresh Pies, 256 NLRB 233 (1981).

hours and, similarly, may be disciplined for engaging in partial strikes to protest mandatory overtime.[82] As regular overtime work can be a required part of an employee's assigned work schedule and as the record shows that between August 10, 1979, and March 26, 1980, the Respondent's employees were officially bound by a 42.5 hour workweek, contrary to the Respondent, I find that the relevant complaint allegation was sufficiently specific for purposes of this proceeding.

Noting the Respondent's antiunion conduct found herein, the timing of the scheduling change, effective but 3 workdays before the representation election, and the absence of justification therefor, either to the employees affected or at the hearing,[83] I find that the reduction in the workweek was intended as a discriminatory reprisal for the employees' activities on behalf of and sympathies for the Union, and is in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

2. Refusal to repair the steam jenny

The General Counsel contends that in mid-July the Respondent refused to repair the steam jenny[84] with the purpose of making the employees' work more difficult in reprisal for their having supported the Union. The General Counsel notes that although the Respondent had followed a practice of purchasing soap concentrate for the steam jenny once or twice each month, no shipments of concentrate were received in 1980 between May 23 and August 6,[85] and argues that this hiatus was deliberate. Without the steam jenny, employees are required to clean the greasy parts by hand.

The steam jenny that had been used in the Respondent's shop until mid-summer 1980 was an older machine with a history of frequent breakdowns.

In mid-July, the steam jenny again became inoperative when that mechanism's pump blew up. Clinton Jackson then informed Shop Foreman Jacklet of the steam jenny breakdown. Announcing that he had to clean some parts, he asked if Jacklet was going to get it fixed. Jacklet replied that he would check with Bailey Sr. When Jacklet did not get back to him in about 30 minutes, Jackson returned to Jacklet's office and was told by Jacklet that Bailey had stated that he was not going to fix the steam jenny. Jackson testified that he had had the use of the steam jenny for all the years he had worked for the Company and that when it had broken down in the past, it usually had been fixed by an outside repairman within 2 days. He conceded that the blown pump of the steam engine in July 1980 necessitated more than routine servicing.

Curtis Jones testified that on July 31, after the steam jenny had broken down, he, too, had asked Jacklet if the Company was going to repair the steam jenny or was going to get another one. He pointed out that it was hard for men to do their work without it. Jacklet told him that Bailey had said that he did not give a damn about the steam jenny and was not going to repair it.

The steam jenny was still inoperative when, on August 11, the men went on strike. However, on their return, they found that a new, smaller steam jenny had been installed.

Bailey Sr. testified that the old, larger steam jenny that had been in use had become worn out by mid-summer of 1980. However, with periodic servicing when necessary, the machine remained operational until August 25, when the new machine was installed. As the problems with it became cumulative, it was decided that it would be advantageous to get a replacement.

Bailey, citing the Respondent's financial difficulties, denied a discriminatory purpose in not fixing the jenny. He explained the delay in soap concentrate purchases between shipments of May 20 and July 31 by relating that additional soap had not been needed in that interval as the Respondent earlier had doubled its purchases, having received four barrels in March, two barrels on March 6 and 31, respectively. Because of the surplus of soap concentrate on hand, additional purchases before July 31 were not necessary.

From the record herein, it does not appear that the delay in fixing or replacing the steam jenny was in reprisal for the union activities and sympathies of its employees, but, rather, was caused by the Respondent's poor financial condition. The jenny apparently was beyond routine repair, earlier servicing had not proved effective, and the replacement cost on August 25 was in excess of $1000. Rebutting the General Counsel's contention that the failure to buy new soap concentrate was to further an attempt at unlawful retaliation, the Respondent had ordered new soap for the machine in July at a time when Jackson and Jones were complaining to Jacklet about the condition of the machine. It also appears from invoices submitted that, consistent with Bailey's testimony, additional soap had been purchased in March and May. Soap concentrate was uniformly received in two barrel shipments. Only one such shipment per month was received in January, February, and April, while there were two shipments received in both March and May. Bailey's testimony that the hiatus in purchases between May and July was based on a surplus is not rebutted and, as noted, the receipt of a shipment sent July 31 is inconsistent with the General Counsel's theory. Even assuming that Bailey had made the impatient remark concerning the steam jenny attributed to him by Jacklet, the weight of the evidence does not show that the steam jenny was allowed to continue in disuse for a purpose of harassing employees for having selected the Union. Accordingly, I do not find that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) in this regard.

Summarizing, it has been found that the Respondent has refused to bargain in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by:

(a) Refusing to pursue scheduled contract negotiations with the Union because of the pendency of unresolved

[82] Valley City Furniture Co., 110 NLRB 1589, 1594–1595 (1954).

[83] From the evidence presented it is reasonable to presume continuation of the number of work hours previously available until the August 11 strike as Sales' difficulties were caused by default of Coastal's mounting obligations rather than by a reduction in the volume of Sales' business.

[84] The steam jenny is a machine which jets a mixture of steam, hot water, and soap. It is used to clean truck, engines, parts, and all types of metal.

[85] The respective shipping dates for these purchases were May 20 and July 31, respectively.

unfair labor practice charges filed by the Union against the Respondent in Case 11–CA–9301, subsequently withdrawn.

(b) Refusing to bargain meaningfully with the Union during earlier contract negotiations concerning unilaterally imposed policy changes affecting vacation eligibility, the need for phsyicians' excuses as affecting eligibility for sick leave benefits and/or holiday pay, the duty to call in when absent, and on the terms under which coffee is provided to employees during the workday.

(c) Unilaterally making the following changes in its employees' terms and conditions of employment without prior notice to and bargaining with the Union:

1. As applied to Curtis Jones, requiring for the first time that employees present physicians' receipts in order to receive sick leave benefits and/or holiday pay, when the employee's absence for illness occurred on the day before and/or after the holiday.[86]

2. Increasing the amount of continuous service employees must have to become eligible for paid vacations.

3. Installing a vending machine dispensing coffee at a greater cost to employees than the previously available free or lesser priced coffee.

4. Modifying the attendance policy to provide for the discharge of employees who are absent for 5 working days without notifying the Respondent.

5. Laying off employees Curtis Jones, Henry Shields Jr., Clinton Jackson, and Joe Williford on July 24–25 when work was slack, rather than continuing the former policy on such occasions of having them perform clean-up and maintenance work.

(d) Failing to timely notify the Union of its intention to sell the assets of Sales and to bargain concerning the effects of the sale on employees.

The Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by:

(a) Reducing the number of hours worked weekly by its employees from 42.5 to 40 because of the employess' union activities and sympathies.

(b) Refusing to reinstate Andrew Blalock and delaying reinstatement of the following other unfair labor practice strikers after September 2, 1980, although an unconditional offer to return to work had been made on their behalf:

James Beach	Wayne Lewis
Troy Bullard	Robert Liertz
Ernest Hollifield	Troy Lindsey
Curtis Jones	Henry Shields Jr.

The Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by Bailey's statements to employees during the June 24 negotiating session to the effect that it was unlikely that the Union would get a collective-bargaining agreement and his initial refusal, for that reason, to name company grievance-processing representatives.

[86] As found here, the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act both by implementing the unilateral changes in working conditions found herein, and, again, by refusing to bargain in good faith with the Union when these matters were raised during later contract negotiations.

IV. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES UPON COMMERCE

The activities of the Respondent set forth in section III, above, occurring in connection with the Respondent's operations described in section I, above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow thereof.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Central Mack Sales, Inc. and its alter egos, Central Truck Leasing Corporation, North Carolina Coastal Motor Lines, Inc., and D. Thomas Bailey Sr., constitute a single employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. International Union of Operating Engineers, Local 465, AFL–CIO, affiliated with International Union of Operating Engineers, AFL–CIO is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. The following unit is appropriate for purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act:

> All parts department employees, mechanics, body and paint shop employees, cleanup steam room employees at the Respondent's Raleigh, North Carolina facility, excluding all office clerical employees, professional employees, salesmen, guards and supervisors, as defined in the Act.

4. About March 31, 1980, and at all times material thereafter, the Union herein represented a majority of the employees in the above-described appropriate unit, and has been the exclusive representative of all these employees for purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

5. The strike which commenced on August 11, 1980, was an unfair labor practice strike from its inception.

6. The Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by:

(a) Refusing to pursue contract negotiations with the Union because of the pendency of unfair labor practice charges filed by the Union against the Respondent.

(b) Refusing to bargain in good faith with the Union during contract negotiations with respect to unilaterally imposed policy changes affecting terms and conditions of employment of bargaining unit employees, although duly requested by the Union.

(c) Unilaterally making the following changes in the terms and conditions of employment of its employees without prior notice to and bargaining with the Union:

1. Requiring that employees present physicians' receipts in order to receive sick leave benefits and/or holiday pay, when the employees' absences occurred on the day before and/or after the holiday.

2. Increasing the amount of continuous service employees must have to become eligible for paid vacations.

3. Installing vending machines dispensing coffee at greater cost to employees.

4. Modifying the attendance policy to provide for the discharge of employees who have been absent for 5 workdays without notifying the Respondent.

5. Laying off employees Curtis Jones, Henry Shields Jr., Clinton Jackson, and Joe Williford when work was slow, rather than assign them to maintaince and cleanup work as had been the practice.

(d) Failing to timely notify the Union of its intention to sell the assets of Sales and to bargain concerning the effects on employees of that sale.

7. Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by:

(a) Reducing the number of weekly work hours for employees because of their union activities and sympathies.

(b) Refusing to reinstate unfair labor practice striker Andrew Blalock and delaying the reinstatement of the other unfair labor practice strikers named below although unconditional offers to return to work had been made on their behalf:

James Beach	Wayne Lewis
Troy Bullard	Robert Liertz
Ernest Hollifield	Troy Lindsey
Curtis Jones	Henry Shields Jr.

8. The Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by statements made to employees during contract negotiations that it was unlikely that the Union would get a collective-bargaining agreement and by initially refusing, for that reason, to name company grievance-processing representatives.

9. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

10. The Respondent did not violate the Act by any conduct not found herein to constitute an unfair labor practice.

THE REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that it be required to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Having found that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act, inter alia, by unlawfully refusing to recall Andrew Blalock and by delaying the recall of the unfair labor practice strikers after September 2, 1980,[87] I recommend that the Respondent be ordered to make whole Blalock and those other unfair labor practice strikers affected by the failure to receive prompt reinstatement for any loss of earnings the employees may have suffered as a result of the Respondent's unlawful actions. Backpay shall be computed with interest as prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co.,[88] and Florida Steel Corp.[89]

Having found that the Respondent has further violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by reducing the length of the workweek from 42.5 to 40 hours during the second quarter of 1980, continuing into the third quarter of that year until the strike that began on August 11, in agreement with the General Counsel, I recommend that overtime pay at time and a half should be computed on behalf of affected employees for the above-indicated period at a projected 4.59 percent of the total net hours compensated, less overtime previously paid. This projected 4.59 percentage is based on the average of the 4.87 and 4.3 overtime percentages paid during the two quarters immediately preceding the unlawful change in the workweek. Overtime pay, with interest, shall be computed in accordance with the formula set forth above.

Because the Respondent failed to afford the Union an adequate opportunity to bargain about the effects of the sale of Sales' assets on bargaining unit employees in violation of Section 8(a)(5) an (1) of the Act, I shall recommend that the Respondent be ordered to bargain with the Union concerning the effects of this sale on all bargaining unit employees. However, as in Climate Control Corp.,[90] and Merryweather Optical Co.,[91] a bargaining order alone is an inadequate remedy because, now that the Respondent has sold part of its business without notice, the employees' bargaining power has been materially compromised. In order to create an atmosphere in which meaningful bargaining can be assured, some measure of economic strength must be restored to the Union.

Accordingly, the Respondent should be required to pay its bargaining unit employees amounts at the rates of their normal wages when last in the Respondent's employ from 5 days after the date of this decision until occurrence of the earliest of the following events: (1) the date the Respondent bargains to agreement with the Union on those subjects pertaining to the effects of the closing on bargaining unit employees; (2) a bona fide impasse on bargaining; (3) the failure of the Union to request bargaining within 5 days of this decision, or to commence negotiations within 5 days of the Respondent's notice of its desire to bargain with the Union; or (4) the subsequent failure of the Union to bargain in good faith. In no event shall the sum paid to any of these em-

[87] The backpay period for all unfair labor practice strikers began on September 2 and, as found above, continued to the dates shown next to their respective names:

Henry Shields Jr.	Nov. 17, 1980
James Beach	Sept. 9, 1980
Troy Bullard	Nov. 11, 1980
Ernest Hollified	Oct. 2, 1980
Curtis Jones	Oct. 2, 1980
Wayne Lewis	Sept. 9, 1980
Robert Liertz	Oct. 7, 1980
Troy Lindsey	Sept. 11, 1980
Andrew Blalock	Jan. 8, 1981

As, in agreement with the General Counsel, I find that Blalock's backpay period ended when Sales' employees were laid off following the sale of that Company's assets, no reinstatement order would be appropriate as to the remaining alter ego Respondents. However, Blalock's recoupment and those of other employees may be enhanced by the remedy afforded below concerning the Respondent's failure to bargain with the Union concerning the effects on employees of the sale of Sales' assets.

ployees exceed the amount the employees would have earned as wages from January 8, 1981, the date on which the Respondent sold Sales' assets, to the time such employees secured employment elsewhere, or the date on which the Respondent shall have made a bona fide offer to bargain, whichever occurred sooner, provided, however, that in no event shall the sum be less than these employees would have earned for a 2-week period at the rates of their normal wages when last in the Respondent's employ. Such earnings shall be computed based on a 42.5-hour workweek with interest in accordance with the formula set forth above.

Having found that the Respondent further violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by laying off employees Curtis Jones, Henry Shields Jr., Clinton Jackson, and Joe Williford from July 24, 1980, at 5 p.m. until the morning of July 28, 1980, without notice to and bargaining with the Union, as part of the remedy herein, the Respondent should be required to make those employees whole for any loss of pay suffered by reason of the Respondent's unlawful conduct. Backpay with interest shall be computed in accordance with the formula set forth above.[93]

I also shall recommend that a broad cease-and-desist order be entered.[94]

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[95]

ORDER

The Respondents, Central Mack Sales, Inc., Central Truck Leasing Corporation, North Carolina Coastal Motor Lines, Inc., and D. Thomas Bailey, Sr., Raleigh, North Carolina, their officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Failing and refusing to bargain with International Union of Operating Engineers, Local 465, AFL–CIO, affiliated with International Union of Operating Engineers, AFL–CIO with respect to the effects of the sale of the assests of Central Mack Sales, Inc. on its employees in the following unit:

> All parts department employees, mechanics, body and paint shop employees, cleanup steam room employees at the Respondents' Raleigh, North Carolina facility, excluding all office clerical employees, professional employees, salesmen, guards and supervisors, as defined in the Act.

(b) Refusing to bargain or pursue contract negotiations with the above-named Union because of the pendency of unfair labor practice charges filed against the Respondent by the Union.

(c) Refusing, on request, to bargain in good faith with the Union with respect to unilaterally imposed policy changes affecting terms and conditions of employment of employees in the above-described bargaining unit.

(d) Unilaterally making the following changes in the terms and conditions of employment of its unit employees without prior notice to and bargaining with the Union:

(1) Requiring that employees present physicians' receipts in order to receive sick-leave benefits and/or holiday pay, when the employees' absences occurred on the day before and/or after the holiday.

(2) Increasing the amount of continuous service employee must have to become eligible for paid vacations.

(3) Installing a vending machine dispensing coffee at a greater cost to employees.

(4) Modifying the attendance policy to provide for the discharge of employees who are absent for 5 working days without calling in to the Respondent.

(5) Laying off employees without notice to and bargaining with the Union.

(e) Reducing the number of hours worked weekly by its employees in retaliation for their union activities and sympathies.

(f) Delaying reinstatement and/or refusing to reinstate unfair labor practice strikers where an unconditional offer to return to work has been made on their behalf.

(g) Creating an impression of the futility of the bargaining process by informing employees during contract negotiations, or at other times, that it is unlikely that the Union will succeed in obtaining a collective-bargaining agreement.

(h) In any other manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) On request, bargain with the above-named Union with respect to the effects on its employees of the sale of the assets of Central Mack Sales, Inc., and reduce to writing any agreement reached.

(b) Make whole its employees by paying those employees who were laid off on or after January 8, 1981, when the Respondent sold the assets of Central Mack Sales, Inc. normal wages, plus interest, for a period specified by the National Labor Relations Board, in the manner set forth in the section of this decision entitled "The Remedy."

(c) Make whole Andrew Blalock and the individuals named below for any loss of earnings they may have suffered by reason of the Respondents' discrimination against them and/or because of its refusals to bargain with the above-named Union with respect to the layoffs which commenced on July 24, 1980, and other unlawfully imposed unilateral changes in the terms and conditions

[93] It also is appropriate that employees adversely affected by other unilateral changes found herein also be made whole as indicated. For example, Curtis Jones should be compensated for Easter Monday, April 7, 1980, holiday pay denied him because of the change in the policy requiring physicians' receipts.

[94] As the unfair labor practices committed by the Respondent are serious, numerous, and include unlawful discharge, layoffs, and refusal to grant proper reinstatement, I shall recommend that it cease and desist therefrom and refrain in any other manner from interfering with the rights of employees guaranteed in Sec. 7 of the Act. Climate Control Corp., supra; Magnesium Casting Co., 250 NLRB 692 fn. 3, 713 (1980); Cf. Hickmott Foods, 242 NLRB 1357 (1979).

[95] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

of its employees' employment, in the manner set forth hereinabove in the section of this decision entitled "The Remedy":

James Beach	Wayne Lewis
Troy Bullard	Robert Liertz
Ernest Hollifield	Troy Lindsey
Curtis Jones	Henry Shields Jr.
Clinton Jackson	Joe Williford

(d) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(e) Post at its Raleigh, North Carolina location, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[95] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 11, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shallbe posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material. Also, immediately upon receipt and signing by the Respondent's authorized representative, copies of the attached notice will be mailed by the Respondent by certified mail, return receipt requested, to all former employees employed within the above bargaining unit since March 1, 1980, at their last known address.

(f) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS ORDERED that the consolidated complaint herein be dismissed insofar as it alleges violations of the Act not specifically found herein.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT fail and refuse to bargain with International Union of Operating Engineers, Local 465, AFL–CIO, affiliated with International Union of Operating Engineers, AFL–CIO with respect to the effects of the sale of the assets of Central Mack Sales, Inc., on our employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All parts department employees, mechanics, body and paint shop employees, cleanup steam room employees at our Raleigh, North Carolina facility, excluding all office clerical employees, professional employees, salesmen, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

WE WILL NOT refuse to pursue contract negotiations with the above-named Union because it has filed unfair labor practice charges against us with the National Labor Relations Board.

WE WILL NOT refuse to pursue contract negotiations or otherwise bargain with the above-named Union with respect to our unilaterally imposed policy changes affecting terms and conditions of your employment.

WE WILL NOT unilaterally make the following changes or other modifications in the terms and conditions of your employment without prior notice to and bargaining with the Union:

> Require that you present physicians' receipts in order to receive sick leave benefits and/or holiday pay, when you are absent from work on the day before and and/or after the holiday.
> Increase the amount of continuous service you must have to become eligible for paid vacations.
>
> Install a vending machine selling coffee at greater cost to you than before.
> Modify the attendance policy to provide for the discharge of employees who are absent for 5 workdays without calling the plant.
> Lay you off when work is slack, or for other reasons, without notice to and bargaining with the Union.

WE WILL NOT reduce the number of hours worked weekly by you in retaliation for your union activities and sympathies.

WE WILL NOT delay reinstatement and/or refuse to promptly reinstate unfair labor practice strikers where an unconditional offer to return to work has been made on their behalf.

WE WILL NOT impress you with the futility of bargaining by telling you during contract negotiations, or otherwise, that it is unlikely that the Union will suceed in obtaining a collective-bargaining agreement.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL make whole our employees who were laid off on or after January 8, 1981, when we sold the assets of Central Mack Sales, Inc., by paying them normal wages, plus interest, for a period specified by the National Labor Relations Board.

WE WILL, on request, bargain with the above-named Union with respect to the effects on our employees of the sale of the assets of Central Mack Sales, Inc., and reduce to writing any agreement reached.

WE WILL make whole Andrew Blalock and the other individuals named below, with interest, for any loss of earnings they may have suffered by reason of our discrimination against them or because of our refusal to bargain with the above-named Union with respect to the layoffs which commenced on July 24, 1980, and other unlawfully imposed unilateral changes in the terms and conditions of employment:

Wilburn S. Bruce, d/b/a Landing Construction Company and Plumbers Local Union No. 68, a/w United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices of the Plumbing and Pipe Fitting Industry of the United States and Canada, AFL-CIO, Petitioner. Case 23-RC-5175

DECISION AND CERTIFICATION OF REPRESENTATIVE

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND HUNTER

The National Labor Relations Board, by a three-member panel, has considered determinative challenges in an election held 15 December 1983 and the hearing officer's report recommending disposition of them. The election was conducted pursuant to a Stipulated Election Agreement. The tally of ballots shows two for and one against the Petitioner, with two challenged ballots.

The Board has reviewed the record in light of the exceptions and brief, has adopted the hearing officer's findings and recommendation, and finds that a certification of representative should be issued.

The Employer provides construction and maintenance services necessary for the operation of a time-sharing resort. It has a plumbing crew which consists of two licensed plumbers and a plumbers' helper, who work together as a crew the vast majority of the time, performing essentially the same type of work. The crew spends approximately 50 percent of its time doing construction plumbing work in addition to maintenance plumbing work such as repairing garbage disposals, water heaters, and toilets. None of the crew performs any electrical or landscaping work.

In addition to the plumbing crew, the Employer has a general maintenance employee, Drab, and a landscaping and maintenance employee, Escobedo. Drab's responsibilities include the repair of broken door locks, loose carpeting, malfunctioning light switches, broken furniture and kitchen appliances, and replacing missing light bulbs. Although Drab spends 65 to 70 percent of his time performing maintenance repair plumbing such as fixing leaky faucets, he is not a licensed plumber and does not perform any new construction plumbing work. On two occasions Drab was consulted on the routing of new construction plumbing, but only for the purpose of anticipating future maintenance needs. Unlike the plumbing crew, Drab drives his own truck on the job, in which he carries his tools. The plumbing crew has its own toolshed. Moreover, Drab, unlike the plumbing crew, is salaried, is on 24-hour call, carries a beeper, and receives his orders directly from the guest check-in office or from the Employer's president or vice president, rather than from Plumbing Supervisor Dunn.

Employee Escobedo's primary responsibility is to care for the grounds. He is assigned to the landscaping/groundskeeping crew, and acts as an interpreter for the landscaping supervisor Dahlkemper, from whom he receives his instructions. Escobedo spends at least 50 percent of his time mowing, weeding, mulching, fertilizing, and planting, and performs general maintenance work including plumbing repairs similar to those performed by Drab. Escobedo stores his tools in a landscaping lockup shed separate from the plumbing crew's toolshed and, unlike the plumbing crew, Escobedo is a salaried employee.

Based on the foregoing, and contrary to our colleague, we agree with the hearing officer's conclusion that Drab and Escobedo are dual-function employees who do not share a sufficient community of interest with the plumbing crew employees to be included in the bargaining unit. Berea Publishing Co., 140 NLRB 516 (1963); Ocala Star Banner, 97 NLRB 384 (1951); NLRB v. Kane/Miller Corp., 474 F.2d 407, 409-410 (5th Cir. 1973). Although Drab and Escobedo perform plumbing repair work in addition to their other duties, they are salaried, work under different supervisors with different work crews, and in Drab's case, at different hours. Moreover, they do not regularly perform the same type of plumbing work as that performed by the plumbing crew for sufficient periods of time to warrant inclusion in the unit. The record reveals that the plumbing duties performed by Drab and Escobedo are limited to routine repairs such as fixing leaky faucets. Neither performs significant amounts of new construction plumbing work, which comprises 50 percent of the work of the plumbing crew.

We shall therefore sustain the challenges to the ballots of employees Arnold Drab and Robert Escobedo, and issue a certification of representative.

CERTIFICATION OF REPRESENTATIVE

IT IS CERTIFIED that a majority of the valid ballots have been cast for Plumbers Local Union No. 68, a/w United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices of the Plumbing and Pipe Fitting Industry of the United States and Canada, AFL-CIO, and that it is the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the following appropriate unit:

> INCLUDED: All plumbers and plumbers helpers employed by the Employer.

EXCLUDED: All other employees, guards, watchmen and supervisors as defined in the Act.

MEMBER HUNTER, dissenting.

Contrary to my colleagues, I would reverse the hearing officer and overrule the challenges to the ballots of employees Drab and Escobedo. In my view, Drab and Escobedo are "dual-function" employees who share a sufficient community of interest with unit employees to be included in the unit. See Berea Publishing Co., 140 NLRB 516 (1963).

The unit, as described in the stipulated election agreement, includes: "All plumbers and plumbers helpers employed by the Employer." The hearing officer found that the Employer has a "plumbing crew"[1] whose employees are hourly paid and perform "mostly plumbing work," including new construction plumbing work. The hearing officer further found that Drab, who was employed as a general maintenance man, spent 65–70 percent of his time performing plumbing repairs; and that Escobedo, who was assigned to the landscaping crew, spent 25 percent of his time performing plumbing repairs. However, because he found that Drab and Escobedo did not regularly perform the same type of plumbing work as that performed by the "plumbing crew," the hearing officer found that they did not have a substantial community of interest in the crew's wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment. In this regard, the hearing officer also relied on the fact that Drab and Escobedo were salaried and that they worked under different supervisors from the "plumbing crew." My colleagues essentially have adopted the hearing officer's findings in full.

In my view, it is specious to distinguish between Drab and Escobedo on the one hand, and the "plumbing crew" on the other hand, based on the type of plumbing work they performed and, once that distinction is eliminated, any remaining distinctions are insufficient to exclude Drab and Escobedo from the unit. The record indicates that Drab and Escobedo regularly and routinely have performed plumbing work—i.e., Drab over half of the time and Escobedo about one-quarter of the time.[2] Although they may not have performed exactly the same work as that performed by the "plumbing crew," there is no dispute that the work was related. Moreover, even assuming that the Employer has a "plumbing crew"—a matter which is not free from doubt—the unit description is not resricted to any such crew; rather, the unit specifically includes "plumbers" and "plumbers helpers." Under the circumstances herein, it would be purely a matter of semantics to hold that Drab and Escobedo were not "plumbers" while they were performing plumbing work.

Accordingly, based on their regularly and routine performance of plumbing work, Drab and Escobedo have a substantial community of interest with the Employer's plumbers and plumbers' helpers which requires their inclusion in the unit. I therefore would open and count their ballots before issuing the appropriate certification.

[1] The Employer excepted to this, among other, factual findings of the hearing officer.

[2] In Berea Publishing Co., above, the Board held that a dual-function employee who devotes less than 51 percent of his time to unit work may have sufficient interest in the unit's conditions of employment to be included in the unit. The test is whether the dual-function employee regularly devotes "sufficient periods of time to the unit work" to demonstrate that he has a "substantial community of interest in the unit's wages, hours, and conditions of employment." 140 NLRB at 519.

14 December 1984

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND DENNIS

On 16 May 1984 Administrative Law Judge Donald R. Holley issued the attached decision. The General Counsel and the Respondent filed exceptions and supporting briefs, and the Respondent filed an answering brief to the General Counsel's exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions as modified.

The judge found that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by requesting an employee to keep it informed about other employees' union activities; maintaining and enforcing an overly broad no-distribution rule; coercively interrogating employees about union support or activities; threatening employees with plant closure or reduction of the work force if they selected the Union to represent them; soliciting and promising to resolve employee grievances if employees would abandon support of the Union; altering an employee's work assignments for supporting the Union; and threatening to discharge an employee for engaging in union solicitation. We affirm these findings.[2]

The judge also recommended the dismissal of allegations that the Respondent created an impression of surveillance of employees' union activities in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act; issued an oral warning on 5 May 1983[3] and a written warning on 20 May to employee David Evans in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1); and discharged Evans on 24 May, also violating Section 8(a)(3) and (1). The General Counsel excepted only to the judge's failure to find the latter three violations. We find merit in the General Counsel's exceptions.

Evans was employed as a dispatcher at the Respondent's munitions production facility in Camden, Arkansas. His responsibility was to see that the production line received the proper hardware and materials needed to build MLRS (Multiple Launch Rocket System) launchers. This involved keeping an inventory on the SPLL (Self Propelled Loader Launcher) line storage bins, filling out requisition request forms for the warehouse, and delivering the parts to the appropriate bins on the SPLL line. It is undisputed that Evans performed his work well before early March and had been complimented for oustanding work at least once.

In early March, Evans contacted union representative R. T. Buttram to discuss unionization of the Respondent's facility. Evans met with Buttram on 8 or 9 March, and the Union thereafter conducted an organizational campaign among the plant's production employees. Evans served as chairman of the in-plant organizing committee, distributed union literature and authorization cards, and discussed unionization with employees, and wore union insignia at work. It is undisputed the Respondent became aware of the union campaign and of Evans' participation almost immediately.

On 11 March Production Supervisor Sonny Blair approached Evans and told him he had heard there was an organizational effort and that some employees had met with a union representative. Blair told Evans that, based on their past close personal friendship, he thought he could count on Evans for any information he might need about the campaign.[4] The judge found Blair's statement violated Section 8(a)(1).

On 15 March General Manager Harry LeCost met with Evans' immediate supervisor Donald Dahlke and Dahlke's superior Charles Simpson, and told them that Evans had been passing out information and harassing people during working hours.[5] LeCost told the supervisors to explain to Evans what he could and could not do during working hours. Dahlke and Simpson met with Evans. Dahlke informed Evans that it had come to

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[2] The Respondent excepted only to the judge's findings concerning its asking an employee to become an informer, its maintenance and enforcement of the no-distribution rule, and its threat to discharge an employee. In upholding the judge's finding as to the no-distribution rule, we do not rely on his citation to Intermedics, Inc., 262 NLRB 1407 (1982), but instead on our recent decision in Our Way, Inc., 268 NLRB 394 (1983), and on Stoddard-Quirk Mfg. Co., 138 NLRB 615 (1962). Nor, in finding the violation, do we rely on his statement, in sec. III,B,2, par. 6, of his decision, that the Respondent's cancellation of the rule on 27 September 1983 constituted an acknowledgement it was unlawful.

[3] All dates are in 1983 unless otherwise stated.

[4] Evans responded by telling Blair that if there was anything he thought Blair needed to know he would be sure to tell him.

[5] The meeting represents the first time the general manager had been involved in employee discipline.

his attention that Evans was handing out handbills and harassing employees during working hours, and he would be terminated if he did not stop. Dahlke told Evans that what Evans did on breaks, lunch, and before and after work was his personal time, but work was to be performed on worktime. Evans denied harassing employees and distributing materials during worktime. The judge observed the Respondent's no-distribution rule was unlawful because it required prior company approval of material to be passed out,[6] and that the Respondent did not have a no-solicitation rule and discriminatorily permitted working time solicitation for churches, football pools, gifts, and antiunion activities. He concluded Dahlke's threat to Evans violated Section 8(a)(1) as it "imparted" the message he would be fired if he solicited for the Union on company time.

On 17 March, while Evans was distributing handbills in the Respondent's parking lot, Superintendent Jim Coffin approached him and told him he could not hand out literature on company property. After Coffin departed, security personnel arrived and told Evans to stop his activity and leave company property. The judge found the maintenance and enforcement of the overly broad no-distribution rule, described above, violated Section 8(a)(1).

On 5 May Supervisor Dahlke gave Evans an oral warning regarding his work performance. Dahlke told Evans his production was slipping, as the storage bins Evans had been servicing were not fully stocked. Dahlke also stated that he had been told Evans was not doing his job. Evans admitted his bins were not filled, but explained that he had insufficient time to prepare all the necessary requisitions because he had to assume the job responsibilities of an employee who had recently been transferred from the department;[7] that the Respondent had recently instituted a time-consuming policy requiring Evans to obtain a production supervisor's signature on all requisitions to the warehouse;[8] that requisitions left for signature on Supervisor Dahlke's desk often piled up without being signed; and that there was a delay of up to 2 weeks in acquiring parts from the warehouse.[9] Evans also explained that employees on the SPLL line, where the depleted bins were located, worked overtime, yet he was not permitted to do so during the period of his alleged decline in productivity though he had previously been allowed overtime.[10] The record also shows that, shortly after Evans' 24 May discharge, Brad Byars, a SPLL line employee, apparently assumed some of Evans' job responsibilities, and three new employees were hired on the SPLL line to perform Evans' "other duties."[11]

Dahlke testified he issued the oral warning after the Respondent's production schedule slipped twice due to parts shortages. Dahlke claimed that he received repeated complaints from Superintendent Gilton and Floor Supervisor Blair concerning Evans' excessive talking and hardware parts shortages on the SPLL line. According to Dahlke, the supervisors felt that the production decline occurred because of Evans' excessive talking in March and April. Dahlke stated, after receiving the complaints, he observed Evans performing his job and noticed he spent a lot of time talking to other employees.

On 18 May employee Leland Patterson approached Evans and informed him Jerry McClendon, a new white employee, had shown up at the Respondent's facility in dress rather than work clothes.[12] Patterson told Evans he thought McClendon would soon be placed into a head supervisory position over Gary Wright, a black employee who had recently been promoted to the top supervisory position in the department. Evans communicated the rumor to at least three black production employees,[13] and suggested they might want

[6] The distribution rule in effect on 15 March 1983 prohibited: "Reproducing, posting, or passing out typed or printed material other than Company business without the permission of the Director of Professional Services." The rule provided for disciplinary action up to and including discharge.

[7] The employee, Jewel Jones, was a dispatcher whose primary responsibility was to complete requisitions for shortage items on the SPLL line. The record indicates that her transfer occurred in March at approximately the same time the slump in production on the SPLL line allegedly began.

There was disputed testimony as to whether Evans assumed all employee Jones' job duties as dispatcher. It is clear, however, Evans took over all of Jones' requisition writing duties for the SPLL line, which was about half her work.

[8] Before April 1983, Evans had been allowed to deliver the requisitions directly to the warehouse without prior supervisory approval. There was conflicting testimony regarding whether the signature of a production supervisor or that of any supervisor was sufficient to fulfill the requirement.

[9] The Respondent argues, if Evans had effectively carried out his responsibility to prioritize the requisitions on Dahlke's desk, the shortage items on the SPLL line would have been obtained from the warehouse more quickly. There is no dispute Evans failed properly to prioritize.

[10] Evans was allowed to work overtime prior to March, but was not scheduled for overtime after 1 March. Employees on the SPLL line worked various durations of overtime during the period from March to 5 May. Dahlke refused Evans' request to work overtime to deal with the SPLL line shortages. Dahlke testified that putting Evans on overtime would have been futile because the warehouse did not work overtime during the period in question.

[11] Though Byars' testimony that the Respondent hired three new SPLL line employees to handle Evans' "other duties" is undisputed, he stated he did not know whether the employees handled only Evans' former duties.

[12] Evans is also white.

[13] Evans admitted relaying the rumor to Alexia Page and Nelson Holliman. The credited testimony indicates that Evans also related the rumor to Martha Hopson. Hopson testified Evans also repeated the rumor to employee Dewey Ross.

to raise the McClendon promotion issue at the next meeting the Company had with its black employees.[14]

Hopson testified Evans told her, if black employees did not help them get the Union, they would never get anywhere with the Company. Hopson stated the employees became angry and frustrated, and employee Ross became so upset he refused a supervisor's request to work overtime that day. The same day, according to Blair, Holliman and Hopson informed him of the McClendon rumor and asked if it was true.[15] After checking with higher management, Blair told the black employees the rumor was not true. The record shows the rumor was common knowledge, and that rumors circulated around the plant frequently.

On 20 May Dahlke and Blair met with Evans in the office of Human Resources Manager Phillip O'Connor. Dahlke gave Evans a written warning for allegedly intimidating and harassing employees on the production line.[16] Dahlke read the warning to Evans and asked him to sign it. Evans replied the warning was "bullshit," and denied harassing anyone. He refused to sign the warning, stating he was not guilty. Dahlke then told Evans signing did not admit guilt, and that Evans had to sign the warning because it was going into his personnel file. Evans again refused to sign, saying, if the warning went into his file, it would be without his signature.

Evans requested and received a copy of the warning. Dahlke then read the warning to Evans again and asked him to sign it. Evans repeated the warning was "bullshit" and once more refused. According to Blair's evidently credited testimony, Evans stated, if the warning got into his file without his signature, "Dahlke, I'll have your ass." Dahlke repeated that he was only telling Evans what the employees had complained about. Evans leaned across the table, pointed his finger at Dahlke's face, and stated, "Dahlke, I'm telling you to get fucked . . . Dahlke, you're just trumping up these charges because I won't kiss your ass and do somebody else's job." Dahlke responded, "David, it has nothing to do with you kissing anybody's ass." The conversation ended with Dahlke asking Evans to sign the warning once more, and Evans refusing.

Dahlke testified he recommended Evans be discharged for allegedly insubordinate and threatening conduct, and that O'Connor and LeCost agreed. On 24 May Evans received a notice of termination for directing "abusive, derogatory, and threatening comments, to your supervisor."[17]

The Respondent's progressive disciplinary system normally involves an oral warning, a written warning, a final warning, and, finally, suspension or discharge. Supervisor Dahlke testified, however, the regular disciplinary system is not followed in situations such as that of Evans. The record shows that the Respondent had fired five employees in the past without first issuing a warning. Four were discharged for fighting, and one for insubordination in refusing to work when his request for 2 days off was denied by his supervisor.

The undisputed testimony established that profanity was used routinely by employees and supervisors at the facility, and that no employees had been disciplined for such conduct.[18] On two occasions while wearing an "I'm for Vought" button, employee Crawford told Supervisor Manning he was "dumb, stupid, idiotic and was walking around with his head up his ass," and was not disciplined in any way. Evans is the only employee ever discharged by the Respondent for allegedly using abusive language or threatening a supervisor.

Conclusions

Contrary to the judge, we find the Respondent's 5 and 20 May warnings to Evans, as well as the Respondent's 24 May discharge of Evans, violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

The 5 May Oral Warning

The judge found the 5 May oral warning for not keeping storage bins filled was not unlawful because "[t]he record clearly reveals that the Re-

[14] It is undisputed that the Respondent had been meeting with black employees on a periodic basis to discuss work-related problems concerning job promotions and racial discrimination at the Respondent's facility.

[15] Holliman testified he asked Blair if the rumor was true, but made no mention of being bothered or harassed by Evans. Only Hopson specifically complained Evans bothered her. Blair acknowledged no other employees complained to him about the rumor.

[16] The "Details of Violation" section of the warning stated:

> On May 18, 1983, employee was discussing business other than work on company time, thereby keeping employees, on the assembly line, from completing their assigned tasks. The Production employees have complained to the Production Supervisor that they are being harassed.

The "Consequences" section stated, "If the above infractions continue, the said employee will be terminated."

[17] The "Details of Violation" section of the notice read:

> Company Rule V, 4—During a counseling session with you on Friday 20 May 1983, conducted by your supervisor, M. Dahlke and witness S. Blair (production supervisor), you displayed an attitude of total disrespect to your supervisor. During this discussion you directed abusive, derogatory, threatening comments to your supervisor.

The "Consequences" section of the notice stated:

> This gross act of insubordination, by use of verbal threats and abusive language directed at your supervisor, is a most serious offense and will not be tolerated by this Company. Therefore, you are being discharged from the Company for your gross acts of misconduct and violation of Company Rules.

[18] Dahlke admitted employees at the facility "use curse words" and that Evans and other employees had previously "cursed" at him and not received a warning. Dahlke also admitted he never warned any employee about the type of profanity he called "shop talk."

spondent was experiencing shortages of line storage hardware items at or about the time Evans was warned," and because "Evans, who admittedly did engage in union-related discussions with other employees during working time, had ceased by 5 May to perform his dispatcher functions with as much enthusiasm as he had shown before he became involved in the union organizational campaign."

In reversing the judge, we are guided by the principles set forth in Wright Line.[19] Under Wright Line, the General Counsel has the initial burden of making a prima facie case that protected conduct was a "motivating factor" in the employer's discipline of the employee. Once the General Counsel has made such a showing, the burden shifts to the employer to establish it would have taken the same action absent such conduct.

We examine initially the first prong of the Wright Line test. The Respondent became aware of the union organizational campaign and of Evans' active participation, which included acting as chairman of the in-plant organizing committee, distributing union literature and cards, discussing the Union with coworkers, and wearing union insignia at work shortly after the campaign began. As previously related, the judge found, and we agree, the Respondent committed three unfair labor practices against Evans individually: attempting to recruit him as a company informer, enforcing an unlawful no-distribution rule against him, and threatening him with discharge 15 March for lawful solicitation activities. Such conduct exhibits substantial union animus, as do additional uncontested findings of unlawful activity directed against other employees, including coercively interrogating employees, threatening them with plant closure or reduction of the work force if they unionized, soliciting and promising to resolve grievances, and altering an employee's work assignments for supporting the Union.

Given the evidence of animus, the timing of the warning coincident with Evans' union activity and only 7 weeks after an illegal threat to discharge him on account of it, as well as Evans' previous unblemished work record (including at least one commendation for outstanding performance), we find the General Counsel has established a strong prima facie case that the 5 May warning was motivated by Evans' union activity.

We next consider whether the Respondent has met its burden of showing it would have warned Evans on 5 May notwithstanding his union activity. The Respondent presented substantial testimonial evidence that supervisors had complained about parts shortages on the SPLL line and Dahlke noted two successive instances of shortages before issuing the warning to Evans. While we accept the judge's finding that the SPLL line shortages occurred about the time that Evans was warned, we reject the conclusion the Respondent believed Evans was responsible. The judge failed to give proper weight to undisputed evidence that other factors caused the falloff in production.

As previously detailed, Evans' job duties included maintaining an inventory on the SPLL line storage bins, completing requisition forms for needed line storage hardware, obtaining the required hardware from the plant warehouse, and delivering the parts to the proper bins on the SPLL line. During the entire period of the production decline, however, Evans also performed the work of a recently transferred dispatcher who had filled out requisitions for the SPLL line, assuming close to 50 percent of the dispatcher's total responsibilities. Beginning in April, the Respondent initiated a time-consuming policy requiring Evans to obtain a supervisor's signature on every requisition he made out, and it is undisputed requisitions accumulated on Dahlke's desk awaiting approval.[20] It is also not contested Evans experienced delays of up to 2 weeks in receiving the requested parts.

At the same time the Respondent increased Evans' job responsibilities, it refused to allow him to work overtime to catch up, though it had frequently permitted him overtime before March 1. By contrast, employees on the SPLL line worked substantial overtime during the period from March to May, thus aggravating the shortage situation. Finally, there was evidence that, in addition to the employee who took over Evans' position, three new employees were hired to work on the SPLL line, shortly after Evans' termination, to perform Evans' "other duties," suggesting, if not demonstrating conclusively, the shortages stemmed, and were known to have been, from insufficient manpower.

Accordingly, we find the Respondent failed to meet its burden of rebutting the General Counsel's prima facie case, and conclude the Respondent's oral warning to Evans violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

[19] 251 NLRB 1083 (1981), enfd. 662 F.2d 899 (1st Cir. 1981), cert. denied 455 U.S. 989 (1982), approved in NLRB v. Transportation Management Corp., 462 U.S. 393 (1983).

[20] Although Evans did not contradict the Respondent's assertion that he failed properly to prioritize the requisition requests submitted to Dahlke, the Respondent failed to establish that the omission contributed significantly to the production decline. Indeed, the Respondent gave no reason for altering its policy to require supervisory approval of the requests, nor did it present any reason they could not have been signed expeditiously—especially since Evans had routinely been entrusted with the responsibility previously.

The 20 May Warning

On 20 May Evans received a written warning for allegedly intimidating and harassing employees on the production line. Two days before, Evans related a rumor to three or four black employees that a white employee might be promoted over a black and suggested they take the issue up at the next meeting the blacks had with management. In concluding the issuance of the warning was not unlawful, the judge stated that "by his actions on May 18 Evans disrupted the work of at least four (4) production employees, and it is clear that the situation was brought to Supervisor Blair and Superintendent Gilton's attention." The General Counsel contends that Evans engaged in protected concerted activity on 18 May, and that Evans did not disrupt production, and thus that the warning violated the Act.

In determining whether the 18 May warning was lawful, we must decide (1) whether Evans' communications with black employees constituted protected concerted activity and (2) if so, whether his comments so interfered with production as to lose their protected status.[21]

The Board recently stated it would find an employee's activity concerted only where it was engaged in with or on behalf of other employees, and not "solely by and on behalf of the employee himself."[22] The Board further stated, "Once the activity is found to be concerted, an 8(a)(1) violation will be found if, in addition, the employer knew of the concerted nature of the employee's activity, the concerted activity was protected by the Act, and the adverse employment action at issue (e.g., discharge) was motivated by the employee's protected concerted activity."[23]

In Mushroom Transportation Co. v. NLRB,[24] the Third Circuit stated:

> It is not questioned that a conversation may constitute a concerted activity although it involves only a speaker and a listener, but to qualify as such, it must appear at the very least it was engaged in with the object of initiating or inducing or preparing for group action or that it had some relation to group action in the interest of the employees.[25]

Concerted efforts by employees to alleviate racially discriminatory employment conditions have long been held protected activity,[26] so long as they do not interfere with another important labor law principle such as the rule of exclusive representation.[27]

We find employee Evans was engaged in protected concerted activity in communicating the McClendon rumor to black employees on 18 May. His remarks related to group action concerning possible racial discrimination by the Respondent, as Evans specifically urged the employees to bring the issue to management's attention. The content of the remarks was protected since it concerned the topic of a racial discrimination, which had aroused the attention and concern of employees in the production department, and which was the subject of periodic meetings between management and employees aimed at resolving the problem.[28]

We do not agree with the judge that Evans' remarks disrupted the production of four employees and thus lost the protection of the Act. Only two employees confronted management regarding the rumor they had heard, and only Hopson testified to telling Blair she was being bothered by Evans.[29] The other employee, Holliman, merely asked Blair if the rumor was true and then returned to work. There is no record evidence clearly indicating Holliman and Hopson were on working time when they approached Blair, and certainly none showing that what would have been at most a brief absence from their duties disrupted or interfered with production. In any case, Evans' remarks would not reasonably tend to incite employees or otherwise impede production, particularly since he advised the black employees to raise the issue with management in a future scheduled meeting concerning racial discrimination.

We conclude, therefore, as follows: (1) Evans' remarks to the black employees constituted protected concerted activity; (2) the comments did not, nor did they have the reasonable tendency to, disrupt production; (3) the Respondent was aware of the remarks; and (4) the Respondent issued a written warning to Evans on 20 May because of his protected statements.[30] Accordingly, contrary to the judge, we find the Respondent's 20 May warning to Evans violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

We also observe that the rumor passed on by Evans was common knowledge among employees, that rumors were often circulated in the plant, and that Evans did not instigate the rumor, but merely passed it on.

[29] Hopson's testimony that employee Ross became so upset by the rumor that he refused to work overtime is of questionable validity and relevance. Neither Ross nor representatives of management testified he refused to work overtime on 18 May or, if he did, why he did. Assuming he did refuse, there is no evidence management knew why he refused, or that Evans was responsible for the refusal.

The 24 May Discharge

The judge found that Evans was discharged for insubordination, having allegedly used abusive language and threatened Dahlke during the 20 May meeting in which Evans received a written warning, notwithstanding undisputed evidence of two instances in which employee Crawford used profanity and was not disciplined. Both instances involved Crawford telling Supervisor Manning that he was "dumb, stupid, idiotic, and walked around with his head up his ass." The judge stated: "In comparing the Crawford-Manning situation to the situation under discussion, the General Counsel is clearly engaging in an apples and oranges comparison, as it is clear that Crawford did not threaten Manning while making his demeaning remarks." He concluded that the General Counsel failed to sustain the Wright Line burden of establishing that Evans' participation in union activities was a "motivating reason" for the discharge. Contrary to the judge, we find the General Counsel's prima facie case is overwhelming. We have previously detailed Evans' union activity and the five unfair labor practices committed against him, including the 15 March discharge threat, the 5 May oral warning, and the 20 May written warning that included a threat to discharge. Indeed, Evans received the illegal 20 May warning during the very meeting at which he is alleged to have been insubordinate.

We further find the Respondent has failed to show Evans' conduct would have resulted in discharge had he not engaged in union and protected concerted activity.

In discharging Evans, the Respondent admittedly departed from its established progressive disciplinary system involving an oral warning, a written warning, a final warning, and, finally, suspension or discharge. Five other employees had previously been fired without first receiving an oral or written warning: four for fighting and one for insubordination in refusing to work after denial of a request for 2 days off. The undisputed testimony reveals that profanity by employees and supervisors at the plant was common. Dahlke admitted employees at the facility "use curse words" and that Evans had previously "cursed" when talking to him. In addition, Dahlke admitted he had never warned Evans or any other employee about the type of profanity described as "shop talk." No one at the Respondent's facility had ever been discharged for using abusive language. Nor are we able to agree with the judge that employee Crawford's abusive, profane conduct toward Supervisor Manning was less objectionable than Evans' response to Dahlke. We do not interpret Evans' statement, "Dahlke, I'll have your ass," as a threat to do any more than file a grievance or Board charge or to report Dahlke to higher management. We conclude that Evans did not engage in insubordinate conduct on 20 May, and his discharge therefore violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.[31]

In light of our finding of three additional unfair labor practices, and to correct certain inadvertent errors, we shall issue new conclusions of law, an amended remedy, and a new Order and notice to employees.

Conclusions of Law

1. By requesting an employee to keep it informed about other employees' union activities; maintaining and enforcing an overly broad no-distribution rule; coercively interrogating employees about union support or activities; threatening employees with plant closure or reduction in the work force if they selected the Union to represent them; soliciting and promising to resolve employee grievances if employees would abandon support of the Union; altering an employee's work assignments for supporting the Union; and threatening to discharge an employee for engaging in union solicitation, the Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Sections 8(a)(1) and 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. By issuing an oral warning on 5 May and a written warning on 20 May to employee David Evans, and by discharging Evans on 24 May, the Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

Amended Remedy

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, we shall order it to cease and desist and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

[31] Even if Evans' statements were insubordinate, it would not alter our conclusion about the illegality of his discharge. The Board has long held an employer cannot provoke an employee by its unlawful conduct to a point where he commits an act of insubordination and then rely on the act to discipline the employee. NLRB v. M & B Headwear Co., 349 F.2d 170, 174 (4th Cir. 1965); Max Factor & Co., 239 NLRB 804, 817 (1978), enfd. 640 F.2d 197 (9th Cir. 1980). TRW-United Greenfield Division, 260 NLRB 73, 82 (1982).

Evans' statements to Dahlke were made immediately after receiving an unlawful warning for allegedly interfering with production and harassing other employees. Evans was justifiably outraged and accused Dahlke of trumping up the charges. The Respondent's unlawful conduct clearly provoked Evans' emotional response, and we refuse to allow the Respondent to take advantage of its illegal action by raising the defense of insubordination.

We shall, inter alia, order the Respondent to offer David Evans immediate and full reinstatement to his former job or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed, and to make him whole for any loss of earnings he may have suffered as a result of the discrimination practiced against him. Backpay shall be computed as prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), plus interest as computed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977). See generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962). We shall order the Respondent to remove from its files any reference to the unlawful warnings issued to Evans on 5 and 20 May 1983, as well as to his discharge, and to notify him in writing that this has been done and that the warnings and discharge will not be used against him in any way.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Vought Corporation–MLRS Systems Division, Camden, Arkansas, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Requesting employees to keep it informed about other employees' union activities.

(b) Maintaining and enforcing a no-distribution rule prohibiting reproducing, posting, or passing out typed or printed material other than company business without company permission.

(c) Coercively interrogating employees about union support or activities.

(d) Threatening employees with plant closure or reduction in the work force if they select the Union to represent them.

(e) Soliciting and promising to resolve employee grievances if employees would abandon support of the Union.

(f) Altering an employee's work assignments for supporting the Union.

(g) Threatening to discharge an employee for engaging in union solicitation.

(h) Discharging, issuing oral or written warnings to, or otherwise discriminating against any employee for engaging in union or protected concerted activity.

(i) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer David Evans immediate and full reinstatement to his former job or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed, and make him whole for any loss of earnings or other benefits resulting from his discharge, in the manner set forth in the remedy section of this decision.

(b) Remove from its files any reference to the unlawful warnings and discharge and notify the employee in writing that this has been done and that the warnings and discharge will not be used against him in any way.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at its Camden, Arkansas facility copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[32] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 26, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

CHAIRMAN DOTSON, dissenting in part.

Unlike my colleagues, I would adopt the judge's dismissal of charges regarding Evans' second warning notice and discharge. I agree with the judge that Evans' spreading rumors and interrupting the work of others during non-breaktime is not privileged against legitimate discipline. And, while my colleagues interpret Evans' threatening remarks to Dahlke to refer to filing a grievance or a Board charge, I see no warrant for such speculation concerning Evans' personally abusive comments. Protected activity does not become a mantle of immunity from discipline for abusive conduct which would not be tolerated in the normal course of events. Accordingly, I would affirm the judge's conclusions regarding Evans' insubordination and threats.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT request you to keep us informed about other employees' union activities.

WE WILL NOT maintain and enforce a no-distribution rule prohibiting reproducing, posting, or passing out typed or printed material other than Company business without Company permission.

WE WILL NOT coercively question you about your union support or activities.

WE WILL NOT threaten you with plant closure or reduction in the work force if you select the Union to represent you.

WE WILL NOT solicit and promise to resolve your grievances if you will abandon your support for the Union.

WE WILL NOT alter your work assignments for supporting the Union.

WE WILL NOT threaten to discharge you for engaging in union solicitation.

WE WILL NOT discharge, issue oral or written warnings to, or otherwise discriminate against you for engaging in union or protected activity.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL offer David Evans immediate and full reinstatement to his former job or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed, and WE WILL make him whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits resulting from his discharge, less any net interim earnings, plus interest.

WE WILL notify him that we have removed from our files any reference to his discharge and that the discharge will not be used against him in any way.

VOUGHT CORPORATION–MLRS SYSTEMS DIVISION

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

DONALD R. HOLLEY, Administrative Law Judge. On an original charge filed by International Union, United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America (UAW) (the Union) on June 3, 1983,[1] the Regional Director for Region 26 of the National Labor Relations Board (the Board) issued a complaint on July 20 which alleged, inter alia, that Vought Corporation–MLRS Systems Division (Respondent) had engaged in conduct which violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act). By answer, which was timely filed, Respondent denies it has engaged in the unfair labor practices described in the complaint.

The case was heard in Camden, Arkansas, on October 13 and 14, 1982. All parties appeared and were afforded full opportunity to participate. At the commencement of the hearing, the General Counsel was permitted to amend the complaint to correct the spelling of Respondent's name, and to allege that Respondent had engaged in additional violations of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act during the months of September and October through the conduct of its supervisors and/or agents Phillip O'Connor and James Rudolph; and by issuing a warning to employee David Evans on March 15, 1983. Subsequent to the close of the hearing, the General Counsel and Respondent filed briefs which have been carefully considered.

On the entire record, and from my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses when they appeared to give testimony, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent maintains an office and place of business in Camden, Arkansas, where it is engaged in the manufacture of nonguided missile launchers. It is admitted that in the course and conduct of such business, it annually purchases goods and materials in an amount exceeding $50,000 from suppliers located outside the State of Arkansas, and it annually sells and ships to customers located outside said State products and goods valued in excess of $50,000. It is admitted, and I find, that Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. STATUS OF LABOR ORGANIZATION

It is admitted, and I find, that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

Respondent employs approximately 450 employees at its Camden, Arkansas facility, which consists of three production buildings, an administration building, and a remote ammunition storage site called the LC–12 area. Most of its employees work in its metal parts building where it manufactures its principal product, a rocket or missile launcher, which is a track vehicle.

[1] All dates herein are 1983 unless otherwise indicated.

It is undisputed that at all times material the employees at the Camden facility were supervised and directed by, inter alia: Harry LeCost, general manager; Phillip O'Connor, human resources manager; Charles Simpson, operations control manager; Donald Dahlke, production control supervisor; James Coffin, superintendent; Leland Gilton, superintendent; Tommy Thompson, production manager; and Sonny Blair, supervisor.[2]

David Evans, the alleged discriminatee in this case, was hired by Respondent as a general assembler, labor grade 2, at $4.80 per hour on June 14, 1982, and remained in Respondent's employ until he was discharged on May 24, 1983. Respondent utilizes an assembly line in its main production area, the metal parts building. The line is referred to in the transcript as the spill line. Actually the correct name of the line is the SPLL (Self Propelled Loader Launcher) line. While assigned to work on the SPLL line, Evans was accorded what he considered to be special treatment as he was sent in November 1982 to White Sands, New Mexico, with Supervisor Tom Alston to repair a vehicle damaged in testing. On his return, he was informed that the supervisor in charge of testing, and Billy Smith, senior vice president of Respondent, felt he had done an outstanding job as well as representing the Company on a personal basis while at White Sands.

Within 5 months of his date of hire, Evans was promoted from labor grade 2 to the position of dispatcher, a labor grade 16 position which paid $6.01 per hour. His duties as a dispatcher were to inventory the line storage bins on the SPLL line, to fill out requisitions for needed line storage hardware, and to obtain the line storage hardware from the warehouse and place it in appropriate bins. It is undisputed that Evans performed credibly as a dispatcher until March 1983.

At some point near the first of March, Evans submitted a bid for a supervisory position. On March 6 or 7, Donald Armstrong, a black employee, was selected to fill the supervisory position. Sonny Blair, a supervisor in the metal parts buildings, then a friend of Evans, testified Evans told him that not getting the job was bad enough, but to be beat out by a "nigger" was another thing. Bradley Byars, an employee, testified Evans made a similar comment to him when Armstrong got the job.[3]

Immediately after he learned that Armstrong had been selected for the supervisory position he had sought, Evans contacted the Union and was put in contact with R. T. Buttram, an International representative. Shortly thereafter, on March 8 or 9, Evans met with Buttram and, acting together, they initiated a unionization campaign at Respondent's facility.

From the time he met with Buttram forward, Evans, who acted as the chairman of the organization committee at the plant, openly sought to cause employees to join the Union by distributing union literature in the parking lots, by distributing union authorization cards among the employees, by discussing unionization with the employees, and by wearing at work items which had the UAW insignia on them.

Shortly after the union campaign began, a segment of Respondent's employees organized an "I'm for Vought" campaign and such employees held several meetings, sold I'm for Vought buttons or badges to employees, and distributed petitions in the plant which were signed by employees who desired to join the I'm for Vought committee and/or to meet with Respondent management.

During the period extending from early March through mid-October the General Counsel has alleged and contends that Respondent violated the Act in numerous respects. The allegations and the evidence offered to prove them are discussed below.

B. The Alleged 8(a)(1) Violations

1. Paragraphs 7(a) and (b) of the complaint allege that about March 11, Respondent, acting through Sonny Blair, created an impression that its employees' union activities were under surveillance by Respondent and asked an employee to ascertain and divulge to Respondent the union membership, activities, sympathies, and desires of other employees. The General Counsel sought to prove the allegations through the testimony of Evans.

Evans testified that after he contacted the Union on March 6 or 7, he and unnamed employees met with International Union Representative Buttram on March 8 or 9. He claims that on March 11 Sonny Blair approached him while he was in the engineering area of the metal parts building, indicating he would like to talk to him. Evans claims they sat down on a rocket box and that Blair, after indicating he had heard an organization attempt was underway and some employees had met with a union representative, commented that he knew that, based on their past close, personal friendship, he could count on him for any information he might need concerning the matter. Evans claims he replied if there was anything he thought he needed to know he would be sure to tell him. Blair denied the conversation ever occurred.

Noting that the record reveals Blair and Evans were close friends when the union campaign began, and that it also reveals that Respondent officials learned of the unionization attempt immediately after it was instituted, I credit Evans rather than Blair. In my view, the testimony in question does not justify a finding that Respondent, through Blair, sought to create an impression that it was engaging in surveillance of its employees' union activities. Instead, the violation committed was that it, through Blair, violated Section 8(a)(1) by requesting that Evans become a company informer.

[2] It is admitted, and I find, that at all times material each of the named individuals were supervisors and agents of Respondent within the meaning of Sec. 2(11) and (13) of the Act. In addition, it is admitted, and I find, that security officers Donnie Pipkin and Glenda Burns were, at all times material, agents of Respondent within the meaning of Sec. 2(13) of the Act.

[3] Evans denied making such a comment to either individual and contended, instead, that he had no hard feelings because Armstrong had two college degrees and was better qualified while he was just a high school graduate. I was not impressed with Evans' denial and I credit Blair and Byars.

2. Paragraph 8(a) of the complaint alleges that Respondent has maintained an unlawful no-distribution rule since December 3, 1982, and paragraph 8(b) of the complaint alleges that such rule was unlawfully enforced on March 17, 1983.

The record reveals Respondent distributes its company rules to new employees at their time of hire, requiring them to sign an acknowledgment that they have received a copy of such rules. Employees violating the rules are subject to disciplinary action up to and including discharge. Rule V,6, prohibits:

> Reproducing, posting, or passing out typed or printed material other than Company business without the permission of the Director of Professional Services.

The record reveals the above-described rule was promulgated on a date prior to December 3, 1982. Human Resources Manager O'Connor testified without contradiction that the rule under discussion was canceled on September 27, 1983, and that notice of such action was posted on all company bulletin boards and Respondent's supervisors were instructed to tell their employees the rule had been canceled.

The record reveals that Evans commenced to assist Union Representative Buttram distribute union literature in the facilities' parking lots at the metal parts building and building M-3 shortly after employees met with Buttram on March 8 or 9. Evans testified that he went to the parking lot of building M-3 at approximately 6:30 p.m. on March 17 to distribute union literature. When Superintendent Jim Coffin arrived at the lot, Evans offered him a piece of literature, telling him he would appreciate his support in the organizational drive. After commenting that he bet Evans would appreciate his support, Coffin told the employee he could not distribute literature on company property. Evans replied he could under Federal law. According to Evans, security officer Donnie Pipkin approached him several minutes after Coffin left and told him he would have to leave company property. After Evans told Pipkin he had the right to distribute under Federal law, Pipkin indicated he was unaware of it and would have to check with his supervisor. Shortly after Pipkin left, Evans indicated that security officer Burns and three other guards arrived at the parking lot in two cars. Evans claims Burns then told him he would have to stop doing what he was doing and leave company property. He indicated he then told Burns he had the right under Federal law to distribute literature in the parking lot and claims Burns said she did not know the law and would contact Mr. Cary, her supervisor. According to Evans, one of the guards, whose last name is Steward, commented in Burns' presence that he wished she would turn him loose on Evans as he would kick his "ass" and get him out of there.

Coffin did not dispute Evans' version of the event when called as a witness, and Pipkins and Stewart were not called to testify. Burns claimed during her testimony that two rather than three guards accompanied her to the parking lot on the occasion under discussion. She denied she told Evans he could not pass out literature and had to leave, and claimed, instead, that she merely asked the employee what his name was and who he worked for. According to Burns, Evans replied by stating he was within his rights and, if she continued to harass him, he could sue her and her boss. She claimed she was later told by her boss that Evans was within his rights and she was to return to headquarters. Burns denied she was aware at the time that a company rule prohibited distribution of literature on company property. Finally, she indicated, she thought the incident occurred on March 16 rather than March 17.

Evans was the more impressive witness, and I credit his version of what occurred when Burns was present rather than the version she gave.

By canceling the no-distribution rule set forth above on September 27, 1983, Respondent, in effect, acknowledged the rule was unlawful. As no evidence was offered by Respondent to show any business justification for the rule, I find it was unlawfully broad. Accordingly, I find that by maintaining and enforcing the rule under discussion, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act as alleged. Stoddard-Quirk Mfg. Co., 138 NLRB 615 (1962); Essex International, 211 NLRB 749 (1974); and Intermedics, 262 NLRB 1407, 1408 (1982).

3. Paragraph 9 of the complaint alleges that on June 9, 1983, Respondent, through the acts of Jim Coffin, unlawfully interrogated an employee, threatened plant closure and loss of jobs if the employees selected the Union as their bargaining representative, and unlawfully solicited complaints and grievances and promised employees increased benefits and improved terms and conditions of employment.

James Crawford, a machine operator, testified that during the months of March and April he was on the employees for Vought committee and wore an I'm for Vought button. By June 9, his sentiments had changed and he had traded the I'm for Vought button for a UAW badge. Crawford claims that on June 9, as he was leaving the bathroom, Coffin asked him what he was doing wearing the UAW badge. When he replied he had a right to wear the badge, he claims Coffin told him he had been talking to the president of Vought in Dallas and the latter had said if the Union came in they were going to say, "Fuck the investment" and they would move the plant to Dallas. Crawford claims he then told Coffin, "Mr. Coffin, you just broke federal law." According to Crawford, Coffin then stated, "Well, we'll cut the work force back to one third," and Crawford replied, "Again, you have broken the Federal law. It is against the law for you to threaten to move the plant because of union organization." At that point, Crawford claims Coffin stated: "Well, they can't move M-3, but we can cut the work force back here." At some point in the conversation, Crawford claims Coffin asked him what he was dissatisfied about, and Crawford indicated he was dissatisfied with an evaluation prepared by his supervisor, Jimmy Don Manning. According to Crawford, when he indicated he had discussed the evaluation with Manning's superior, Superintendent Leland Gilton, Coffin told him, "Well, let me get you a meeting with Mr. Thompson. I'll have a meeting set up with him.

You're too valuable an employee to be wearing that union badge."

While Coffin denied he had any conversation with Crawford concerning the Union, he admitted he learned Crawford had a grievance and that he informed the employee he would help him resolve it. He testified that after telling Crawford he would assist him, he spoke with Leland Gilton and Thompson concerning the matter and informed them Crawford used to be a good worker, but had fallen on his "ass." When O'Connor appeared as a witness during Respondent's presentation of its case, he testified that on October 10 Respondent posted a notice placed in the record as Respondent's Exhibit 3 to dispel a rumor circulated by Crawford regarding a statement allegedly made by Coffin. The text of the notice is as follows:

> FACT: VOUGHT CORPORATION-MLRS DIVISION HAS NO INTENTION TO CLOSE ITS DEDICATED MLRS FACILITY IN CAMDEN, ARKANSAS. AS YOU KNOW, COMPETITIVELY BID GOVERNMENT CONTRACT AWARDS ARE BASED ON MANY FACTORS: WAGES PAID, MATERIAL AND EQUIPMENT COSTS, QUALITY AND RELIABILITY OF THE PRODUCT AND MEETING DELIVERY SCHEDULES.
> WE AS A UNITED TEAM WORKING TOGETHER CAN MAKE THIS HAPPEN!

At the time of the hearing, Crawford was still employed by Respondent. He was a very positive witness and there is no doubt in my mind that he testified truthfully. I credit his account of his June 9 conversation with Coffin, and I find that Respondent, through Coffin's June 9 actions, unlawfully interrogated Crawford by asking him what he was doing wearing a UAW button, unlawfully threatened plant closure and/or reduction of the work force if employees selected the Union as their bargaining representative, and unlawfully solicited Crawford's grievances and/or complaints, promising to attempt to resolve them to cause him to abandon his support of the Union. Such conduct violates Section 8(a)(1) as alleged.

4. At the commencement of the hearing, the General Counsel amended the complaint to allege that on Septmeber 21, 1983, Phillip O'Connor interrogated an employee regarding his union membership and activities and granted a benefit to such employee to encourage his withdrawal of union membership.

Employee Crawford testified that after he told Coffin he was dissatisfied with the evaluation written by his foreman, Manning, O'Connor asked him on September 8 why he had not been to his office to see him. According to Crawford, O'Connor then suggested he come to his office on Monday, September 12, at 2 p.m. Crawford testified that when he went to O'Connor's office on Monday, September 12, O'Connor told him he disagreed with the employee evaluation and would set up a meeting for Monday, September 19, with Production Manager Tommy Thompson, Superintendent Leland Gilton, Supervisor Jimmy Don Manning, the employee, and himself. Crawford indicated no meeting was held on September 19, but that on September 21 O'Connor told him, "Why don't you come to my office at 2 p.m. and we'll just tear the damned thing up." According to Crawford, when he went to O'Connor's office that afternoon, O'Connor sent a secretary for his records and, while she was gone, O'Connor showed him an LM-2 report, which contained the salaries of International Union representatives, indicating he wanted him to look at it to see what his money would be going for if the Union came in. O'Connor then showed him that Archie Buttram received $55,000 per year. Crawford testified O'Connor then said, "I would like to know what happened to you . . . you used to think so positive . . . you used to be against unions when you came out here. It seems like you're thinking negative now." Crawford claims he responded, "No sir, I feel like I'm thinking positive now." When the secretary returned with Crawford's records, he claims O'Connor took out the February and June evaluations, indicated he disagreed with both of them, and tore them up. Crawford indicated that during the meeting he was wearing a UAW cap, a UAW button, a penholder with UAW insignia, and a UAW belt buckle. He testified that as he was leaving O'Connor's office, the latter stated, "[Y]ou're wearing a damned UAW belt buckle too."

O'Connor's account of the Crawford evaluation matter was markedly different from the version given by the employee. O'Connor indicated that, at some point, Billy Smith, Respondent's senior vice president, visited the plant, and Crawford sought him out as he entered the men's room in the metal parts building to tell him he had received a bad evaluation from his supervisor and his machine, which had been leaking oil, had not been fixed. O'Connor testified Smith told him and Plant Manager Harry LeCost he wanted Crawford's complaints checked out and taken care of, if true. O'Connor claims he was in the plant the next week and, on speaking with Crawford, learned he was no longer operating the machine with the oil leak. He indicated he asked Crawford about the evaluations and was informed the employee was upset because a recent evaluation he had received from Jim Manning was contradictory to one he had previously gotten from Jim Smith. O'Connor claims he told Crawford to go to Leland Gilton, the superintendent, and try to work the problem out. O'Connor testified he heard nothing further from Crawford until he and LeCost were walking through the plant about 3 or 4 weeks before the hearing in this case (October 13 and 14, 1983). On that occasion, O'Connor recalls that LeCost approached Crawford and asked him if his machine still leaked oil. According to O'Connor, after Crawford told LeCost he no longer worked on that machine, the employee informed him Gilton did not fix his evaluations. O'Connor claims he then asked Crawford if he wanted a meeting with him and, when the employee said yes, he told him to come to his office at 2 o'clock and they would talk about it.

O'Connor testified that, at the time in question, he was aware that Crawford had filed an unfair labor practice charge against Jim Coffin, and this caused him to be cautious in his discussion with Crawford. He indicated that, when Crawford came to his office at the appointed time, he informed him he did not want him to construe anything he may do that day to have any effect on how he felt about him or his union activity. He claims Crawford stated he understood that completely, and he continued by stating he could not care less whether Crawford voted union or no union. According to O'Connor, Crawford replied, "I know that."

O'Connor testified he had just received the UAW LM-2 report before meeting with Crawford and agreed that he showed it to Crawford, indicating it contained the salaries of representatives. In response to Crawford's inquiry, he showed him the figure for Buttram's salary. He claims that after looking at the document Crawford commented it looked like they were in the wrong business. O'Connor indicated that when his secretary brought him Crawford's file, he removed the Jim Smith and Manning evaluations, noted there were conflicting statements in them, and indicated to Crawford that he intended to tear them up. He claims Crawford asked if he could look at his personnel file to see if there were any more evaluations in it, and that he tore up the two evaluations and threw them in the wastebasket in the employee's presence.

O'Connor did not recall whether Crawford was wearing a UAW button and hat on the occasion in question. He denied he asked the employee what had happened to him and that he commented he used to be positive. He also denied saying, "You're wearing a damned UAW belt buckle too." and claimed that, instead, he said, "I see the UAW is giving out belt buckles . . . that's a good-looking belt buckle." He claims Crawford responded, "Yes, it is. It's a good one too," and the meeting ended as Crawford wished him a good day and he replied, "I'll see ya."

I credit employee Crawford's claim that O'Connor injected the discussion of his union sentiments into the September 21 discussion, and credit the employee's claim that O'Connor ended the meeting by commenting on his "damn" UAW belt buckle. While O'Connor maintained his composure when called as a witness by the General Counsel, he was visibly hesistant and tentative when describing his September 21 meeting with Crawford. I credit Crawford where his testimony conflicts with that given by O'Connor, and I find that on September 21, 1983, Respondent, acting through O'Connor, interrogated an employee concerning his union sentiments and thereby violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Although O'Connor claimed he tore up the Crawford evaluations because they had not been properly placed in the employee's file but should have been retained by the supervisors who prepared them, the entire series of events, starting with Coffin and ending with destruction of the evaluations, convinces me O'Connor destroyed the documents in an attempt to cause Crawford to switch his allegiance back to Respondent. By engaging in such action I find, as alleged, that Respondent solicited and resolved an employee's grievance to cause him to abandon his support of the Union and it thereby violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. In addition, it is clear and I find that through O'Connor's action and conduct Respondent interrogated Crawford concerning his union sentiments in violation of Section 8(a)(1).

5. At the commencement of the hearing, the General Counsel amended the complaint to allege that on October 10, 1983, Supervisor James Rudolph placed restrictions on an employee's duties and responsibilities because he had engaged in union activities.

Employee Leland Patterson testified, without contradiction, that on October 11 his immediate supervisor, James Rudolph, told him he had been instructed from higher up that he was not to be dispatched to Atlantic Research Corporation any more. When the employee asked why, Rudolph said, "[I]t is because of union activities or what you wear." At the time, Patterson was wearing a UAW cap, a UAW button, and UAW belt buckle. Patterson asked Rudolph if he would put it in writing, and the latter replied, "No."

When called as a witness by the General Counsel, O'Connor stated Rudolph is the supervisor of the shipping area. He indicated he evaluates employees, can send employees home early, approves absences for sickness for 1 day, gives employees permission to work overtime, and can recommend that employees be discharged. I find that James Rudolph is a supervisor within the meanning of Section 2(11) of the Act. By altering an employee's work assignments because the employee displayed his support of the Union by wearing items containing union insignia, Respondent interfered with, coerced, and restrained the employee in the exercise of his Section 7 rights and thereby violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Virginia Power Co., 260 NLRB 408, 409 (1982).

C. The Alleged Unlawful Warnings Given to Evans on March 15 and May 5

1. The March 15 warning

It is undisputed that on March 15 General Manager LeCost called Evans' immediate supervisor, Dahlke, and Dahlke's boss, Charles Simpson, to his office and told them Evans had been passing out information and harassing people during working hours. The supervisors were told they were to counsel Evans and tell him what he could and could not do during working hours.

At approximately 1 p.m., Dahlke and Simpson met with Evans in the manufacturing conference room, which is presumably located in the metal parts building where Evans works. Evans and Dahlke described the meeting, and the General Counsel placed a written summary of the meeting prepared by Dahlke in evidence as General Counsel's Exhibit 6. It appears that during the meeting Dahlke informed Evans that it had been reported to him that he was passing out information and harassing personnel during working hours and, if such activity did not cease, he would be terminated. Dahlke informed the employee that what he did on breaks, lunch, before and after work was his personal time, but, on worktime, work was to be performed. Evans asked who he had been harassing and Dahlke refused to tell him. Indeed, Dahlke testified he had not been told who Evans had harassed. Evans then denied he had harassed anyone or distributed any material during working time, and informed Dahlke and Simmons he knew the law better than they did and would comply with it. While he had Evans' audience, Dahlke told him he had not been wearing safety glasses in work areas and he had a defective partial sticker on his vehicle and would have to obtain a new sticker at the metal parts building gate. Noting he had not been issued any safety glasses, Evans agreed to obtain a pair, and he indicated he would obtain a new sticker from security.

While Dahlke sought to justify his March 15 actions by claiming that Superintendent Leland Gilton and Supervisor Sonny Blair complained to him frequently in early March that they were experiencing shortages of line hardware items such as nuts, bolts, washers, rivets, and other small items which Evans was to keep in the line storage bins, and they had noticed that Evans was spending an inordinate amount of time talking to employees rather than working, I do not credit that portion of Dahlke's testimony. Dahlke indicated very clearly that he was told by LeCost to tell Evans what the general rules were to be on March 15, and he failed to indicate that LeCost mentioned Gilton, Blair, or shortages when he told him to talk to the employee. The sole subjects mentioned by LeCost were passing out handbills and harassing personnel. It is clear to me, and I find, that LeCost was referring to Evans' union activities, and LeCost's message to Dahlke and Simpson was to tell the employee he could not engage in such activities during working time.

Under Board law, Dahlke's discussion with Evans on March 15 would have been perfectly legal if Respondent had a rule which prohibited all forms of solicitation in its plant during the time employees were supposed to be working. Here, however, the General Counsel established through the testimony of Evans, employee James Crawford, and Dahlke himself, that prior to March 15, 1983, employees had solicited during working time for contributions to churches, football pools, a gift for Superintendent Gilton's wife, moneys for a woman whose house had burned down, and various other things. Moreover, the record reveals that during March 1983 and thereafter, antiunion employees solicited other employees during working time to join the I'm for Vought committee and to attend its meetings, and it permitted them to solicit the signatures of employees who desired to meet with Human Resources Manager O'Connor to discuss their problems. Significantly, the employees who solicited for the I'm for Vought Committee and for the visit(s) to O'Connor's office were admittedly not told they would be fired if they continued to engage in such activity.

In sum, the record in the instant case reveals that Respondent had no rule prohibiting solicitation at its facility on March 15, 1983. While it had a rule prohibiting the distribution of literature which had not been approved by Respondent, that rule was invalid and unlawful for the reasons set forth, supra. In the circumstances described, I find that the real message Dahlke imparted to Evans on March 15 was that he would be fired if he solicited for the Union on company time. As other forms of solicitation were not then punished by discharge, I find that Respondent, through Dahlke's actions on March 15, interfered with, restrained, and coerced Evans in the exercise of his Section 7 rights and thereby violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act as alleged.

2. The May 5 situation

David Evans' immediate supervisor, Dahlke, testified that after Production Superintendent Gilton and Floor Supervisor Blair complained to him repeatedly that they were experiencing line hardware shortages and felt the situation existed because Evans was talking too much rather than filling his bins, he observed Evans while he was performing his job and noted he spent a lot of time talking to other employees. According to Dahlke, after Respondent's production schedule slipped two times because of parts shortages, he gave Evans an oral warning concerning his work performance. Thus Dahlke testified that on May 5, 1983, he approached Evans and informed him he felt his production was slipping as his bins were not fully stocked, and he had been informed he was not doing his job. Admitting his bins were not fully stocked, Evans informed his supervisor that several factors had caused the situation Dahlke was complaining about. He indicated one problem was that he had insufficient time to prepare all the necessary requisitions for needed hardware because he was then performing the job of writing requisitions which had previously been performed by Jewel Jones, a female employee who had recently been transferred to another job; that another problem was a requirement that he seek out and obtain the signature of a production supervisor before he could submit requisitions; another problem was the fact that he had left requisitions on Dahlke's desk for signature and Dahlke let them pile up before he signed them; another problem was that his departments had been working some overtime but he was not given authority to work overtime to enable him to keep the bins in his department fully stocked; and, finally, he claimed that it was taking stores up to 2 weeks to fill some of his requisitions.

While the General Counsel claims that Dahlke gave Evans an oral warning on May 5 for discriminatory reasons, I find he offered insufficient evidence to prove the violation alleged. The record clearly reveals that Respondent was experiencing shortages of line storage hardware items about the time Evans was warned, and my careful review of the record convinces me that Evans, who admittedly did engage in union-related discussions with other employees during working time, had ceased by May 5 to perform his dispatcher functions with as much enthusiasm as he had shown before he became involved in the union organizational campaign. Noting that Dahlke made no mention whatsoever of Evans' union activities or sentiments while warning him on May 5, I find that by issuing the warning Dahlke did not engage in conduct which violates Section 8(a)(1) of the Act as alleged.

D. The May 20 Written Warning and the May 24 Termination

The record reveals that on May 18, 1983, Leland Patterson, Evans' father-in-law, informed Evans that Jerry McClendon, a new white employee, who was coming to work in dress clothes rather than work clothes, was, in his opinion, being groomed for a supervisory position which would place him over Gary Wright, a black employee who had recently been promoted to a supervisory position at LC–12, the ammunition storage area. After hearing the rumor, Evans admittedly relayed it to Alexa Page and Nelson Holliman, two black production employees. According to Evans, he suggested to Holliman and Page that they might want to bring the McClendon matter up at the next meeting the Company had with its black employees.[4]

A Respondent witness, Martha Hopson, indicated during her testimony that Evans' actions on May 18 were not as limited as he claims. She testified that, in addition to discussing the McClendon rumor with Page and Holliman, he also discussed it with her and another black employee named Dewey Ross. Hopson claims that after telling her the Company intended to place a newly hired white man over Gary Wright, Evans told her if the black people did not help them get the Union in there, they would never get anywhere with the Company. According to Hopson, the blacks all became angry and frustrated and Ross became so upset that he refused his supervisor's request that he work overtime that day. Although Evans denied he mentioned the rumor under discussion to Hopson on May 18, Supervisor Blair testified Hopson confronted him with the rumor that day, and Hopson testified she subsequently agreed to give O'Connor a written statement concerning the affair. It is clear to me, and I find, that Evans discussed the McClendon rumor with Hopson on May 18 as she claims.

Supervisor Blair testified that on May 18 Holliman and employee Martha Hopson informed him of the McClendon rumor and asked if he would find out if it was true. To check out the rumor, Blair contacted Superintendent Gilton, informed him of the rumor, and indicated that one of the employees had informed him that, when telling black employees of the rumor, Evans had made a comment like, "[S]ee what Vought is doing to you colored employees." After talking to Blair, Gilton testified he contacted O'Connor at Human Resources and learned the rumor was not true. Gilton then informed Blair the rumor was not true, and Blair told Holliman and Hopson the McClendon rumor was not true—that McClendon was just being trained to take over the job vacated by Gary Wright when he was promoted to his supervisory position.

On May 20, 1983, Dahlke was summoned to O'Connor's office where he was informed Evans had harassed production employees on May 18 and he was to give the employee a written warning that he would be terminated if he continued to engage in such activity. After leaving O'Connor's office, Dahlke prepared the written warning placed in the record as General Counsel's Exhibit 4. The "Details of Violation" section of the warning states:

> On May 18, 1983, employee was discussing business other than work on company time, thereby keeping employees, on the assembly line, from completing their assigned tasks. The Production employees have complained to the Production Supervisor that they are being harassed.

The "Consequences of continued misconduct and follow-up action to be taken" section of the warning states:

> If the above infractions continue, the said employee will be terminated.

After preparing the above-described written warning, Dahlke called Evans to his office and, in the presence of Supervisor Blair, told Evans the meeting was a disciplinary action; that they had complaints that he had been intimidating or harassing people on the floor and they needed to take action to stop this. Dahlke then read the contents of the warning and asked Evans to sign the warning. Evans stated this was a "bunch of shit" and stated he had not been harassing anyone on the floor. Stating he was not guilty, he said he would refuse to sign the warning. According to Evans, Dahlke then told him that by signing he did not admit guilt, but he had to sign it because it was going in his personnel file. Evans again indicated he would not sign the warning and informed Dahlke that, if the warning went in his file, it would go without his signature. In addition, he stated if the document was going in his file he should be given a copy.

When Evans indicated he wanted a copy of the warning, Dahlke handed him the original copy and Evans took it to a secretary outside the office and asked that she copy it for him.

Dahlke and Blair's account of what happened after the secretary returned with a copy of the May 20 warning differs markedly from the account of events described by Evans during his testimony.

Evans claims that, when he returned to the office, Dahlke asked him to sign the warning again and he refused, telling the supervisor it was just a "bunch of shit" trumped up against him because of his union activities. He claims Blair commented at that time that he had some complaints that he had been harassing people and interfering with their work, and that caused him to say:

> What have I been harassing them about? Have I been talking to them about hunting, fishing, fucking, biting? What have I been talking about? Bring somebody up here and let them say to me what I have been harassing them about. And if I am guilty, of harassing or stopping work, then I will sign this > reprimand, but until you can prove to me that I am guilty of doing this, I will not have nothing to do with it.

According to Evans, the meeting ended after he made the above-quoted comments and Dahlke told him as he was leaving that what took place in the room was private and confidential and should stay there.

Blair testified that, after Evans left the room where the meeting was held, he and Dahlke remained so they could document what had been said during the meeting. According to Blair, when Evans returned to the room with a copy of the warning, Dahlke read the warning to the employee again and Evans stated again that it was "bullshit" and he did not do it. Blair testified Dahlke then said, "Hey, I'm just telling you what the people on the floor complained about," and Evans responded by saying he did not do it and if it got in his file without his signature, "Dahlke, I'll have your ass." Blair claims Dahlke again stated he was just telling Evans what they complained about, and that, at that point, Evans leaned across the table, pointed his finger at Dahlke's face, and stated: "Dahlke, I'm telling you to get fucked . . . Dahlke, you're just trumping up these charges because I won't kiss your ass and do somebody else's job." According to Blair, Dahlke responded by saying, "David, it has nothing to do with you kissing anybody's ass." Blair claims the conversation ended with Dahlke asking Evans to sign the warning once more, and with Evans refusing to sign again. At that point, Blair indicated Dahlke thanked Evans and the employee left.

Dahlke testified that Evans' actions during the May 20 meeting made him mad and caused him to recommend that he be discharged because he had been insubordinate and had threatened him. O'Connor and LeCost concurred in the recommendation, and on May 24 Evans was called to the administration building where Jesse McHenry (O'Connor's subordinate), in Dahlke's presence, informed him he was terminated by reading the "Notice of Disciplinary Action" which was placed in the record as General Counsel's Exhibit 5. The "Details of Violation" section of the notice provides:

> Company Rule V, 4.—During a counseling session with you on Friday, 20 May 1983, conducted by your supervisor, M. Dahlke and witness S. Blair (production supervisor), you displayed an attitude of total disrespect to your supervisor. During this discussion, you directed abusive, derogatory, and threatening comments to your supervisor.

The "Consequences" section of the notice states:

> This gross act of insubordination, by use of verbal threats and abusive language directed at your supervisor, is a most serious offense and will not be tolerated by this Company. Therefore, you are being discharged from the company for your gross acts of misconduct and violation of Company Rules.

During his testimony, Dahlke admitted that Respondent's progressive disciplinary system normally involves an oral warning, a written warning, a final warning, and finally suspension or discharge. He claimed the regular system is not followed in situations such as the Evans situation. While Dahlke admitted employees at the facility curse and that Evans had previously cursed when talking to him, he indicated he had never warned Evans or others about the type of cursing he described as shop talk.

Anticipating the possibility that Evans said what Dahlke and Blair claim he said during the May 20 meeting, the General Counsel adduced testimony through Evans, Martha Estes, and James Crawford which reveals that profanity is routinely uttered by employees, and by supervisors as well, while they are working at the facility. In addition, Crawford credibly testified that on two occasions when he was wearing an "I'm for Vought button" and while arguing with his immediate supervisor, Jimmy Don Manning, he told Manning he was dumb, stupid, idiotic, and he was walking around there with his head up his "ass." Crawford indicated Manning did not discipline him in any way because he made such remarks.[5]

Human Resources Manager O'Connor admitted during his testimony that Evans is the only employee it had discharged for using abusive language or threatening a supervisor. With respect to the progressive disciplinary warning system, he indicated Respondent fired employees for fighting, although they were given no oral or written warnings, and it had previously fired one employee for insubordination without giving the individual a warning. The employee fired for insubordination had requested that he be permitted to take 2 days off, and when the supervisor denied the employee's request, he indicated he would take the time off any way.

While the General Counsel claims, in effect, that Respondent was still treating Evans disparately when it issued the May 20 written warning, I am unable to agree. My review of the record convinces me that by his actions on May 18 Evans disrupted the work of at least four production employees, and it is clear that the situation was brought to Supervisor Blair and Superintendent Gilton's attention. In the circumstances, I find that Respondent lawfully reprimanded the employee for his actions.

With respect to the discharge issue, it is clear and I find that, by using abusive language and threatening Dahlke during the May 20 meeting, Evans was guilty of insubordination. Participation in union activity does not insulate an employee from discharge if he is insubordinate, particularly in a situation such as the one presented here where the insubordinate acts did not occur while the employee was participating in protected concerted activity at the time. The General Counsel contends, however, that, as the record reveals that swearing is an everyday occurrence in Respondent's plant, and he has shown through the testimony of Crawford that Supervisor Manning imposed no discipline on Crawford when he used abusive language and informed him he was walking around with his head up his "ass," that I should find Evans was treated in disparate fashion. I find his argument to be without merit. In comparing the Crawford-Manning situation to the situation under discussion, the General Counsel is clearly engaging in an oranges and apples comparison, as it is clear that Crawford did not threaten Manning while making his demeaning remarks. Moreover, I note that Crawford was punished to some extent as the record reveals that his remarks to Manning caused the latter to prepare an evaluation which Crawford did not enjoy.

[5] Manning denied that Crawford made such remarks, indicating he would not be working for him if he had. I do not credit Manning's denial. The record reveals that Manning gave Crawford a bad evaluation after the remarks were made and I note that Manning made no attempt to relate what Crawford did say when complaining about a dull drill bit situation. Crawford was by far the more impressive witness, and I believed him.

In sum, I find the General Counsel has failed to sustain the burden placed on him by Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980), he has failed to establish, prima facie, that Evans' participation in union activities was a "motivating reason" in Respondent's decision to discharge him. I find that David Evans was discharged for cause and recommend that the allegation that he was discharged in violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act be dismissed.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Vought Corporation–MLRS Systems Division, is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By unlawfully interrogating employees concerning their union activities and sentiments, requesting that an employee keep it informed of the union activities of other employees, threatening plant closure and/or reduction of the work force if its employees obtain union representation, soliciting employee grievances and promising to resolve them to cause employees to abandon their support of the Union, destroying adverse employee evaluations to cause employees to abandon their support of the Union, altering work assignments because employees support the Union and/or display its logo on their apparel, threatening to terminate employees for engaging in union solicitation while imposing no punishment on employees engaged in other types of solicitation, and maintaining and enforcing an unlawfully broad no-distribution rule, Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

4. Respondent has not violated the Act except as expressly indicated in this decision.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Walter Brucker & Co., Inc. and Jeffrey Wright.
Case 4–CA–12594

14 December 1984

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS ZIMMERMAN AND DENNIS

On 25 October 1982 Administrative Law Judge Norman Zankel issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed an answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

The judge concluded that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by discharging employee Jeffrey Wright on 9 November 1981[1] because he contacted the Bucks County Housing Authority (Authority) to determine whether the Respondent was paying the proper wage rate for corrective "punch" list work at a housing project.[2] On careful consideration, and for the reasons stated below, we have decided to reverse the judge's decision and to dismiss the complaint.

The pertinent facts, more fully set forth in the judge's decision, are as follows.

The Respondent employed Jeffrey Wright as a carpenter during October and November 1981, and he performed corrective punch list work at the Perkasie housing project. Although he received rated carpenter wages[3] for this work during the payroll week ending on 28 October, he received nonrated carpenter wages for similar work for the payroll week ending on 4 November. Because of this discrepancy, Wright discussed the proper wage rate for the work with his fellow employees, Durrell Hange,[4] Khaliq Culbreath, and Keith Long, at lunchtime on 6 November.

During their discussion, Wright asked Culbreath whether he had received rated carpenter wages for performing corrective punch list work at the project. Culbreath replied that the Respondent had not paid him rated wages for the work either that week or the prior week. Culbreath then asked Hange whether the Respondent was correct in paying nonrated carpenter wages for corrective punch list work. Hange replied that he was not sure and suggested that Culbreath should contact Walter Brucker Jr., the Respondent's vice president, about this matter. Wright then told Culbreath that he had received rated carpenter wages for this work the prior week but only nonrated carpenter wages that week. When Wright asked what he was going to do about it, Culbreath replied that he really did not know. Wright then said: "Well, listen, I've been here a little bit longer. I know the Bruckers a little better. I'll see what I can find out." While not specifically mentioned by the judge, the record establishes that Culbreath did not contact Walter Brucker Jr. personally because, as he testified, "I had spoken to Jeff [Wright] and he . . . said that he would find out about the information."

Later that day, Wright asked Julia Brucker, the Respondent's secretary and treasurer, to explain why he had received rated carpenter wages for performing corrective punch list work at the project on 28 October but nonrated carpenter wages for identical work on 6 November. Julia Brucker replied that corrective punch list work was nonrated, and that the Respondent erred by paying him rated wages for his work on 28 October. Wright then telephoned the Authority to determine the proper wage rate. As a result of Wright's inquiry, the Authority notified the Respondent on 9 November that Wright had contacted the Authority and that the Respondent should submit its payroll records.[5]

After learning of the telephone call, Walter Brucker Jr. went to the project and fired Wright. When Wright asked why he was being fired, Walter Brucker Jr. replied: "I don't need any disloyal soldiers in my camp and I don't need anybody contacting the Bucks County Housing Authority behind my back when you know I'm having troubles with them."

We agree with the judge that Wright's discussion with his fellow employees at lunch on 6 November about the applicable wage rate for performing corrective punch list work at the project was an effort to initiate and promote concerted action.[6] As the

[2] A "punch" list itemizes work that the contractor needs to correct.

[3] A "rated" wage is a rate that an employer must pay employees under the Pennsylvania Prevailing Wage Act.

[4] Although Wright referred to Hange as a foreman, the complaint did not allege, and the Company refused to stipulate, that Hange was a supervisor. The judge, finding that Hange's status was not fully litigated at the hearing, assumed that he was an employee.

[5] It is uncontested that Karl Gabler, the Authority's executive director, asked Gerry Burton, an Authority employee, to request the payroll records because the Respondent had not submitted recent payroll records for the corrective punch list work it was then performing.

judge noted, when Wright spoke to the Respondent and later to the Authority, he voiced a complaint about wages that Culbreath and he both shared. Wright was clearly acting "on the authority of other employees"[7] because the record shows that Culbreath refrained from making his own wage complaint, relying instead on Wright to resolve the matter.[8]

We disagree, however, with the judge's finding that the Respondent knew before discharging Wright that his contact with the Authority was concerted. It is well settled that Section 8(a)(1) of the Act is violated only if at the time of the discharge the employer had knowledge of the concerted nature of the activity for which the employee was discharged.[9] Absent evidence of actual knowledge,[10] the judge inferred knowledge because employees could be expected to group together to protest alleged wage underpayments, and because the Authority's request for all employees' payroll records instead of just those of Wright alone provided a "basis for [the Respondent] to have understood that [the] request . . . involved an investigation of alleged underpayment to a group of employees." Knowledge of concerted activity cannot be inferred whenever an employer takes an action that affects the working conditions of more than one employee or because a governmental agency invokes a legal or contractual right to inspect the payroll records of a firm doing business with it. It is just as likely that the Respondent believed that Wright alone protested its wage policies, especially because Wright referred only to the discrepancy in his personal wages when he confronted Julia Brucker on 6 November. It is also just as likely that the Authority requested the Respondent's payroll records simply because the Respondent had not submitted them for the corrective punch list work at the project. In fact, as we have noted, this was the sole reason for the Authority's request.[11]

Because a preponderance of the evidence fails to establish that the Respondent knew that Wright's contact with the Authority was concerted, we shall dismiss the complaint.[12]

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed.

MEMBER ZIMMERMAN, dissenting.

I dissent from my colleagues' reversal of the judge's finding that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by terminating employee Jeffrey Wright because he contacted the Bucks County Housing Authority to determine whether the Respondent was paying the proper wage rate to its employees on a housing project. For the reasons set forth by the judge in his decision, as well as those set forth in my dissenting opinion in Meyers Industries, 268 NLRB 493 (1984), I find that Wright's inquiry to the Housing Authority constituted protected concerted activity.

Briefly, the record established that the Respondent discharged Wright because he sought information from the Housing Authority concerning the proper wage rate to be paid employees for doing corrective work at the Perkasie housing project. The majority finds, and I agree, that Wright's prior discussions with his colleagues concerning variances in wage rates were an effort to initiate and promote concerted action. The majority also concludes that Meyers Industries is inapplicable except to the extent it sets out the standard for determining concerted activity because here, unlike Meyers, there is actual evidence of concerted activity. Nonetheless, the majority refuses to find Wright's discharge a violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act on grounds that there was insufficient evidence to establish that the Respondent knew of the concerted nature of Wright's contact with the Housing Authority. I disagree.

As noted, it is undisputed that Wright was engaged in concerted activity when he contacted the Housing Authority. It is equally clear, as the judge

[7] Meyers Industries, 268 NLRB 473, 497 (1984).

[8] Although discussing the per se standard of concerted activity established in Alleluia Cushion Co., 221 NLRB 999 (1975), the judge did not rely on Alleluia in concluding that Wright had engaged in concerted activity. Because we overruled Alleluia in Meyers Industries, supra, we rely solely on the objective standard of concerted activity Meyers established, but find Meyers distinguishable because the evidence shows the presence of actual concerted activity.

[9] Meyers Industries, supra, 497; Diagnostic Center Hospital Corp., 228 NLRB 1215, 1216 (1977); New England Fish Co., 212 NLRB 306, 311 (1974).

[10] The judge found no actual knowledge of the concerted activity because Wright never informed the Respondent or the Authority that he was questioning the wages paid to other employees, and because the Authority never told the Respondent that Wright questioned the wages paid to anyone other than himself.

[11] Our dissenting colleague argues that we should infer knowledge because "the Respondent's officers were aware that they were underpaying the employees," and "the Housing Authority, in response to Wright's inquiry, requested all personnel records, not just Wright's." The record evidence demonstrates, however, that the Respondent had a good-faith belief that the Pennsylvania Prevailing Wage Act no longer applied to the corrective "punch" list work because the Respondent continued to perform corrective work on the project voluntarily even though its 1-year maintenance agreement covering its work on the project had expired. While the Pennsylvania Department of Housing and Industry rejected the Respondent's position, it also rejected Wright's contention that the work was rated carpenter's work, finding instead that "the workmen performing work on the outstanding punch lists and any subsequent minor corrective work may be paid at a laborer's rate." The record evidence further establishes that the Housing Authority requested all the payroll records not because of Wright's complaint, but because the Respondent failed to submit any of the required payroll records involving the corrective "punch" list work.

[12] In view of the lack of knowledge, Chairman Dotson finds it unnecessary to pass on the concerted nature of Wright's activity.

found, that the Respondent knew or should have known of the concerted nature of Wright's conduct. Contrary to the majority, the judge properly inferred employer knowledge of Wright's conduct. Thus, the judge noted that the Respondent's officers were aware that they were underpaying the employees and should have known that Wright's questions concerning the pay rate would result in group action, since the payment of proper pay rates is a matter which all employees would support.[1] The judge further relied on the fact that the Housing Authority, in response to Wright's inquiry, requested all personnel records, not just Wright's. Thus, it was reasonable to assume that Wright's protest was not solely for his own benefit but on behalf of all the employees, and as such constituted protected concerted activity.

Assuming, however, that knowledge of Wright's actual concerted conduct cannot be inferred, I would still find his discharge unlawful for the reasons set forth in my dissent in Meyers Industries. There I stated that the individual assertion of an employment-related statutory right is presumptively concerted and is therefore protected by Section 7 of the Act. Here, Wright sought to ensure that the Employer paid the proper wage rates set forth by the Pennsylvania Prevailing Wage Act. The employees' right to the higher "rated" as opposed to "non-rated" wage rate was mandated by this legislation. Thus, because of the nature of the right asserted, i.e., one determined by the legislature to be in the public interest, it is proper to presume that the individual assertion of this right is supported by other employees. Moreover, in light of the actual concerted nature of Wright's conduct, the presumption cannot be rebutted and the Respondent, therefore, cannot carry its burden that Wright's action was opposed by his fellow employees. Accordingly, I conclude that the Respondent's termination of Wright violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act regardless of whether the Respondent knew of the actual concertedness of Wright's conduct.

[1] My colleagues argue that knowledge of Wright's concerted activity cannot be inferred because the Respondent had a good-faith belief that it was paying its employees the proper wage rate and the Housing Authority's request of all of the Respondent's payroll records resulted from the Respondent's failure to submit any records regarding its corrective "punch" list work rather than simply Wright's inquiry. I remain unpersuaded. The Respondent's mistaken belief that it was paying the proper wage rate is of no consequence here where it knowingly reduced employee wage rates and therefore could reasonably have expected some type of employee reaction. Additionally, contrary to the majority, the unalterable fact still remains that the catalyst for the Housing Authority's action was Wright's initial inquiry concerning the proper wage rate.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

NORMAN ZANKEL, Administrative Law Judge. The case was tried before me on September 2, 1982, at Philadelphia, Pennsylvania.

A complaint and notice of hearing was issued by the Regional Director for the Board's Region 4 on January 28, 1982, based on a charge filed by Wright on December 10, 1981.[1]

In substance, the complaint alleges that Wright was terminated on November 9 in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act) because he contacted the Bucks County (PA) Housing Authority (the Authority) to determine whether the Employer was paying the proper wage rate for work performed at a project which the Employer had constructed for the Authority.

The Employer filed a timely answer which admitted certain matters but denied the substantive allegations and that it had committed any unfair labor practices.

All parties appeared at the trial. Each was represented by counsel and was afforded full opportunity to be heard, to introduce and meet material evidence, and to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to present oral argument, and to file briefs. Counsel for the Board's General Counsel and the Employer's counsel submitted posttrial briefs, the contents of which have been carefully considered.

On consideration of the entire record, the briefs and my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor, I make the following

FINDINGS AND CONCLUSIONS

I. JURISDICTION

Jurisdiction is uncontested. The Employer is a Pennsylvania corporation engaged in the business of general construction. Its principal place of business is at New Britain, Pennsylvania.

The Employer admits that during the year immediately preceding issuance of the complaint it performed services valued in excess of $50,000 within Pennsylvania for the Palisades School District (Kitnerville, Pennsylvania), which received goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points outside of Pennsylvania during the same period of time.

Based on the foregoing, and the record as a whole, I find the Employer is, and at all material times has been, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act. Southern Alleghenies Disposal Services, 256 NLRB 852 (1981).

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

The operative facts are substantially undisputed. Thus, the recitation of facts found below is based on the composite of the testimony of all witnesses, unrefuted oral testimony, supporting documents, and careful consideration of the logical consistency and inherent probability of events.

Not every bit of evidence, or every argument of counsel, is discussed. Nonetheless, I have considered all such matters. Omitted material is considered irrelevant or superfluous. To the extent that testimony or other evidence not mentioned might appear to contradict the findings of fact, that evidence has not been overlooked. Instead, it has been rejected as incredible or of little probative worth. Bishop Malco, 159 NLRB 1159, 1161 (1966).

Credibility resolutions, wherever necessary, have been based on my observation of witness demeanor, the weight of the respective evidence, established or admitted facts, inherent probabilities and reasonable inferences which may be drawn from the record as a whole. Northridge Knitting Mills, 223 NLRB 230 (1976); V & W Castings, 231 NLRB 912 (1977); Gold Standard Enterprises, 234 NLRB 618 (1978).

A. Background

On July 6, 1979, the Employer and the Authority contracted for the Employer to perform general construction work on 128 dwelling units known as Miriam Wood Brown Village located at Perkasie, Pennsylvania (Perkasie).

Payment for work performed at the Perkasie site was to be made under the Pennsylvania Prevailing Wage Act. For convenience, such covered work will be hereinafter called "rated." When the Employer performed services on projects not within the purview of either the Pennsylvania Prevailing Wage Act or the Federal Davis-Bacon Act, the wage payments were made at a different sum. Herein, the latter payments will be called "nonrated." At Perkasie, the carpenters' rated wage was $15.43 per hour and the nonrated wage was $10 per hour.

Relevant Employer hierarchy consists of Walter Brucker Sr., president; Walter Brucker Jr., vice president; and Julia Brucker, secretary-treasurer.

Each Friday was the Employer's normal payday. Checks received covered work performed for 1 full week ending at the close of business of each Wednesday immediately preceding the payday on which a paycheck was drawn.

Charging Party Wright began his employment with the Employer during the first week of November 1979. He worked consecutively until his termination, claimed to be unlawful, on November 9, 1981. Wright initially was employed as a laborer. He asked to be sent to carpenter apprentice school. The Employer complied. Concurrently, Wright worked as an apprentice carpenter. He became certified as a carpenter effective June 17. Since that time, Wright worked as a carpenter for the Employer.

Wright worked for the Employer on the original construction, during 1980, at the Perkasie site. He received the rated wage for such work.

B. The Present Dispute

In late October and November, Wright worked at the Perkasie site. At various times, D. Hange,[2] K. Culbreath, and K. Long, both apprentice carpenters, worked at Perkasie with Wright during these few weeks. Specifically, these individuals performed work which appeared on a so-called punch list. A punch list consists of items which need corrective action by construction contractors.

During the payroll week ending October 28, the Employer paid Wright the rated wage for the work he performed at the Perkasie site the previous week.

On October 28,[3] Wright spoke with another employee (Waddington) and discussed the wages paid for work on the Perkasie site. They observed that Culbreath and Long previously had not received the rated wages for that work. Later that day, Wright spoke with Hange at the Perkasie site. He asked Hange whether a nonrated or rated wage was supposed to be paid for Perkasie site work. Hange responded he did not know the answer, speculated it was a rated job and asked whether Wright received the rated wage. Wright answered in the affirmative, and the conversation ended.

The next payroll week ended November 4. The employees were paid for that week's work on November 6. Unlike the prior wage payment, Wright received only the nonrated wage for his work at the Perkasie site. A discussion concerning the Perkasie wages ensued during the lunch hour on November 6. Wright, Culbreath, Hange, and Long were eating lunch together. The four of them comprised the Employer's entire Perkasie work force at that time. Wright asked Culbreath whether the latter received rated pay for his Perkasie work. Culbreath answered he had not received the prevailing rate. Culbreath asked Hange whether his (Culbreath's) nonrated pay was correct. Hange said he was not sure. He told Culbreath to ask Walter Jr.

Wright told Culbreath he did receive the rated wage a week earlier, but that this week he (Wright) had received only nonrated pay for Perkasie work. Then, according to Wright's uncontradicted testimony, Wright asked Culbreath, "Well, what are you going to do about it?" Culbreath responded, "Well, I really don't know." Wright suggested, "Well, listen, I've been here a little bit

[2] Identified by Wright, without contradiction, as a foreman. The parties, however, did not stipulate Hange is a supervisor, nor is he alleged to be such in the complaint. Walter Jr. testified that Hange "was in charge" of the activities at Perkasie and that he would tell Hange what he needed to do and left Hange with the responsibility to complete the tasks. Culbreath testified Walter Jr. physically was present at Perkasie approximately only 15 percent of worktime and that Hange told Culbreath what to do and inspected his work. Based on these factors, the General Counsel's posttrial brief, seeking to impute Hange's knowledge to the Employer (see sec. C–5, below), urges "the record shows Hange to be a supervisor." No request is made for me to make such a finding.

I decline to resolve Hange's status. I am not satisfied the issue was fully litigated. There is only the minimal evidence described bearing on Hange's status. Since job titles are not dispositive of supervisory status, I am not bound by the undisputed evidence he was a foreman. In the absence of a motion to amend the complaint to allege Hange as a supervisor, the Employer may rely on the perfunctory attention given to his status during the trial.

[3] This date is derived from Wright's testimony. The General Counsel's brief asserts the conversation occurred on October 30. This discrepancy is not material. The substance of the conversation is undisputed.

longer. I know the Bruckers a little better. I'll see what I can find out."

After work on November 6, Wright traveled from the Perkasie site to the Employer's office. There, he met Walter Sr. and Julia. Wright asked for clarification of the apparent discrepancy in pay he received on October 28 and November 6. Wright said he received rated wages for his Perkasie work during the former week, but nonrated wages for such work performed during the latter week.

Walter Sr. opined the nonrated wage was appropriate for maintenance work rather than original construction, and punch list corrections were considered maintenance. Julia commented she had already discussed the wage rate discrepancy with Walter Jr. Julia said they had concluded the rated wage had been paid by mistake on October 28. She explained to Wright that the Employer considered the punch list work to be "maintenance items" which should be compensated at nonrated amounts. Thus, she told Wright his correct wage was the nonrated sum of $10 per hour he had been paid on November 6 for Perkasie work. Further, Julia said she and Walter Jr. had decided not to try to recoup the October 28 overpayment from Wright. Julia ended the conversation by telling Wright to speak with Walter Jr. after 6 p.m. that day if Wright was not satisfied with her explanations.

Wright went home after leaving the Employer's office. He telephoned the Authority's office and asked for Gerry Burton, an official of the Authority. Burton was not there. Wright was advised Burton would return Monday, November 9. Wright left a detailed message for Burton. The message identified the purpose of his call and the identification of the Employer, jobsite, and wage rate received.

Wright did not attempt to contact Walter Jr. on November 6. Instead, he deferred such a conversation until he would obtain further information from the Authority.

About 9 a.m., Monday, November 9, Burton called Wright at a jobsite other than Perkasie at which he was working for the Employer. Burton confirmed the accuracy of the message she had received from Wright. He asked Burton what wage rate was applicable to him at Perkasie. Burton said she did not know. They arranged to meet at 4:15 or 4:30 p.m., after Wright concluded his day's work.

Burton then called the Employer's office. She spoke with Julia Brucker. What Burton said is in dispute. Julia claimed she was told the Authority believed the Employer was "having trouble with one of your employees, Jeffrey Wright." Burton did not testify.[4] However, Karl Gabler, Burton's superior, testified he asked Burton to call the Employer to request submission of payrolls. The record reflects Wright's inquiry was intended to be confidential.

The General Counsel asserts, in salient part, that the Employer became aware of the concerted character of the activity by means of Burton's request for payrolls, because such documents applied to all the employees working at Perkasie. The Employer contends Julia's testimony that Burton explicitly identified Wright shows he was engaged in personal, not concerted, activity.

Contrary to the General Counsel's position, I do not conclude Julia's testimony concerning the November 9 call from the Authority[5] presents a critical credibility issue. Julia conceded the point sought by counsel for the General Counsel. Julia acknowledged she was asked for payrolls. That acknowledgment is the factual predicate for the General Counsel's contention the Employer was apprised of the existence of concerted activity. The purported identification of Wright (emphasized by the Employer) and the request for payrolls (highlighted by the General Counsel) are not mutually exclusive. That Wright's name may have been mentioned does not negate a finding of employer knowledge of concerted activity. In my view, if Wright's confidentiality had been betrayed by a revelation of his identity to the Employer, such a transmittal would have definitely linked Wright to the alleged concerted activity. I concede it is possible the Bruckers could have surmised, on their own, that it was Wright who contacted the Authority. Such a conclusion could be deduced from Wright's confrontation of November 6 with Julia regarding the wage payments. Nonetheless, I conclude the means by which the Employer learned, or formed its belief, that Wright contacted the Authority is of no moment.

Based on the foregoing, I find, factually, that some time between 9 and 11:45 a.m., on November 9, the Employer learned (or came to believe) that Wright had contacted the Authority and, as a result, the Authority requested submission of the payrolls for the employees doing the punch list work at Perkasie.

At approximately 11:45 a.m., Walter Jr. appeared at the jobsite. He ordered Wright to stop working, to gather his tools, and leave. He told Wright the Employer no longer required his services.

Wright asked "what this was all about." Walter Jr. exclaimed, "I don't need any disloyal soldiers in my camp and I don't need anybody contacting the Bucks County Housing Authority behind my back when you know I'm having troubles with them."

Wright claimed he tried to offer an explanation, but was cut off. Walter Jr. said Wright should work until noon and claim his paycheck.

Wright left the job as ordered. He immediately visited Burton at the Authority's office. He told Burton he had been discharged. Burton said she still did not know what rate was appropriate, but the Authority was looking into it.[6]

Wright then went to the Employer's office. Julia met him. She said she could not understand why he had contacted the Authority when the Employer had treated him so well. Wright tried to explain he was simply seeking information to use in his conversation with Walter

[4] I make no adverse inference on this omission. Burton, who presumably is still an employee of the Authority, was equally available to both parties.

[5] Julia could not recall whether it was Burton or Gabler who called that date.

[6] Official correspondence following Wright's termination shows a subsequent determination that rated wages were appropriate for the punch list work at the Perkasie site.

Jr. about the pay discrepancy. That explanation was to no avail. He received his final paycheck and left.

C. Analysis

1. The parties' contentions

The General Counsel contends Wright's November 9 discharge was in retaliation for having engaged in protected concerted activity. In contrast, the Employer argues that Wright's contact with the Authority was not "concerted" activity and, if it had been, no violation exists because it has not been proved that the Employer knew Wright's actions were concerted.

2. The discharge

In answer to complaint paragraph 4(b), the Employer claimed Wright's termination was due to his failure to follow Julia's November 6 statement that if Wright was not satisfied with her explanation as to pay discrepancy, he should speak with Walter Jr.

During the trial (apparently for the first time) the Employer claimed Wright's termination was caused, partially at least, because it anticipated a need for layoffs due to lack of work. Thus, the Employer shifted its defense from a concession of discharge for failure to do what Julia said to a claim Wright was laid off for lack of work. Also, at the trial, the defense shifted yet one more time. Walter Jr. claimed one reason for the termination was Wright's apparent "unhappiness," referring to Wright's conversation with Julia on November 6 regarding his wage payment. Such shifting permits an inference that the Employer is seeking to disguise its true reason for the termination. (Pilgrim Life Ins. Co., 249 NLRB 1228, 1245–46 (1980).)

The "lay-off" defense is patently shallow. Wright had worked from November 7, 1979, through November 9, 1981, without interruption. No layoff of any employee actually occurred until December 23, 1981. This was 6 weeks after Wright's termination. Moreover, the record shows Wright was treated in a disparate manner. Employees normally were given at least 1 day's notice of layoff. Here, Wright was preemptorily removed from his job. He was not permitted to complete the workday.

Walter Jr. provided candid, though damaging, evidence of the cause of the termination. He testified, "I believe Wright should have come to me if he had any problems. I have always tried to be fair with all my employees. I thought I was due the courtesy of at least a phone call before he went to a customer of mine and complained about me." Viewed in isolation, this statement might be considered innocuous. Conceivably, it is an expression of legitimate management concern that employees should not denigrate their employer to customers.

However, the surrounding circumstances persuade me that the quoted statement is tantamount to an admission the discharge was caused solely to retaliate against Wright for having made inquiry of the Authority as to the accuracy of the wages. The complete context in which the termination occurred provides a telling setting.

Wright's confrontation, on November 6, with Julia established the unlawful framework. It is not unreasonable to conclude that Julia's request of Wright to consult with Walter Jr. was her effort to prevent employees from making official inquiries as to the propriety of the wage payments. Julia admittedly had earlier discussions concerning the payment with Walter Jr. There existed some real question whether their determination to pay nonrated wages for the punch list work was a proper decision. As previously noted, the Pennsylvania Department of Labor and Industry ultimately decided that the Employer should have paid the prevailing wage for the work in question. (See fn. 6, supra.)

Julia's November 6 remarks to Wright tend to show that the Employer was not merely concerned over the fact Wright had contacted a customer. Thus, Julia commented that she could not understand why Wright contacted the Authority in the face of the rather beneficent treatment the Employer accorded him in the past. Such remonstration bears the implication that the Employer believed Wright's contact with the Authority could produce a compliance problem with wage enforcement officials.

Walter Jr. was concerned with the same problem. That concern was manifest in his precipitous and spontaneous reaction to the knowledge that Wright had contacted the Authority. Though it is not the Board's province to monitor compliance with wage statutes, it is appropriate to consider such matters in an assessment of motivation. Walter Jr. was party to the decision to pay nonrated wages for the punch list work in question. Certainly, if that decision was successfully challenged, the Employer would be, at least, subjected to increased costs for wages.

On balance, I conclude Walter Jr. was not so much concerned that Wright might have set out to embarrass the Employer in the eyes of a customer as with the fact Wright's actions had already initiated an investigation by the Authority when it requested the Employer to submit its payrolls.

In sum, I do not accept the Employer's defenses that Wright's termination was caused by (1) a purported insubordinate act, (2) a need to lay off employees for lack of work, or (3) concern over Wright's "unhappiness."[7] Instead, I conclude that Wright was discharged on November 9, 1981, because he contacted the Authority to determine whether the Employer had paid the appropriate wages for the Perkasie work.

3. The applicable precedent

Whether a discharge, predicated on the grounds found immediately above, constitutes proscribed conduct within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, remains a question. Resolution of this issue requires an analysis of the substantially undisputed facts, in coordination with the applicable decisional precedent.

The Board and the United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit, the circuit having jurisdiction over the instant dispute, have different views concerning the elements which comprise an 8(a)(1) violation based on a "concerted" action theory. I have utmost regard for the authority and decisions of the Third Circuit Court of Appeals. However, I am bound to follow Board precedent unless it has been reversed by the Supreme Court, and may not apply inconsistent decisions of the various courts of appeals. Los Angeles New Hospital, 224 NLRB 960, 962 fn. 4 (1976), citing Iowa Beef Packers, 144 NLRB 615, 616 (1963).

[7] This last-stated defense will be further discussed in sec. C,5, below.

The statutory declaration which is the root of the violation charged is Section 7 of the Act. That section of the Act provides that employees shall have the right to engage in concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection. That right has been broadly construed in consideration of potential 8(a)(1) violations. Thus, an employee is protected when he questions possible violations of the collective-bargaining contract (Colonial Stores Inc., 248 NLRB 1187 (1980); Schneider, Inc., 241 NLRB 850 (1979)), or attempts to enforce contract provisions Sheet Metal, 224 NLRB 835, 840 (1976); Interboro Contractors, 157 NLRB 1295 (1966), enfd. 388 F.2d 495 (2d Cir. 1957). The Third Circuit expressly repudiated the "constructive concerted activity" doctrine of Interboro. (See NLRB v. Northern Metal Co., 440 F.2d 881 (3d Cir. 1971).) Such activities constitute the implementation of the terms of a collective-bargaining contract and are an extension of the concerted activity that gave rise to the agreement (H. O. Seiffert Co., 199 NLRB 960, 966 (1972), affd. without opinion 75 LC ¶ 10,568 (9th Cir. 1974)). They affect the rights of all employees in the bargaining unit (Interboro Contractors, supra).

When an employee acts on his own on such matters as making safety complaints to a government body, such action is protected because safe working conditions are a matter of concern to all of the employees (Alleluia Cushion Co., 221 NLRB 999, 1000 (1976)). An individual's protest over such things as pay (and racism) are protected where other employees share that employee's concern and interest in the matter (Diagnostic Center Hospital Corp., 228 NLRB 1215, 1217 (1977)).

Where an employee undertakes such action in good faith, that action is protected even though it is ultimately determined that the employee's protest was without merit (Bechtel Power Corp., 236 NLRB 771, 774 (1978); Spinoza, Inc., 199 NLRB 525 (1972), affd. without opinion 478 F.2d 1401 (5th Cir. 1973); General Nutrition Center, 221 NLRB 850, 855 (1976)).

An employee's purely personal complaints are not protected (Inked Ribbon Corp., 241 NLRB 7 (1979). See Capitol Ornamental Concrete Specialties, 248 NLRB 851 (1980), where an employee's complaint about the condition of an access road to the company's parking lot was held unprotected because the employee did not act in concert with others and the complaint did not touch on matters of common concern. Also see National Wax Co., 251 NLRB 1064 (1980)). Personal gripes are not protected and an employee's activities in advertising to fellow employees that he openly defies his Company's policies are not protected (Midland Frame Division, 216 NLRB 302 (1975)). An employee is not protected when he defiantly refuses to abide by applicable rules of conduct and is openly contemptuous of management officials (Golden Nugget, Inc., 215 NLRB 50 (1974)).

Also, an employee is not protected when he sends a letter to a third party which constitutes disloyalty and disparagement of a company's judgment and capacity effectively to perform its work (American Arbitration Assn., 233 NLRB 71 (1977). Cf. Allied Aviation Service Co., 248 NLRB 229 (1980), where the Board held that an employee's letter to a third party was protected where it related to a legitimate ongoing labor dispute and where the letter did not constitute disparagement or vilification of the employer's product or reputation).

An employee's complaints relating to working conditions are not protected if they are keyed to a personal feud with management rather than the correction of working conditions that concern the group (Northeastern Dye Works, 203 NLRB 1222 (1973)). An employee is not protected when he complains about the incompetency of management when the complaint is not about wages and conditions of employment but is merely intended to put management on the "hot seat" (Shulman's Inc., 208 NLRB 772, 784 (1974), enf. denied on other grounds 519 F.2d 498 (4th Cir. 1975)). An employee's activity is not protected where it is purely personal, where other employees are not involved in the matter protested, and where no group of employees would benefit if the protest had been successful (Tabernacle Community Hospital, 233 NLRB 1425, 1429 (1978)).

4. Protected concerted activity—application of the above principles

The Board has extended the Alleluia Cushion (supra) doctrine to employees who attempt to obtain an employer's compliance with legal requirements that it pay its employees prevailing wages on government projects. Batchelor Electric Co., 254 NLRB 1145 (1981); Kyle & Stephen, 259 NLRB 731, 733 (1982).

In G. V. R., Inc., 201 NLRB 147 (1973), the Board was confronted with whether an employee's discharge for having given interviews during the investigation of an alleged Davis-Bacon Act[8] violation constituted concerted activity. The Board found:

> [A]n employee covered by a federal statute governing wages, hours, and conditions of employment who participates in a compliance investigation of his employer's administration of a contract covered by such a statute, or who protests his employer's noncompliance with the contract, is engaged in concerted activity for the mutual aid and protection of all the employer's employees similarly situated. 201 NLRB at 147. [Emphasis added.]

The Board cautioned, however, that the above finding was not to mean more than the salient principle it enunciated in Thurston Motor Lines, 159 NLRB 1265 (1966). In Thurston, the Board announced it would be contrary to public policy to hold that the making of complaints to public authorities in the course of concerted activity removes the protection of the Act from the concerted activity. 201 NLRB 147 fn. 2 (1973).

In Hugh H. Wilson Corp., 171 NLRB 1040 (1968), enfd. 414 F.2d 1345 (3d Cir. 1969), the Board adopted a trial examiner's observation that:

> Concerted activity does not necessarily require some overt manifestation of physical action on the part of employees based on some prior compact among them such as a decision to lock arms and march against an employer making claims of opposition to him. Even individual protests are protected as concerted activity "If the matter at issue is of moment to the group of employees complaining and if the matter is brought to the attention of management by a spokesman, voluntary or appointed for that purpose, so long as such person is speaking of the benefits of the interested group." [171 NLRB at 1046]

In its Hugh H. Wilson opinion, the Third Circuit extensively and comprehensively reviewed the applicable precedent. The court found that the protests of individual employees about their employer's profit sharing plan were "sufficient . . . to fit in the mold of 'group action' which is considered to be an element of concerted activities under Section 7 [citing Mushroom Transportation Co. v. N.L.R.B., 330 F.2d 683 (3d Cir. 1964)]." In Mushroom Transportation, the court established the principle that to be concerted "it must appear at the very least that [the conduct] was engaged in with the object of initiating or inducing or preparing for group action or that it had some relation to group action in the interest of the employees." 330 F.2d at 685. Recently, the court reaffirmed this requirement. Frank Brisco, Inc. v. NLRB, 637 F.2d 946 (3d Cir. 1981).

In sum, the Third Circuit's decisions require affirmative evidence that group action is contemplated, whereas the Board's determinations need evidence merely that individual actions necessarily are on behalf, or in the interest, and the benefits derived from such actions would enure to the benefits, of other employees.

I conclude that the discussions during the November 6 lunch hour among all the Employer's employees at Perkasie reasonably may be held to be an effort to initiate and promote concerted action. I find, in particular, the conversation between Wright and Culbreath reflects such a result. It is clear that it was not only Wright who was concerned with his wage payment that day. Culbreath questioned Hange about his own (Culbreath's) pay. Hange counseled that Culbreath should take up the matter with Walter Jr. It was Wright's suggestion, based on his comparative longevity as an employee and his perceived greater affinity to the Bruckers, that he "see what . . . [he] . . . can find out" which created merely an appearance that Wright was voicing only an individual complaint.

Earlier wage discussions also are significant. Thus, the conversation Wright held with Waddington during which they noted the failure of Culbreath and Long to have received the prevailing wage shows the universality of concern over the wage issue and the breadth to which corrective action, if any was required, would have been addressed. Literally every employee who worked at Perkasie during the relevant times would have been affected. Indeed, that was the precise ultimate result of the investigation for which Wright was the catalyst. As earlier noted, the Department of Labor and Industries finally determined the prevailing wage rate was applicable and wage adjustments to the employees were required.

In Air Surrey Corp., 229 NLRB 1064 (1977), enf. denied on other grounds 601 F.2d 256 (6th Cir. 1979), the Board held that an individual inquiry was protected concerted activity because (1) it advanced the purpose of a statute (Prevailing Wage Act), and (2) it related "to conditions of employment that are matters of mutual concern to all the affected employees." The Board concluded that collecting pay for one's work is on a par with safe working conditions (under the Alleluia Cushion doctrine) as a vital employee concern.

There is more compelling evidence in the instant case than in Surrey. In the latter case, there was no direct evidence that the employees acted in concert. However, the Board reasoned there existed "a likelihood that the other employees, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, shared the complaining employee's interest in receiving a valid paycheck and supported that cause."

In the case at bar, I do not find the General Counsel's principal theory to be based on the "constructive" concerted activity rule of Interboro. Rather, the thrust of the General Counsel's evidence is designed to show the presence of actual concerted conduct by the participation together of several employees in the activity claimed to be concerted. Thus, the General Counsel contends, as I find, that the evidence manifests such overt elements of group action on wages, a matter of clear interest to the employees, as satisfies the standard of the Third Circuit. Inasmuch as remedial action resulting from Wright's activity was bound to, and did, enure to the benefits of other employees, the Board's standards also are satisfied.

Based on all the foregoing, I find that Wright's inquiry comprised protected concerted activity.

5. The Employer's knowledge of the "concerted" nature of Wright's activity

A final issue still must be resolved. The question arises: Did the Employer know, prior to discharging Wright, that his contact with the Authority was concerted in character?

The Board in Diagnostic Center Hospital, supra, declared at 228 NLRB 1215 (1977):

> In order to sustain an 8(a)(1) discharge finding, it is necessary to establish that at the time of the discharge the employer had knowledge of the concerted nature of the activity for which the employee was discharged.

In Tri-State Truck Service v. NLRB, 616 F.2d 65 (3d Cir. 1980), the Third Circuit stated an employer "must have knowledge or reason to know, that employee activities have coalesced into group action for mutual aid or protection," 616 F.2d at 71.

The above-quoted language shows that both the Board and Third Circuit consider employer knowledge that employee activity has assumed a "concerted" nature (albeit within the confines of the respective definitions ascribed by each tribunal to that term) a necessary element of an unlawful 8(a)(1) discharge. I conclude the evidence satisfies both the Board's and court's standards for proof of employer knowledge.[9]

It is true, as the Employer contends, that Wright at no time announced to or informed the Employer that he was questioning the wage payments on behalf of any other employee. Also, there is no evidence Wright explicitly informed anyone at the Authority of such a fact. Finally, it is not asserted, nor is there evidence to show, that Burton told Julia (on November 9) that Wright had made such a representation to the Authority. Nevertheless, there is ample evidence from which I conclude the Employer actually knew or had reason to know of the concertedness of Wright's contact with the Authority.

Rarely would direct evidence of the requisite employer knowledge be available. Concerted and group action relative to wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment infrequently is undertaken in the presence, or with participation, of statutory supervisors. Judicial admissions of such knowledge are unlikely. To require such a quantum of proof, in my view, is unreasonable. Such a requirement would hold relatively unsophisticated employees to a standard of making explicit announcements to their employers that they have embarked on group action. It is more logical and fair that knowledge (or lack of it) be determined from all the surrounding circumstances.

The element of employer knowledge may be derived by inference. In Diagnostic Center, supra, the Board disapproved of the use of multiple inferences as the basis of finding an employer had knowledge of the concerted nature of the activity for which an employee was discharged. 228 NLRB at 1216 (1977). However, the Board did not disavow the validity of inferring the requisite employer knowledge in situations where the surrounding circumstances make such inference reasonable.

I conclude the instant case contains a variety of evidence from which the Employer's knowledge that Wright's activity was concerted may be inferred. Those factors are discussed below.

First, as earlier described, Julia and Walter Jr. had decided to pay the employees the nonrated wage for their work at Perkasie in October and November. That was a conscious and unilateral decision. The documentary evidence shows that decision reasonably could have been understood by them to bear the potential for concerted activity. This is so because their decision created a deviation from the former practice, dictated by the terms of the Employer's contract to perform the Perkasie work, of paying the prevailing wage at that project. In such context, group action to recoup wage underpayments was a readily anticipated consequence of that decision.

When Walter Jr. and Julia noted and discussed Wright's wage discrepancy between themselves, they agreed the prevailing rate he received was an error. If they were wrong, it is not unreasonable to charge them with expecting all the employees so aggrieved would exercise the option to bond together to achieve corrective action.

Walter Jr. and Julia testified as adverse witnesses called by the General Counsel and also as witnesses for the defense. I found each particularly articulate and intelligent. Those characteristics are persuasive indicators that each of them is, and was, fully capable of comprehending the implications and ramifications of their decision to pay nonrated wages to all their employees at Perkasie. Those personal features also provide a basis for Walter Jr. and Julia to have understood that a request for the payrolls involved an investigation of alleged underpayment to a group of employees.

Finally, the Employer's assertion that Wright's discharge was due to his "unhappiness" with his wage rate (see sec. C,2, above) supports an inference that the Employer knew of the concerted nature of Wright's activity. It is clear that Wright expressed his "unhappiness" on November 6 when he spoke with Julia. As far as the Employer was concerned, Wright's November 6 conversation with Julia was an individual inquiry or complaint. The record does not reflect Wright expressly said anything that day to dispel that understanding of the Employer. Nonetheless, the Employer did not discharge Wright on November 6. It did nothing to relieve him of his "unhappiness!"

On November 9, the situation changed. The Employer was informed Wright had contacted the Authority. Concurrent with that advice, the Employer's payrolls for all employees had been requested. The Authority did not limit its payroll request to those of Wright. Such limitation would have been reasonable if Wright had lodged a complaint in his individual capacity. The credited evidence shows Wright was specifically identified by Burton to Julia.

The failure to limit the request for payroll records to those of Wright, in the instant context, reasonably is susceptible to the interpretation that the group of employees were represented by Wright's contact. Walter Jr.'s precipitous and spontaneous reaction shows he harbored precisely such a belief. It was the very interjection of the advice Wright had contacted the Authority which was the direct cause of Walter Jr.'s visit to the jobsite to discharge Wright.

Based on all the foregoing, I find the Employer did have knowledge and reason to know Wright had been engaged in activity which was designed to initiate, induce, or prepare for, group action to correct wage discrepancies which might have befallen any of the Perkasie employees.

On the basis of the above findings of fact and upon the entire record in the case, I make the following[10]

[9] In reaching this conclusion, I do not at all rely on the evidence, and the General Counsel's argument on it, which tends to show Hange was a statutory supervisor. See fn. 2, above.

[10] Based on the conclusions of law, I deny the Employer's motion to dismiss the complaint allegations orally made at the conclusion of the presentation of the General Counsel's case-in-chief.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Walter Brucker & Co., Inc. is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. When Jeffrey Wright contacted the Bucks County Housing Authority in November 1981, he was engaged in protected concerted activity.

3. The Employer's discharge of Jeffrey Wright on November 9, 1981, constituted unlawful interference, restraint, and coercion of employees for engaging in protected concerted activities in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

4. The aforesaid unfair labor practice affects commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found the Employer violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act in certain respects, I shall recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and affirmatively take such action as will dissipate the effects of its unfair labor practice.

Because the Employer unlawfully discharged Jeffrey Wright it shall be ordered to offer him immediate and full reinstatement to his former job or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent job, without prejudice to his seniority or other rights and privileges. Also, the Order shall require the Employer to make Jeffrey Wright whole for any loss of earnings he may have suffered as a result of his unlawful discharge on November 9, 1981. The make-whole remedy shall require the Employer to pay interest upon the sum due. Such interest will be computed in the manner prescribed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977). (See generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).)

Also, the Employer shall be ordered to expunge from its records any reference to Jeffrey Wright's discharge on November 9, 1981, and shall inform Wright, in writing, that such references have been expunged and that the conduct found unlawful herein will not be used as a basis for further personnel actions concerning him. See Sterling Sugars, 261 NLRB 472 (1982).

Finally, the Order shall require the Employer to refrain from, in any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, and coercing its employees in the exercise of their Section 7 rights. Upon the instant record, I conclude a broad prospective order is unnecessary. See Hickmott Foods, 242 NLRB 1357 (1979).

Stolte, Inc. and Kenneth Wilkie. Case 31–CA–12019

26 December 1984

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 31 August 1983 Administrative Law Judge Harold A. Kennedy issued a decision in this proceeding. The Charging Party filed exceptions and a brief. On 27 April 1984 the Board remanded the proceeding with the direction that the judge make more specific credibility findings and set forth the bases therefor. On 26 July 1984 the judge issued the attached supplemental decision. Thereafter, the Charging Party filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed an answering brief.

The Board has considered the decisions and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions as modified herein.[2]

[1] The Charging Party has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[2] The judge dismissed the complaint allegations that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by discharging Kenneth Wilkie, as he found that Wilkie was dismissed for slow performance, and we affirm that finding. We note certain issues, however, which require a more thorough discussion than that furnished by the judge.

We note first that Wilkie was an active steward who constantly raised working condition-related complaints. From Wilkie's uncontradicted testimony, the Respondent was irritated with Wilkie's constant complaints. It is in this context that we have viewed the allegation that Wilkie was illegally discharged.

We also note certain alleged inconsistencies in the Respondent's testimony not directly addressed by the judge. One involves the Respondent's foreman James McCauley's testimony, at separate times during the hearing, that when Wilkie first began working for the Respondent his work speed was one-third that of the average worker, and that after he became steward his work speed was one-third that of the average worker. The General Counsel pointed out on cross-examination that McCauley stated that the reason he discharged Wilkie in February was because his rate of work had decreased after he became steward. McCauley then stated that Wilkie's work speed while he was steward was one-fourth that of the average worker. The General Counsel asked McCauley why he was now saying one-fourth, and McCauley replied that he had no answer. McCauley did note, however, that there was little difference between a third and a fourth slower. McCauley also indicated that he had told Supervisor Bragdon that Wilkie was doing one-third the work of an average worker. We note that McCauley had been consistent in stating that Wilkie's work speed had decreased after he became steward, until this attempt to quantify that decrease. Supervisor Bragdon also stated that McCauley had told him that Wilkie had slowed down since becoming steward. Thus, we find that McCauley's attempt to quantify Wilkie's work performance as one-fourth instead of one-third that of the average worker to support his statement that Wilkie's work rate decreased after he became steward is not critically inconsistent and is insufficient to discredit McCauley's testimony on this point.

Another alleged inconsistency involves Bragdon's affidavit to the Board, in which he stated, "Up until the time he [Wilkie] became steward, as far as I know his work was satisfactory. From that time on I heard complaints." This statement could be viewed as contradicting McCauley's statement that Wilkie had always been a slow worker. We note, however, that Bragdon did not have much occasion to view Wilkie's work. He testified that he personally observed Wilkie at work only once, and at that time Wilkie was slower than the other employees. Bragdon could not recall if he observed Wilkie before or after Wilkie became steward. In sum, we do not find Bragdon's testimony to be critically inconsistent from that of McCauley.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the complaint is dismissed.

DECISION

HAROLD A. KENNEDY, Administrative Law Judge. The only question presented in this case is whether an employer discharged one of its employees for engaging in union or "other protected concerted activities" and thereby violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act (Act). Having considered the entire record taken at the trial of this matter, held in Los Angeles, California, on February 23, 1983, and determined that the employee was terminated for other than any protected concerted activities, the complaint will be dismissed.

Kenneth Wilkie, the Charging Party, filed a charge with the Regional Director of the National Labor Relations Board's Region 31 on March 25, 1982, alleging that Respondent Stolte, Inc. had terminated him about February 12, 1982, "because of his union activities on behalf of Laborers International Union Local 300 of North America, AFL–CIO."[1] Thereafter, on May 28 a complaint issued alleging that: (a) About January 11 Wilkie was appointed a union steward for certain employees of Stolte working at its Galleria II jobsite in Glendale, California;[2] (b) between on and about January 11 and February 12 Wilkie "concertedly complained" about wages, hours, and working conditions of Respondent's employees; (c) during the same period Wilike complained to OSHA regarding the working conditions of employees; and (d) About February 12 Stolte discharged Wilkie and since that date has failed to reinstate him. The complaint also alleges that the discharge occurred "because Wilkie joined or assisted the Union or engaged in other protected concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection" and, thus, violated Section 8(a)(3). The complaint further alleges that the discharge operated to "interfere with, restrain, and coerce" Stolte's employees in the exercise of their rights guaranteed in Section 7 of the Act and, thus, violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

Respondent admitted in its answer that Wilkie was appointed union steward about January 11 as alleged but denied the other allegations recited above. Respondent

[1] All dates are in 1982 unless otherwise stated.

The General Counsel called James Laney, a business agent for Local 300, to testify on his case-in-chief, but the Union did not otherwise participate in the proceeding.

[2] Job Superintendent Eugene Bragdon described the Galleria II project as "an addition to the existing Glendale Galleria Shopping Center," consisting "of a five-level parking structure and then a two-level mall with parking underneath it."

admitted all other allegations of the complaint which set forth the following matters:

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce and in a business affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. Respondent is a California corporation engaged as a general building contractor of high-rise office buildings, commercial buildings, and shopping centers. Respondent maintains its principal place of business in Los Angeles, California, and in the course and conduct of its business purchases and receives goods and services valued in excess of $50,000 directly from suppliers located outside of the state.

3. At all times relevant the following persons held the positions indicated and were agents and supervisors as those terms are defined in the Act: Edward Cruz Jr., superintendent of the tower; Eugene Bragdon, superintendent of the mill and parking structure; Robert Allen Powell, carpenter foreman; James Daniel McCauley, Laborers' foreman; and John J. Neeson, project manager.

4. The Laborers' International Union of North America, Local 300, AFL–CIO, CLC (Union) is a labor organization as the term is used in the Act.

It remains only to be determined whether Wilkie's termination was for a purpose proscribed by the Act as alleged.

Five witnesses testified, two for the General Counsel and three for Respondent. The testimony is summarized hereinafter in order of their apperances.

Charging Party Kenneth Wilkie testified that he was hired by Superintendent Ed Cruz to work at Galleria II in Glendale on October 26, 1981. Wilkie stated that Cruz told him he was to start as a laborer and would later become a foreman. Wilkie worked as a laborer, reporting to Cruz, until around November 18 when he was laid off due to the fact that the Respondent and the "owner" had not signed a contract. Wilkie returned to work for Respondent at the same jobsite around December 18 and worked thereafter under Laborers' Foreman McCauley until terminated on February 12, 1982.

Wilkie stated that at first he was assigned to do vibrating work with a jackhammer, digging of footings, pouring of concrete, assisting in the engineering of layouts, and helping build barricades. "Everything changed," Wilkie said, when he was designated job steward by Local 300 on January 11.[3] From that time on, according to Wilkie, he was assigned to do such things as act as flagman, pick up rock, wash vehicles, sweep up, and clean barricades. Wilike indicated that other laborers spent their time working around "footings."

Wilkie testified that as steward he was called on to check on safety, see that laborers' work was performed only by laborers, and take grievances from other laborer employees. He stated that the duties of a job steward are set forth in a "Short Form Agreement."[4]

Wilkie stated that he was entitled to conduct union business during normal work time—after requesting permission of his supervisor. Wilkie testified concerning a number of conversations that he had with management personnel—Superintendent Cruz, Superintendent Bragdon, Carpenter Foreman Powell, and Laborers' Foreman McCauley—during the month that he served as steward.[5]

Wilkie went into some detail concerning complaints he made to Respondent's supervisors on the following dates, as follows:

January 11—McCauley—man alone in an unshored "footing" (or hole); also, carpenters doing laborers' work (oiling forms). McCauley agreed to "correct" both items.

January 12—McCauley—Wilkie wanted to check to see if two employees (operating engineers) helping with concrete pour were union laborers, but McCauley told Wilkie to return to work.

January 13—McCauley, Powell and Bragdon—repeat of January 11 complaints. Powell and then Bragdon consulted concerning the oiling of forms. Bragdon said carpenters would not oil forms but declined to assign work to laborers. Wilkie told to contact Union.

January 14—McCauley, Cruz and Bragdon—repeat of January 12 complaint and again rejected by McCauley, who told Wilkie to return to work. Cruz consulted, however, and Wilkie allowed to perform "union business." Wilkie asked to see papers of two workers (operating engineers) doing concrete work but McCauley "interfered." Bragdon then consulted, and Bragdon reported that the two men were "union." Business Agent Laney called in and the two workers refused to produce cards.

January 15—McCauley, Powell and Bragdon—repeat of complaints of January 11 and additional new complaints: two laborers worked during lunch hour and another performed "PTO" (vibrator) work without being paid the extra wages as required. After meeting with Powell, Wilkie went to Bragdon, who asked Wilkie to stop "these little small things." Wilkie then called union business agent as suggested by Bragdon.

January 18 (rain)—McCauley and Bragdon—repeat of January 15 complaint concerning pay for two employees who worked through lunch period. Bragdon stated that men volunteered such work, but Wilkie stated union men "don't volunteer." Bragdon became angry, ordered Wilkie out of office and commented, "You're the damndest steward that I've ever seen in my life."

January 20—McCauley and Bragdon—Wilkie and two other laborers told to enter a 10-foot caved-in footing and shovel out mud. Wilkie went to see Bragdon, who stated that he knew Wilkie had called "OSHA."[6] Bragdon said carpenters would shore up hole as OSHA directed, but Wilkie stated, "That's a laborer's job." Wilkie was told he was "starting an awful lot of problems" and was then assigned by (Bragdon through McCauley) to [3] Union Business Agent Laney testified that the actual date of appointment was January 12 (R. Exh. 1).

[4] Respondent is signatory to the Master Labor Agreement (G.C. Exh. 4), however, not the Short Form Agreement (G.C. Exh. 2). A steward's duties under the two agreements are not dissimilar, however.

[5] Wilkie testified that McCauley reported to Cruz and that Cruz reported to Bragdon. Laborers' Foreman McCauley said he reported to Bragdon who reported to Project Manager Neeson.

[6] References to OSHA throughout proceeding actually refer to Cal-OSHA.

sweep the street. Later Wilkie was assigned to dust barricades and wash vehicles.

January 25—McCauley, Powell and Bragdon—Wilkie and two other laborers assigned again to shovel dirt out of hole. Wilkie criticized installed shoring as "a little death trap." Powell arrived, stated shoring was done as OSHA directed and commented that he hoped it would fall on Wilkie. Bragdon then consulted and told by Wilkie that Bragdon should be "ashamed" of the shoring. Bragdon responded that the shoring was done as directed by OSHA and told Wilkie to "stop all this junk." Wilkie said he would call OSHA and did so. Safety meeting then followed, attended by Cruz, Bragdon, and about 17 carpenters and five laborers. Workers told by Cruz to bring safety problems to him or Bragdon so they can be corrected. Bragdon then added that he would fire anyone calling OSHA or union business agent because "I can straighten things out." Wilkie was given a chance to speak and stated, "I'm the guy to call." Continuing, Wilkie told Bragdon before group that he "didn't believe a word" of Bragdon's that OSHA had directed that shoring be done "this particular way." Bragdon said, "You're calling me a liar. Take that back." Wilkie responded: "I'm taking nothing back, and you can't make me." The safety meeting ended, and Wilkie returned to work. Later in the day, Cruz called Wilkie out of the hole to meet with OSHA Inspector Francis Ford. Wilkie showed Ford the footing. Ford ordered another laborer who was working in the hole to get out and then handed a citation for incorrect shoring to Cuz. Wilkie then told Ford and Stolte had five 10-power boxes on the jobsite that were not grounded and the need for barricades around certain unguarded footings. Ford then "wrote" up these items, according to Wilkie, and directed removal of the power boxes and roping off of footings.[7]

February 1—McCauley—Wilkie asked and was allowed to call the Union to advise that a concrete pour was in progress. Later in the day Wilkie met with McCauley and Operating Engineers' Business Agent "Jerry," who had come to the jobsite at Wilkie's request as Laborers' Business Agent Laney was unvailable. Wilkie pointed out improper use of a forklift by carpenters in carrying forms and commented that OSHA had told Stolte "to get rid" of it. McCauley told Wilkie that his complaint concerned carpenters' business, and Wilkie told McCauley "not to interfere." Jerry stated that he would "take this up with the carpenter foreman," and Wilkie agreed to return to his work picking up rocks. Wilkie also complained to McCauley at lunch time that day that two laborers were working through the lunch period as had occurred previously. Wilkie pointed out that the prior lunch time work and the PTO work had not yet been paid. Wilkie said he told McCauley, "It's going to be in their check," and McCauley "just looked at me . . . ."

February 4—McCauley, Powell and Bragdon—Wilkie approached McCauley and, after mentioning his (Wilkie's) recent absence due to an injury, inquired whether the rumor of a layoff of laborers had any validity. McCauley said it did and indicated that he (McCauley) would be the only laborer who would continue to be working. McCauley allowed Wilkie to speak to Bragdon about layoff of carpenters. Powell, who entered Bragdon's office while Wilkie was there, stated that he was keeping five carpenters and two carpenter foremen on the job. Wilkie said he would have to call his union and walked out. Later that day McCauley advised Wilkie that he was not being laid off after all.[8]

February 8—McCauley and Bragdon—Wilkie, who was working in a 14-foot deep hole near a crane, told McCauley that he had to get out and get away from the carbon monoxide in the area. McCauley replied that he wanted Wilkie to work there but allowed Wilkie to go see Bragdon. Bragdon told Wilkie to go back and do what McCauley directed or he (Wilkie) could call the business agent. Wilkie returned to the hole after calling the business agent. The business agent, a Mr. Bibb, came to the jobsite and met with Bragdon and Wilkie. Bibb supported Wilkie and complained of the Union's need for frequent visits to the jobsite and assignment of carpenters to laborers' work. Also, at Wilkie's request, Bibb asked Bragdon to provide transportation to a hospital to persons hurt on the job (which was not done when Wilkie was hurt on February 2). Bragdon agreed to provide such transportation.

Wilkie testified that on February 12, the day he was terminated, he and two other laborers were at work on his jobsite. He said McCauley called him over, from the position he was picking up rocks, and told him: "Here's your check. I'm glad to get rid of you." McCauley gave Wilkie his check and two "lay-off slips." Wilkie said he inquired of McCauley what the slips were, and McCauley explained: "This is your termination slip and another slip showing we don't ever want you with Stolte again."

Wilkie stated that McCauley also made a comment to the effect that he was "glad to get rid" of him, but did not explain the reason for the termination.

One of the slips given to Wilkie, which bears the label, "Termination Notice," indicates that Wilkie was hired on October 27, 1981, and discharged on February 12, 1982, for being "Too slow—poor work." Wilkie said he was never reprimanded while in the employ of Respondent and was aware of no complaints about his work. He said no one ever told him to speed up his work. Wilkie acknowledged, however, he never filed grievances against the company for the problems he had complained about.[9]

[7] On cross-examination, Wilkie said an OSHA representative had come to the jobsite at an earlier time when he was not there. Wilkie said he had asked the union business agent to call OSHA and that he (Wilkie) and Bragdon had discussed the earlier OSHA visit about January 20. Wilkie said an OSHA inspector returned on January 27 and repeated the need to get rid of the "10 power boxes." On redirect Wilkie said he called OSHA on two occasions, once on the morning of January 25 and on a later date in the evening after he had gone home.

Business Agent Laney later testified that he had called OSHA in January at Wilkie's request. Defense witness Superintendent Bragdon also testified concerning vists by OSHA representatives.

[8] Wilkie said he did not work on February 5 as he met with laid-off workers who, he said, had not been paid.

[9] The termination notice has three columns captioned "Lay Off," "Discharge" and "Voluntary Quit." Under Discharge the following items appear: Refusal to follow instructions; Misconduct; Absentee; Not Qualified; Too Slow—Poor Work; and Others (Explain). A box next to "To Slow—Poor Work" was "blacked out."

On cross-examination Wilkie said he kept a camera in his car which he used to photograph work conditions during breaktimes or after working hours.

James Laney, business agent or field representative for Laborers' Local 300, testified that Wilkie was appointed steward on the recommendation of the field representative who had preceded him. He said he had known Wilkie for 7 or 8 years.

Laney said he made "frequent" trips to the Galleria II jobsite in response to Wilkie's complaints. Laney stated that he went to the jobsite on the average of "probably no less than three and probably as many as five times in a week" during the month period that Wilkie had served as steward. There were times he said when he had to go to the jobsite "twice in one day."

Laney stated that his usual procedure was to contact Superintendent Bragdon and then Steward Wilkie. He would usually return to speak with Bragdon alone, although Wilkie would sometimes follow along. Laney indicated that Stolte was more cooperative than most other employers. Said Laney:

> I would have to truthfully say that in the process of visitation on this job that any time I ran into a problem that seemingly could not be solved between me and Bragdon or McCauley, I went to [Project Manager] Mr. Neeson and he always resolved the problem for me.

Laney recalled details of certain visits made to Galleria II but not the dates. Laney remembered going to the jobsite in regard to "open trenches, shoring and barricades." Bragdon told Laney that these things would be corrected.

On another occasion Laney went to the jobsite in response to a complaint that "carpenters, plumbers [were] doing our work." Laney said he "did not see any infractions," noting that carpenters are allowed to carry lumber from a stockpile within a 25-foot radius to do their work and that plumbers are permitted to do what they were doing on that occasion, which he described as "some kind of sewer" work.

Laney recalled being called to the jobsite when "Double P" was pouring concrete. After some investigation, Laney told Bradgon that an "oiler," although a union man, should not be pulling "mud" out of a chute with a shovel or giving any directions to a truck "because that was a laborer's job." Laney had no criticism of the work being performed by the "operator" on the job, however. Bragdon told Laney then that "he would settle the issue, and the oiler put his shovel down."

Laney remembered talking to two workers on the jobsite who "were supposedly complaining" about not being paid for working through their lunch period. Said Laney:

> I dismissed the complaint because of the fact that they had answered that they worked through the lunch period on their own volition. And them working on their own volition did not allow me a point to collect because they were not complaining.

Testifying on cross-examination, Laney said he had talked to Bragdon concerning Wilkie's complaint that he had been unable to perform his duties as a steward. Laney indicated that Wilkie's complaint was not justified, stating, "I think that he had been offered the opportunities to do what was specified, within the working agreement."

Laney also testified on cross-examination that Stolte officials had mentioned the possibility of Wilkie's discharge becuse his work habits had changed. Laney acknowledged that he and Bragdon had observed Wilkie in the area of a ditch for a period of 15 or 20 minutes. Laney indicated at first that Wilkie was standing above the ditch, but then stated:

> He walked around. I do not know. He may have been picking up the rocks or doing something that I do not know anything about.

James McCauley, Stolte's Laborers' Foreman on the Galleria II project, began his employment with Stolte in December 1981. He was concerned with construction of the parking structure and worked under Superintendent Bragdon.

McCauley said he was responsible for the rehiring of Wilkie in December 1981 and thereafter supervised Wilkie's work. McCauley stated Wilkie used a vibrator for a couple of days and spent much of his time "cleaning the bottoms" of footings. McCauley asserted that Wilkie was assigned to do the same kind of work other laborers performed—cleaning of rebar, stacking of lumber, sweeping up, washing of vehicles, etc.

Wilkie was "very slow" from the beginning, according to McCauley. McCauley compared Wilkie's rate to be "about a third" of the average laborer. McCauley said he spoke to Wilkie early on about his slow pace, and the latter responded that "Rome was not built in a day." After being appointed steward, Wilkie's speed was even slower.

McCauley said he had authority to hire and fire and that he had told his superiors "half a dozen" times that he was going to lay off Wilkie because of his poor performance. McCauley said he was responsible for the information appearing in Wilkie's termination notice. McCauley testified that he had decided to let Wilkie go about 2 or 3 weeks, before he actually dismissed him. On cross-examination, when shown his affidavit, McCauley agreed that he had told Carpenter Foreman Powell in December, prior to Wilkie's designation as a steward, that he wanted to terminate Wilkie at that time because of his slow work.

McCauley maintained that there was no need for Wilkie to make complaints. McCauley said he would correct deficiencies called to his attention but that "99% of the time [Wilkie] would call the business agent." McCauley recalled an incident in which two laborers helped him pour concrete during a lunch period. Wilkie complained about it, and McCauley saw to it that they were paid for such work. On another, similar occasion Wilkie had complained to McCauley that the company must pay employees for working through lunch. McCauley acknowledged to Wilkie that he knew that fact, which brought the following response from Wilkie: "Don't give me no shit or I'll make you pay me too."

McCauley disputed Wilkie's claim that the latter only took pictures during "Off hours." McCauley asserted that he observed Wilkie taking pictures at least a "half a dozen" times.

Eugene Bragdon identified himself as job superintendent at Galleria II. He stated that there was one other person on the job superior to him, Project Manager Neeson.

Bragdon stated that he had requested that Wilkie be rehired after being laid off, and he assigned Wilkie to work under Laborers' Foreman McCauley. Bragdon said he observed Wilkie working on one particular occasion and noted that Wilkie "threw out about a half a shovelful of dirt to two shovelsful of dirt by other laborers."

Bragdon thought he had discussed Wilkie's slow work with McCauley about a half a dozen times. Bragdon was not sure when the discussions took place but stated that McCauley had indicated Wilkie "had slowed down since he became steward."[10] Bragdon testified concerning certain incidents Wilkie had referred to in his testimony. Bragdon recalled that Wilkie complained that the company had allowed a concrete truck driver to "run a little water" to clean out the "chute when the truck is empty" instead of utilizing a laborer to perform such activity. He said he allowed Wilkie to call out his business agent (who agreed with Wilkie) about the matter.

Bragdon denied stating at a safety meeting, or on any other occasion, that he would fire anyone for calling OSHA or a business agent. He said he did want to be informed of all safety problems and had stated at safety meetings that nothing would be held against a person for reporting an unsafe condition.

Bragdon stated that Project Manager Neeson had requested the Cal-OSHA Consultation Service to visit the Galleria II jobsite in connection with the excavation work on the project. Cal-OSHA Consultant Manuel Ciriaco visited the site on January 20 and recommended utilization of certain safety procedures (R. Exh. 2). Bragdon said he thought the company had complied with Ciriaco's recommendations as to shoring. However, on January 25 Cal-OSHA Inspector John Ford made an inspection and on January 27 issued a citation alleging violation of two safety standards (R. Exh. 3A). In addition, Ford provided the company with an information memorandum recommending protection be provided employees working near a sloping bank (R. Exh. 3(b)).

Bragdon testified that Wilkie had been allowed to perform his duties as steward. Bragdon said he spoke with Union Business Agent Laney about Wilkie on a couple of occasions. On one of the occasions Laney told Bragdon that "he had informed Mr. Wilkie what his duties were as a steward and that he also owed the company responsibility for a day's work for a day's wages." Bragdon continued: "The second time was when Mr. Laney informed me that he had sat over in the parking lot at Thrifty Drug Store and observed Mr. Wilkie for a rather lengthy period of time doing nothing."

Bragdon stated that McCauley made the decision to discharge Wilkie. McCauley advised Bragdon of the decision and Bragdon in turn informed the project manager who had the final authority on the project. The Union was thereafter notified by letter dated February 10 of the termination as provided for in the collective-bargaining agreement.

Keith Tanner, administrative vice president of Stolte and custodian of the firm's records, took the stand to testify that the Company's records contradicted the Charging Party's testimony that he was on the job on January 20 and was not there on January 18. The company's records show that he was paid for work performed on January 18 and that he received no pay for any work on January 20 (R. Exh. 6).

Tanner also testified that he has been concerned with safety for Stolte for 15 years and that it has a "strong" safety program. He said employees at Galleria II were free to go to the project manager and to their union business representatives with safety complaints.

I am satisfied that Respondent terminated Charging Party Wilkie for a legitimate business reason. The credible testimony of Foreman McCauley and Superintendent Bragdon persuade me that Wilkie was discharged only because of his poor work performance. His work was "too slow" before he was designated steward, and his poor work performance deteriorated further after he became steward. Respondent demonstrated that Wilkie's termination would have taken place in the absence of any protected concerted activity. See NLRB v. Transportation Management Corp., 462 U.S. 393 (1983).[11]

The General Counsel's argument in support of the charges is not persuasive. There is no question about Wilkie's right to make complaints concerning working conditions, including those that concern safety. That Cal-OSHA made an inspection at his request and issued a citation and information memorandum to Respondent, of course, does not satisfy the General Counsel's burden. Nor is the fact that complaints of Wilkie may have had "at least some merit."

I reject the General Counsel's contention that Respondent's "stated reason for Wilkie's termination is highly incredible and strongly hint at fabrication." The effort of the General Counsel's attorney to make McCauley's testimony appear inconsistent is unpersuasive. I credit McCauley's testimony over Wilkie. I specifically reject Wilkie's claim that no one ever complained about his work. And I reject Wilkie's assertion that Bragdon had threatened to fire anyone who complained to OSHA or to a union business agent. The failure of McCauley and Superintendent Bragdon to deny each and every assertion of Wilkie is not significant here. The failure to [10] Bragdon agreed on cross-examination, however, that he had stated in an affidavit that as far as he knew, Wilkie's work was satisfactory up until he became steward.

[11] Wilkie's testimony on the General Counsel's case-in-chief, if considered alone, suggests that protected conduct could have been a motivating factor in his discharge. The General Counsel's other witness, Union Business Agent Laney, however, was of no assistance to his cause. Laney's testimony indicates that he was aware of Wilkie's poor performance and was in no position to question Wilkie's discharge for that reason.

call Carpenter Foreman Powell, who had no part in the discharge of Wilkie, is likewise of no significance.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce and in a business affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.
2. The Laborers' International Union of North America, Local 300, AFL-CIO, CLC is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.
3. Respondent's discharge of Kenneth Wilkie on February 12, 1982, was for a legitimate business purpose and did not violate the Act.
4. It was not established that Respondent violated the Act.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[12]

ORDER

It having been found and concluded that Respondent, Stolte Inc., has not engaged in any unfair labor practice, the complaint is dismissed in its entirety.

[12] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION

HAROLD A. KENNEDY, Administrative Law Judge. On August 31, 1983, I issued a decision and recommended Order dismissing a complaint that charged Respondent with violating Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act by discharging one of its employees for engaging in union or "other protected concerted activities." On April 27, 1984, the Board remanded the proceeding with the direction that I make more specific credibility findings and set forth the bases therefor. The Board's remand Order reads in part:

> Since the Board considers the Judge's credibility resolutions presently inadequate, this proceeding therefore shall be remanded to the Judge in order that he can make specific findings as to the credibility of witnesses including, but not necessarily limited to, his reasons for crediting the testimony of Respondent's foreman, James McCauley, over Wilkie's; why he found unpersuasive the General Counsel's claim that McCauley's testimony was inconsistent; and more precisely what effect, if any, the testimony of James Laney, Laborers' Local 300 business agent, should have on this proceeding.

Foreman James McCauley impressed me as a truthful witness, and I specifically credit his testimony as to why he recommended Wilkie's discharge. I believe McCauley's testimony to the effect that he found Wilkie to be "very slow" from the start, that he worked more slowly than other laborers, and that his performance worsened after being appointed steward, notwithstanding the fact that McCauley had discussions with Wilkie about the speed of his work. I credit McCauley's testimony that Wilkie stated during one of such discussions that "Rome was not built in a day," and that on another occasion Wilkie responded, "I'm going as fast I can."

I find no significant inconsistent statements in McCauley's testimony in spite of the persistent, if not contorting, efforts of the General Counsel's attorney to make it appear so. A fair reading of McCauley's testimony, in my view, clearly indicates that McCauley recommended Wilkie's discharge only because of slow performance on the job.

It is apparent that McCauley did not regard Wilkie's attitude as a worker to be the best, but the record is not persuasive that McCauley recommended Wilkie's discharge because of a poor attitude or for any reason other than slow performance.

It was hardly critically inconsistent for McCauley to have stated in his affidavit that it took Wilkie "forever to a job" and state at other times that Wilkie worked at a one-third or at other slower rate than other workers. That McCauley did not remember that the affidavit that he signed stated that Wilkie took forever to do a job is of no moment.

The brief filed with me by the General Counsel's attorney went to some length to make it appear that McCauley's testimony contained inconsistencies and was thus unworthy of belief. There does appear to be some conflict in the testimony as to who was responsible for hiring (or rehiring) of Wilkie. McCauley answered in the affirmative to the question if he had been responsible for hiring Wilkie. McCauley said later he "was not the one that originally hired Mr. Wilkie" and stated that it was Edward Cruz who did (Wilkie himself said he was hired by Cruz. Superintendent Bragdon indicated in his testimony that Wilkie had worked for Cruz when Wilkie was first hired [in October before McCauley was employed by Respondent] and that he [Bragdon] had asked McCauley at a later time to notify the Union of the company's desire to recall Wilkie.) Such testimony on this matter of no more than secondary importance may be incomplete or even unclear, but it hardly "demonstrates McCauley's propensity to stretch his testimony to fit a given question," as the General Counsel's attorney has argued.

It is clear from McCauley's testimony that he took the initiative to discharge Wilkie. He consulted other officials, including his superior, Superintendent Bragdon, about terminating Wilkie, even though he had authority to discharge employees. (Bragdon also discussed the discharge with his superior, Project Manager Neeson, who signed the termination "slips" (G.C. Exh. 3).) I thus reject the General Counsel's attorney's assertion that McCauley "changed his testimony" on the point.

The "actual reasons" for Wilkie's termination were not "somewhat conflicting" as the General Counsel's attorney contended. That McCauley admitted that he "never timed Wilkie or other laborers" does not mean that McCauley made no judgment that Wilkie was a slow worker or that there was another reason for recommending his dismissal.[1]

As the General Counsel's attorney pointed out in his brief, Wilkie's complaints went "substantially unrebutted and undenied." Certain testimony of Wilkie impressed me as improbable and not credible, however, in the face of impressive contradictory evidence. I was not persuaded by his claim that no one had discussed his work habits or the speed of his work while employed by Stolte. I thus credit McCauley's testimony on this point. Nor do I credit Wilkie's testimony that two workers had complained to him that work performed by them during a lunch hour had gone unpaid. I credit McCauley over Wilkie on this point also.[2] I am unpersuaded that Respondent refused or failed to furnish his eye protection as he claimed. Rather, I credit McCauley who testified that he had offered Wilkie safety glasses on a day he injured his eye while working with a pick "in an inch or two of slurry." I credit McCauley's testimony over the contrary testimony of Wilkie that McCauley assigned the same kind of work to Wilkie as he did to other laborers and that Wilkie took pictures during work time. Further, I am unable to credit Wilkie's claim that Superintendent Bragdon stated at a safety meeting attended by approximately 25 employees, including Foreman McCauley and Superintendent Cruz, that he would fire anyone who called OSHA or a union business agent. I credit Bragdon's testimony that he did not make such a statement and his specific testimony that he had stated at safety meetings that "nothing will be held against a man for reporting an unsafe condition."

The testimony of Business Agent James Laney, who was called by the General Counsel in support of the complaint, was significant in the lack of support it gave to the General Counsel's cause and the Charging Party Kenneth Wilkie's claim that he was discharged for union activities. Laney's testimony is persuasive that Respondent did not interfere with Wilkie's duties as a shop steward. Significantly, Laney testified that Stolte was more cooperative than most employers and that he could always resolve problems at the project manager's level if unable to do so with lesser officials. The most telling part of Laney's testimony was the support he gave on cross-examination to defense evidence presented later. Laney agreed that McCauley had told Laney prior to Wilkie's discharge of a change in Wilkie's work habits and that the company might terminate him. Laney testified that he spoke with Superintendent Bragdon about whether there had been a change in Wilkie's work habits after being designated steward. Laney agreed that there was an occasion when he observed Wilkie stand or walk around for a period of probably 15 or 20 minutes. Laney said he had made such observations from a Thrifty Drug store next to the jobsite. Superintendent Bragdon testified that he had discussed Wilkie's work habits with Business Agent Laney on two occasions and that Laney had offered these comments:

> Well, the first time that Mr. Laney and I talked about it he told me that he had informed Mr. Wilkie what his duties were as a steward and that he also owed the company responsibility for a day's work for a day's wages. Or words to that effect . . . . The second time was when Mr. Laney informed me that he had sat over in the parking lot at Thrift Drug Store and observed Mr. Wilkie for a rather lengthy period of time doing nothing.

Wilkie, of course, could properly complain about what he believed to be unsafe working conditions, including inadequate shoring of footings, inadequate access to medical treatment, and inadequate equipment or clothing. He could properly inquire about the union status of other workers peforming work on the jobsite. He could properly inquire as to whether employees who worked through their lunch period were compensated as provided for under the collective-bargaining agreement. He could properly protest that Respondent had improperly assigned nonlaborers to perform laborers' work. Wilkie was able to make such complaints, inquiries, and protests, however, and I remain unconvinced that Respondent terminated him for doing so. Respondent had a right to expect Wilkie would perform at a reasonable rate of speed while employed as a laborer although also serving as a steward, and it was not unlawful for Respondent to discharge him for failing to do so.

I have carefully reviewed the record and adopt and affirm all of the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order set forth in my decision of August 31, 1983.

[1] The General Counsel also stated in his brief, without a record basis therefor, that:

> [i]t is clear that Neeson fabricated a variety of reasons for Wilkie's termination that not even McCauley had thought of, and McCauley is the supervisor who allegedly originated the idea to terminate Wilkie. Further, McCauley came up with several different reasons for Wilkie's termination at the time of the investigation of the instant case that McCauley couldn't remember during his testimony.

[2] According to McCauley, Wilkie told him, "Don't give me any shit or you'll pay me, too."

Keystone Auto Parts, Inc. and International Union, United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America (UAW). Case 6-CA-17118

31 December 1984

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

On 26 July 1984 Administrative Law Judge Marion C. Ladwig issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions. The General Counsel filed an answering brief, incorporating his brief to the judge, and a motion to strike the Respondent's exceptions.[1]

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Keystone Auto Parts, Inc., McKeesport, Pennsylvania, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

[1] The General Counsel has moved that the Board strike the Respondent's exceptions because they were not served properly and because they fail to identify the portion of the judge's decision to which the Respondent is excepting, contain no reference to any pages of the official record, and fail to cite any authority for any positions taken. Contrary to the General Counsel's assertions, the record shows that the exceptions were served properly. As for the contention that the exceptions were otherwise deficient, we find that the exceptions meet the requirements of Sec. 102.46(b) of the Board's Rules and Regulations inasmuch as they specify parts of the judge's decision to which objection is made, and they also generally dispute certain of his conclusions. Accordingly, the General Counsel's motion is denied.

[2] Contrary to the judge's finding, we find that the record is not clear as to whether employee McGraw signed a dues-checkoff card. Accordingly, any moneys owed to the Union for loss of dues caused by the Respondent's failure to apply the collective-bargaining agreement to McGraw must run from the date of the Union's first demand to the Respondent that the union-security clause be applied to McGraw.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

MARION C. LADWIG, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried at Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, June 5, 1984.[1] The charge was filed by the Union February 17 and the complaint was issued March 30.

After agreeing to include the classification "computer operator" in the collective-bargaining agreement covering the office employees, the Company hired a computer operator at a substandard rate, without benefits, and later claimed that he was a part of management and not a member of the bargaining unit. The primary issue is whether the Company, the Respondent, unlawfully refused to bargain by unilaterally withdrawing recognition from the Union as the representative of the computer operator classification, violating Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act.

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after considering the General Counsel's brief, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The Company, a Pennsylvania corporation, retails and wholesales auto parts at its store in McKeesport, Pennsylvania, where it annually receives goods valued over $50,000 directly from outside the State and derives over $500,000 in gross revenues. The Company admits and I find that it is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act and that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Hiring of Computer Operator

In December 1982 the Company purchased a new computer, expecting it to be in operation in 3 or 4 months. About a year and a half later, there remained several months before the computer could be expected to be in full operation.

One problem was that the computer was purchased with standard software that was not appropriate for keeping inventory in the auto parts business, and the Company decided not to go to the expense of having the computer reprogrammed to fill its particular needs. The other problem was that its employees were not properly trained to work with the software.

The Company assigned the work of entering the inventory control data into the computer to computer operator Ethyl Germack, to office employees Francis Adams and Marsha Haberjak, and to a member of the store employees' bargaining unit, inventory clerk Bonnie Stern. At the time, only Stern was represented by the Union. Germack and the other office employees were excluded from the bargaining unit.

On July 18 a consent election was held in a unit of "All office clerical employees, including accounts receivable clerks, accounts payable clerks and computer operators," and the Union was certified July 27. Meanwhile, the Company was dissatisfied with the progress of the work on the computer. It laid off operator Germack before the election, but agreed with the Union to retain the classification of computer operator in the bargaining unit.

Instead of recalling and training computer operator Germack or hiring a fully trained computer operator, the Company arranged for part-time employees of CDA, the computer company, to come in and load the computer with the inventory data. When the Union protested that this was bargaining unit work, the Company laid off the part-time CDA employees and assigned Francis Adams, the accounts receivable clerk, to work as the computer operator in the afternoons. (She had helped select the computer and was the most knowledgeable office employee in its operation.) Adams was being paid $7 an hour, although the wage rate of computer operator Germack (as well as the accounts payable clerk) had been $4.90 an hour.

In the collective bargaining that followed, the Company and Union specifically included the computer operator classification in the contractual bargaining unit, along with the accounts receivable and accounts payable clerks. In an addendum to the store employees' existing agreement, the parties agreed that each of the office employees would receive a 20-cent increase, raising Adams' wage rate to $7.20 an hour and the accounts payable clerk to $5.10 an hour.

Adams continued to work in the afternoons (at her $7.20 accounts receivable clerk rate) as a part-time computer operator until January 3, when the Company hired computer operator Robert McGraw to work part time as "part of management" at $4.50 an hour, without contractual benefits. McGraw was a student at a computer school. He had had experience with computer inventory work in the auto parts industry, but he was not trained to work with the Company's computer software. Adams assisted him in learning to load the inventory data into the computer, performed computer functions that he was not trained to do, and continued to do part of the inventory work. The Company permitted McGraw to set his own working hours, and between January 3 and June 5 (the date of trial), he averaged working 30 to 33 hours a week (as compared to the 35 hours that full-time employee Adams was working). McGraw was not paid time and a half for Saturday work, as required by the collective-bargaining agreement.

In late January McGraw signed a dues-checkoff card (Tr. 13) for his union dues to be checked off under the contractual union-shop provision. The Company refused to check off his dues, informing the Union that McGraw was a salaried, part-time employee, who "was going to be part of management" (Tr. 13).

B. Contentions and Concluding Findings

The General Counsel contends that the Company violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) by unilaterally withdrawing recognition from the Union as the collective-bargaining representative of any employee classified as a computer operator.

The Company's principal defense is that McGraw is not a computer operator, but a "computer programmer." The undisputed testimony is to the contrary. Accounts receivable clerk Adams credibly testified that neither she nor McGraw does any computer programming and that there is no difference in the type work McGraw and computer operator Germack did (Tr. 87–89). McGraw credibly testified that he was merely doing data entry and inventory control work, not the work of a computer programmer (Tr. 116). I therefore reject this defense.

The Company contends that McGraw is not in the bargaining unit because he is a part-time employee, setting his own hours, but there is no basis in either the certification or the collective-bargaining agreement for excluding part-time employees. The Company contends that McGraw is only a temporary employee, despite his long tenure and the contractual provision limiting a temporary assignment to 2 weeks. Evidently because McGraw clearly has no supervisory or managerial authority, the Company no longer appears to contend that this underpaid employee is "part of management."

I find that computer operator McGraw is clearly a member of the bargaining unit and that the Company unlawfully refused to bargain by unilaterally withdrawing recognition from the Union as the representative of the computer operator classification, violating Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. El Centro Health Center, 266 NLRB 1 (1983).

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

By unilaterally withdrawing recognition from the Union as the bargaining representative of the computer operator classification, the Company engaged in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I find it necessary to order it to cease and desist and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

The Respondent having unlawfully refused to include the newly hired computer operator in the contractual bargaining unit, it must make the employee whole for any loss of wages and other benefits, and the Union whole for any loss of dues resulting from its failure to honor the employee's dues-checkoff authorization, plus interest as computed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977). In the absence of a specific wage rate negotiated for the computer operator, I find it appropriate to base the employee's backpay on the former rate of $4.90 an hour, plus the 20-cent increase negotiated for other office employees.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[2]

ORDER

The Respondent, Keystone Auto Parts, Inc., McKeesport, Pennyslvania, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Unilaterally refusing to recognize International Union, United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural

[2] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

Implement Workers of America (UAW) as the exclusive bargaining representative of the computer operator classification.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Make computer operator Robert McGraw whole for any loss of wages or other benefits, and the Union whole for any loss of dues, suffered as a result of its failure to comply with its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union, in the manner set forth in the remedy section of the decision.

(b) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(c) Post at its main store in McKeesport, Pennsylvania, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[3] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 6, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

[3] If this Order is enforced by a Judgment of a United States Court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT refuse to recognize International Union, United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America (UAW) as the exclusive representative of the computer operator classification.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL make computer operator Robert McGraw whole for any loss of wages or other benefits, and the Union whole for any loss of dues, suffered as a result of our failure to include him in the bargaining unit, plus interest.

31 December 1984

DECISION, ORDER, AND DIRECTION OF SECOND ELECTION

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS HUNTER AND DENNIS

Pursuant to a Stipulation for Certification Upon Consent Election executed by the parties, and approved by the Regional Director for Region 20 of the National Labor Relations Board on 13 August 1982, an election by secret ballot was conducted on 30 September 1982 among the employees in the stipulated unit. On conclusion of the balloting, the parties were furnished with a tally of ballots which shows that, of approximately 67 eligible voters, 66 cast ballots, of which 29 were for, and 15 against, the Petitioner; there were 21 challenged ballots, a number sufficient to affect the election results, and 1 ballot was declared void. Thereafter, the Employer and the Petitioner each filed timely objections to conduct affecting the results of the election. The Employer then withdrew three of the objections it had filed on 22 October 1982. Subsequently, on 1 December 1982, the Petitioner withdrew all its objections to the election.

In accordance with the Board's Rules and Regulations, the Regional Director for Region 20 conducted an investigation and, on 10 December 1982, issued and duly served on the parties his Report on Objections and Challenged Ballots. In his report, the Regional Director directed that a hearing be held to resolve all issues raised by the Employer's remaining objections and the determinative challenged ballots.

On 11, 12, 17, 20. 21, and 24 through 27 January 1983 a hearing was held to determine the merits of the Employer's objections and the eligibility of the challenged voters. During the course of the hearing, on 17 January 1983, the Regional Director issued his Supplemental Report on Objections in which he found that the Employer's supplemental objections filed that day also raised issues which could best be resolved by a hearing, and he directed that they be heard at the hearing then in progress. Thereafter, on 5 April 1983, the hearing officer issued his Report on Objections and Challenged Ballots in which he recommended that the Employer's objections, as well as the challenges to the ballots of employees Thomas Corning, T. L. Du, Juanita Lee, Manual Y. Lee, Marguerita S. Lee, Rosario Lee, R. Huang, Y. Huang, Z. Huang, Qui Cong Luu, Y. Tam, Y. Yee, M. Bogert, H. K. Troung, J. Mendoza, M. Trieu, and L. H. Szeto, be overruled, and that the challenges to the ballots of employees David Johns,[1] Aleta Valdez, Debra Lee, and Shu Wai Ma be sustained. Thereafter, the Employer and the Petitioner filed timely exceptions to the hearing officer's report and supporting briefs, and both parties submitted briefs in response to the other party's exceptions.

On the entire record in this case, the Board finds:

1. The Employer is engaged in commerce within the meaning of the National Labor Relations Act, and it will effectuate the purposes of the Act to assert jurisdiction herein.

2. The Petitioner is a labor organization claiming to represent certain employees of the Employer.

3. A question affecting commerce exists concerning the representation of certain employees of the Employer within the meaning of Section 9(c)(1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

4. The parties have stipulated, and we find, that the following employees constitute a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act:

> All full-time and regular part-time employees employed by the Employer at its restaurant at 900 North Point, San Francisco, California; excluding office clerical employees, guards and supervisors as defined by the Act.

5. The Board has considered the hearing officer's report, the exceptions and briefs, and the entire record in this case, and adopts the hearing officer's findings and recommendations only to the extent consistent herewith.

The Employer in essence contends in its Objection 49 that the Regional Office's handling of determinative challenged ballots following the election was improper under Section 11344 of the Board's Casehandling Manual. Although he agreed with the Employer that the Regional Office had not fully complied with the procedures set out there, the hearing officer nevertheless recommended that this objection be overruled. The hearing officer found, quoting from Polymers, Inc., 174 NLRB 282 (1969), that the applicable standard for considering the Employer's objection "is whether the manner in which the election was conducted raises a reasonable doubt as to the fairness and validity of the election." Based in substantial part on the lack of evidence in this case that the Region tampered with any of the challenged ballot envelopes, the hearing officer concluded that the Employer had not demonstrated a reasonable possibility of irregularity within the meaning of Polymers, supra. We find merit in the Employer's exceptions to these findings for the reasons set forth below, and we shall sustain its Objection 49.

The record evidence here discloses that the election was over at 7 p.m. According to the Board agent in charge of the election, after the 21 challenged ballots proved determinative of the election results, he placed these envelopes in the case file which he took to the Regional Office. On arriving there, the Board agent left the case file in his office, which he locked, and went home. The next day, he put all the challenged ballots in a large manila envelope, attached a cover sheet listing the names of the challenged voters, sealed that envelope with tape, and wrote a signature across the tape. The Board agent then placed the large envelope in the Regional Office's election safe which was located in his office.[2]

The Employer subsequently alleged, inter alia, in its objections that the Board agent had interfered with the election by failing to ensure that the challenged ballot envelopes were properly sealed before he put them in the ballot box. The Regional Director, as noted, directed a hearing on all issues raised by the Employer's objections as well as the challenged ballots. Thereafter, while meeting about 5 days before the hearing began, the regional attorney and counsel for the Region in this matter decided to determine whether any of the challenged ballot envelopes were crumpled, written on, or improperly sealed as alleged in affidavits the Employer had submitted to support its objections. Thereafter, counsel for the Region, with the permission of the Assistant Regional Director, asked the Board agent who had conducted the election to give him the sealed envelope containing the challenged ballots. The Board agent then removed the large envelope from the safe and handed it to counsel for the Region, who opened the envelope and inspected, but did not open, the challenged ballot envelopes that were contained inside. After counsel for the Region had returned these items to his office, the Board agent put the challenged ballots in another large envelope that he sealed and placed in the election safe.

Subsequently, during the course of the hearing, the parties discovered that the Regional Office had opened the large envelope that contained the challenged ballots. The Employer immediately filed supplemental objections alleging that this conduct interfered with the election process.

[2] There is no evidence, however, that the Board agent stored the challenged ballots in this safe the previous evening.

Section 11344 of the Board's Casehandling Manual reads, in pertinent part, as follows:

> Challenged Ballots and Impounded Ballots: The following procedures with respect to the storage of uncounted determinative challenged ballots and uncounted impounded ballots must be observed by all Regions, Subregions, and Resident Offices.
> Determinative Challenged Ballots: The envelopes containing determinative challenged ballots will be placed, in the presence of the parties' representatives, in a large envelope or envelopes (Form NLRB–5126). After sealing the large envelope(s), the Board agent and the parties' representatives should sign their names across the flap and the flap should be secured with transparent tape in such a manner as to insure against accidental opening. The case name and number, the election date, a description of the contents of the envelope, the total number of large envelopes when more than one is used, and the name of the Board agent who sealed the envelope must be included on the face of Form NLRB–5126.
> The envelope(s) must be stored in the office safe.
> A photocopy of the face of the envelope(s) and a memorandum stating where the ballots have been stored will be placed in the R case file.
> The Regional Director, Officer-in-Charge, or Resident Officer is the custodian of the safe. The Assistant to the Regional Director, Regional Attorney, Deputy Regional Attorney, or Deputy Officer-in-Charge may be designated as agent for this purpose but the ultimate responsibility remains with the Regional Director, Officer-in-Charge, or Resident Officer.
> A log should be maintained by the Regional Director, Officer-in-Charge, or the duly designated agent concerning the challenged ballots which are stored in the safe. If a designated agent is appointed, the Regional Director should set forth the name of the designated agent in this log and this designation should be signed by the Regional Director.
> When the large envelope(s) containing ballots is removed from the safe, the Regional Director, Officer-in-Charge, Resident Officer, or designated agent will make an entry in the log showing the removal and this removal entry will be signed by one of the aforementioned persons. The log should indicate the reason for > the removal, the date of the removal, the Board agent to whom the envelope is released, and the nature of the contents authorized to be removed; e.g., all determinative challenged ballots or the identity, as shown on the large envelope, of the challenged ballots which are authorized to be removed. In addition, when some, but not all, of the challenged ballots are removed from the large envelope for the purpose of counting, such removal shall be done at the count in the presence of the parties' representatives and the Board agent shall put a memorandum in the case file recording the number of ballots removed, their identity, their disposition, and the number of ballots remaining in the large envelope. A copy of the memorandum is to be placed in the large envelope which should again be secured in the manner described above by the Board agent and the parties' representatives at the count and placed in the safe.

There is no doubt here that the Board agent who conducted the election deviated from the instructions promulgated by the General Counsel for the proper conduct of elections in his handling of the determinative challenged ballots at the election site. On conclusion of the election, according to his testimony, the Board agent did not, as directed by the Casehandling Manual, immediately place the challenged ballots in a large envelope sealed with tape over the signatures of the parties' representatives. Rather, he put the challenged ballots in a large envelope the following day when the parties could not verify that he had followed the proper procedures. Even more serious, in our view, was the Regional Office's subsequent conduct in opening the large envelope to inspect the condition of the challenged ballot envelopes. While the Casehandling Manual is not clear on this point, we conclude that the Regional Office should not have undertaken this examination in the absence of an opportunity by all parties' representatives to be present. Examining these ballots is particularly troublesome since here the Regional Office—long after a hearing had been directed on the Employer's objections—decided to determine on its own whether the Board agent had engaged in objectionable conduct.

The Board, through its entire history, consistently has gone to great lengths to assure that its role in the conduct of elections is not subject to question.[3] Board election procedures are designed to ensure both parties an opportunity to monitor the conduct of the election, ballot count, and determinative challenge procedure. When such opportunity to monitor is denied as it was here, where the normal procedures for handling determinative challenges were not followed and the procedures followed did not permit the parties to assure themselves that the challenge envelopes were secure, we consider the manner in which the election was conducted to raise a "reasonable doubt as to the fairness and validity of the election" under the standard set forth in Polymers, Inc., supra.[4] We are not questioning the integrity or neutrality of the Regional Office personnel involved here. Rather, the appearance of irregularity created by the procedures used and the impact of that appearance on the election's validity lead us to conclude that this election must be set aside.[5]

We therefore are satisfied that there are sufficient grounds to warrant setting aside this election. Our dissenting colleague, however, like the hearing officer, apparently would require actual evidence that the challenged ballots were tampered with or mishandled before she would reach a similar result. The dissent's approach to this issue, in our view, would detract significantly from the election standards that the Board has promulgated. Our colleague fails to recognize that, if this Agency is to maintain the public's confidence in its election processes, it is imperative that the Board act dutifully to set aside elections whenever there is any appearance of irregularity in the handling of ballots.

[3] See Glacier Packing Co., 210 NLRB 571, 573 (1974); Tidelands Marine Services, 116 NLRB 1222, 1223 (1956).

[4] Contrary to the hearing officer and our dissenting colleague, we find that the court's decision in Skyline Corp. v. NLRB, 613 F.2d 1328 (5th Cir. 1980), is inapposite here. The employer there contended that the election should be set aside because the Board did not follow certain procedures, then in effect, for the proper handling of challenged ballots in that the envelopes containing the challenged ballots were not sealed with tape, there was no label with the name of the person who sealed the envelope, and no memo was placed in the file stating where the challenged ballots were stored. Put simply, we find that the conduct complained of in this case was more serious than that in Skyline Corp. Critically, on the record evidence here, we cannot say that the determinative challenged ballots were adequately "secured, safeguarded" as the Board concluded in Skyline.

We stress that we are not setting aside the election simply because the Casehandling Manual was not followed, i.e., not every failure to follow the Manual will warrant setting aside the election. Rather, reviewing all the facts in this case, we find the particular conduct involved sufficiently serious to set aside the election.

[5] We reiterate that we do not question the Region's impartiality. But we are concerned with other aspects of this case. Thus, we note that, before the Board agent testified that he did not put the challenged ballots into a sealed envelope at the election site, the parties stipulated that when the election was over the Board agent had handled the ballots in the manner prescribed by the Casehandling Manual. This unexplained discrepancy on a critical matter creates uncertainty regarding the whole proceeding.

We further note that it appears it was the Employer's attorney who raised the question of whether the Regional Office had opened the large sealed envelope containing challenged ballots. It does not appear from the record that, absent the Employer's concerns, the Region would have informed the parties of its action. In all these circumstances, a second election is the better course.

Here, in finding no merit to the Employer's objection, the dissent emphasizes the lack of evidence that any party had unsupervised access to the ballots.[6] While it may be true that this factor "typically" is present in cases in which the Board has set aside an election based on the appearance of impropriety in the handling of ballots, this is not the only situation in which we have sustained such objections. We note that after a mail ballot election in New York Telephone Co., 109 NLRB 788 (1954), the parties met at the Regional Office to determine the results. It became apparent during the count that a serious discrepancy existed between the number of returned ballots (slightly under 4500) and the then tallied votes (slightly over 3700). Thereafter, a search by Board personnel of the counting room, which apparently took place on the next working day, uncovered a box containing exactly the number of missing ballots. Although the counting room had been locked in the interim and it did not appear that there had been any tampering with the ballots, the Board directed a new election in order to maintain its strict election standards. The Board concluded that the "irregularity" occurring in that case, which involved a sufficient number of ballots to affect the election results, raised a reasonable doubt as to the validity of the election processes. We find that the same is true in this case.

We also conclude that our colleague's reliance on N. Sumergrade & Sons, 123 NLRB 1951 (1959), as support for her position here is misplaced. The conduct in Sumergrade was not "essentially the same" as here, contrary to our colleague's claims. In that case, the Board agent had placed numerous challenged ballots in a cardboard carton that he then sealed with tape and had the parties initial. During its investigation of these challenged ballots, the Regional Office, without notifying the parties, opened the sealed carton to compare the names on the envelopes with the employer's payroll list and to put them in alphabetical order. The Board there rejected a claim that the unilateral opening of the carton was objectionable conduct. Differentiating that case, we note first that at least there the box was sealed in the parties' presence and initialed by them. That was not done here, according to the Board agent's own testimony. Next, when Sumergrade was decided, there was no provision in the Casehandling Manual directing Board agents to place determinative challenged ballots in a sealed envelope or box. In fact, the Board emphasized in Sumergrade that these measures had been performed "gratuitously." Also, it is clear that the opening of the cardboard box was done there solely for administrative purposes. In this case, however, the Regional Office took such action to investigate the condition of the individual envelopes based on an objection involving alleged Regional mishandling of them that had already been set for hearing. In these circumstances, there was no warrant for opening the sealed envelope containing the challenged ballots. Lastly, we note that the decision in Sumergrade was rendered over the strenuous objection of two Board Members.

Accordingly, contrary to the hearing officer's recommendation, we shall sustain the Employer's Objection 49, set aside the election held on 30 September 1982, and direct a second election.[7]

ORDER

It is ordered that the election previously conducted herein on 30 September 1982 is set aside.

[Direction of Second Election omitted from publication.]

MEMBER DENNIS, dissenting.

I cannot agree with my colleagues that the manner in which Regional Office personnel handled determinative challenged ballots in this case raises "a reasonable doubt as to the fairness and validity of the election" under the standard of Polymers, Inc., 174 NLRB 282 (1969). Accordingly, I would not set aside the election on this ground.
